Garcias d'Horta, Physitian to the Viceroy of the Indias, who liued within lesse then thirty yeares, sayeth, that hee had conferred with many Kings both of the Arabes and Affricanes; and found them to bee learned, as also notably skilfull in the Mathematikes. The like is affirmed by him that hath written the generall historie of India, that Almanfor, King of Tidora, one of the verie greatest Ilandes of the Moluccaes; was one of the greatest Astrologers in our times, and that the people are not so rude and barbarous, as heere among vs they are reputed to bee. Before Manfor, none of them had euer scene the Bookes of Aristotle, Plato, Hippocrates, Galen, and other Greeke Authours, in any other Language then the Grecian.

In the time of this King Manfor, flourished great store of Learned men and Philosophers: such as were Auerroes, Mesius, Rafis, Rabbie Moses, and diuers others, whose workes (at this very day) are reade in our Vniuersities, and Commented vpon, by diuerse and sundrie great Schoolemen, and it is not to be doubted, but posteritie (for euer) will rest behold- ing to them.

The manner of founding Colledges, wherein to instruct poore youths in good Letters; Hospitalles, for the lodging of maymed, sickely, and needie persons; Conuents and Abbeyes, for the dwelling of godly and religious men, wherein to pray for the augmentation of the Church, and prosperity of Christian Princes; beganne first by Kinges and Emperours, and in their imitation, Dukes, Earles, Barons, Popes, Cardinales, and Byshoppes, besides other rich men (among the common people did the like. As Charlemaigne, Lewes the ninth, Philip Duke of Bourgonne, and diuers other: which is a most plaine and manifest Reason, that all Christendome remaineth yet to this day, embellished with so manie faire and rich Arch-byshoppricks, Byshoppricks, Abbeyes, Priories, Colledges, and Hospitalles.

wealth, he became so proude, that hee durst vnder take the boldnesse (vpon some small suspition conceiued, that Lewes the eleuenth King of Fraunce, had intelligence with them of Liege, beeing then his enemies) to imprison the sayd King in the great Tower of Peronne, where they met both together, vnder the colour of friendly conference. And there he made him condescend to follow him (like a water Spaniell) in the warres, which hee had against the Inhabitants of Liege, euen vntill hee had ruined theyr Townes, and all the Countrey: Heere seated Edward king of England, beeing expelled from his Kingdome; giuing him mony, and an armie by Sea, to bring it to passe.

Afterward, hee would needes coape in Armes with the Emperour, and (almost) all the Princes of Germanie: besieging the Towne of Nuz (which is not farre from Coloigne) for the space of a yeare, but all in vaine. Euery one reputed him to be great, happy, and inuincible: but we shal soone perceiue the contrary, and how (by little and little) hee trode the path to his owne ruine, as briefly I purpose to relate. It fortuneth, that this Charles had instituted as Gouernour ouer those Lands, which he held mortgaged by the Arch-Duke of Austria: a thiefe and tyrant, named Peter de Hagenbach, Counte of Thierstein, who (so much as in him lay) tormented both them of Mulhuse, and the Switzers: whereupon, they took him prisoner, and hauing proceeded against him by due forme of Lawe: they degraded him of his order of Knight-hood, and afterwards beheaded him in the open Market place.

Next, the seauenty thousand florins were assigned ouer to a Banquer of Basile, and to the Duke it was signified by an Herald, that hee held no more right ouer the Countrey, then what the Arch-Duke had mortgaged vnto him. Hereat hee grew verie highly offended, and sought all meanes how to be reuenged; especially for the death of Peter de Hagenbach. Then hee assembled an Armie, being assisted by the Duke of Milaine, and the Dutchesse of Sauoy; taking Laufanna, which was confedered with the Switzers.

Thence hee went and besieged the Towne and Castle of Granson, solliciting them to yeeld themselves. They hauing humbly submitted themselves, the Duke commaunded foure score of them to be hanged, and an hundred more to bee drowned, in the nearest Lake adioyning to the Cittie. This inhumane act did not onely moue the Switzers; but likewise them of high Germanie, who with an Army belonging to the Arch-Duke of Austria (whereof Harman d'Extingen was the conductor) expelled the Duke from Granson, and slew a great part of his Army; taking beside, his Artillerie and furniture for warre, which was, great and rich. Afterward, taking downe all their friends, which the Duke had caused to bee hanged; in their places they hung vp as many Bourgoignons.

The moueables of his house, which hee would alwayes haue carryed along with him, were of extraordinary valew: for among them were so many rich tents, all of costly silkes, and vessells both of golde and siluer, embellished with store of precious stones, that it would require too long time to recount them. There were some Switzers, that sold great store of siluer plates, for two great blankes a peece, not knowing their valw and estimation. A Diamond, thought to bee the greatest and clearest that those times afforded; and, esteemed more worth then fiftie thousand crownes, was solde for twelue Sols. A faire bathing tubbe of siluer, richly gilded, wherein he vsed to bathe himselfe, was solde for foure pounds. I cannot here set downe, the rich clothes of Tapistrie, wrought with vn-ualuable workes of silke and golde, for him to treade on wheresoeuer hee went. To be brieft, the Reader would be wearied in rehearfall of the incredible wealth and riches, which this vnfortunate prince lost, and whereof his greatest enemies made their triumph.

Then falling into a long and grieuous sicknesse, at the length hee recouered, and taking courage to himselfe againe, hee returned the second time against the power and force of the Switzers. Hee had formerly taken Nancie from René, Duke of Lorraine; wherefore the sayde Duke of Lorraine forthwith ioyned his forces with the Switzers.

The Duke of Bourgogne being before Moras, the people of the Towne yssued forth, and so beset the army of the Bourguignons, that twenty thousand (according to Fasciculus Temporum) or twentie two thousand, and seven hundred (according to the Mother of Histories) were ther slain. The spoyle was left to the Duke of Lorraine, who likewise recouered Nancy againe afterward.

A third time likewise, the Duke of Bourgogne, being not a little offended, that he should be vanquished by so mean a Prince as the Duke of Lorraine, and hee recouering the Towne of Nancy; returned with fresh forces, and besiedged it againe with fourteene thousand able fighting men, beside some other bandes in expectation. The Duke of Bourgogne was discomfited, and all his army; but by no meanes could his body be found. The Bourguignons could not be perswaded that hee was slaine: but hauing escaped from the field, hee had retyred himselfe into Germanie, where he had vowed to liue in seven years penitence.

There were some Bourguignons, that made sale of precious Stones, Horses, and such like things, to be paide againe vpon his returne, and namely to Brachelles, in the Diocesse of Spire. There was a poore Begger, imagined to bee the Duke of Bourgogne, because he liued in the like estate of penance; which made verie many trauaile to see him, and bestow very liberall almes on him. Naclerus reporteth, that he saw the poore man begging in the same place. The King of France, hearing the Duke was dead, seized on Montdidier, Roye, Peronne, Abbenille, Monstreul, Arvas, Hesdin, and the two Bourgognes, to wit, the Dutchy and Countie. The men of Gaunt tooke his Daughter, that gouerned his estates very poorely, and married her as themselves pleased; she hauing put to death the Chancellor, and other of his best officers. Thus you see how this great Prince ended his life, accompanied vvith many misfortunes.

Vladislaus, King of Poland, a young and gallant Prince, was called by the Hungarians to be their King, in the yeare 1440. He conceiued such glory by seeing himselfe King of two such mighty Kingdoms, that he thought himselfe to be inuincible. Whereuppon, being desirous to imploy his valour in warre against some enemy, that might take notice of his courage and power; he brake faith and Truce, which the Hungares had made with the Turk the yeare before. In the first battayle hee gaue, he was quickly slayne, and hadde but a short enioying of his two Kingdomes; for, thorow the inconstancie of Fortune, his pretended felicity was soon cut off, and all his supposed power vterly quailed.

The Emperour of the East, Constantine Paleologus, some fifteen yeares after, went to keepe company with this young King Vladislaus, in the other world. For Constantinople, the Metropolitane Cittie of his Empire, was besiedged and taken by Mahomet the second, sir-named the Great, thorow the negligence and treacherie of Iohn Iustinian of Geneway, Mahomet hauing 300000. able fighting men, and foure hundred Cannons, and the siedge continued threescore dayes. The Emperour (in flight) was met withall, and murdered neere vnto the Gate: his head being carryed vpon a Launces point, and so conueighed quite thorow the Cittie, while his bodye was trodden vnto dirt with their feete. Mahomet also caused a Crucifixe to bee erected, and wrote vpon it (in scornefull derision) these words: This is the GOD of the Christians: commanding likewise, that every one should cast dung and filthe vpon the fayre Image.

The wife to the Emperour, with her daughters, and the very Noblest Ladies attending on them, were brought before Mahomet; and after all reproach was done vnto them, euen the verie greatest Villanies in the world, their bodies were hacked and hewne in peeces.

Some few dayes after, there was another King (but of three dayes standing) put to death likewise. VVhich I may by no meanes omit, because it was the forenamed Iohn Iustinian the Genouese, a trayterous Villaine. For hee had concluded with Mahomet, that if he would make him King, he would yeelde vp Constantinople, or be the meanes whereby hee shoulde surprize it. Mahomet kept promise with him; for hee constituted him a King for three dayes space: and on the fourth day, hee commanded his head to bee smitten off. So sayeth Fasciculus Temporum; and that

King Frances, first of that name, because himselfe was learned, and cherished men of learning and knowledge; beheld his reigne furnished with a great number of learned and vertuous Schollers, more then any other that went before him. In the same minde continued his Sonne, successor to his Crowne, and all the children of his successour; not meanelly cherished and enriched by king Henry the fourth.

Margret, Grandmother to the King now reigning, was a most learned Lady, of whose excellent & most elegant Poems, we haue great store remaining among vs. As also of Jane her Mother, both of them being Queenes of Nauarre, (and in their imitation) many other great Ladyes of honour, gaue their mindes to the reading of graue Authors, as well Greeke as Latine. Nor is it any matter of meruayle, if in these dayes, wee behold so many Ladyes well seene in good Sciences, and among the rest, that Italy affoordeth such plenty of studious women: the custome of the countrey prohibiting, that women should be any great walkers, or so much seene as they are in France. And because that famous Queene of England, Elizabeth, was very skilfull in many Languages, and deeply read in the fayrest and most commended Sciences, as in the Mathematicks, & diuers others: it was also credibly reported, that her house and Court, was bounteously stored with learned and most vertuous Ladies. And that which filled France with such plenty of bold and hardy spirits, was by the meanes of king Henry the fourth, then reigning: who in all battailes, encounters, and charging of the enemy, was alwayes the formost man himselfe; which taught his Captaines & Souldiours to do the like, onely by imitation of his vnparaled exploits.

degenerated quite from the vertues of their former King Philadelphus) and became so affected to drinking & drunkenness, intermixing rich flowers and precious stones among the wine they dranke; that he gaue such example to his men of warre, and to the people thorow the East, to drinke and gourmandize after the same manner, that they would be drunke euery day, and held it as an admirable vertue: forgetting the honest policy of the Romans, who would drinke no wine while they were in Armes. And so Marke Anthony (albeit hee was a great and worthy Captaine) and all his followers, by hauing discontinued the vertuous exercise of Armes; when hee should come to cope with Octavius Augustus, was (with small labour) surmounted. And the best generous acte, that Anthony could then deuise to do, and for his latest piece of seruice, was to kill himselfe, like another brutish Sardanapalus.

Darius also, the great Monarch and King of the East, about three hundred yeares before Marke Anthony, euen like to him, had (beside his married wife) a multitude of concubines, bardaching boyes, fiddlers, vaulters, dancers, fooles, players, and other people of as small account in his Army, eating and drinking, before eyther hunger or thirst vrged any necessity. His Captaines and men of command, with all the rest of his Army, he licenced to the like liberty: for each of his Souldiours might haue his two concubines, beside as many Ganymedes, and cheefer men tripled, or (at least) doubled them. In the ende, his Army, thought to consist of eight hundred thousand able fighting men; there could not bee found twenty thousand among them all. For according to the example of their king, they were altogether addicted to luxury and drunkenness, and became as people utterly vnmeet for warre. Therefore both he and they were ouercome by Alexanders forces, with small trauaile, or losse on his side; because his men were sober, continent, and stout fighting Souldiours, as the king himselfe was. So the Perfian Empire, and the Babylonian also, was lost and dissipated in a moment; in regard that their king was lasciuious and of soft temper, which caused his subiects to imitate his example.

CHAP. XXXIX.

Of the Originall of Triumphs: why they were first granted and used in Rome. How many they were that triumphed: What a Triumph is: and that there are two sortes of Triumphes.

Two things that moue men to high matters.

Of speake morally, & as men should doe, there are principally two causes, which incite men to vnder take great matters, as well in peace as warre. The first is Honor and renowne; the second is profite and commoditie, Magnanimous, Noble and Heroicke spirits do chiefly couet the first; & bafe and vnworthy soules seeke for salary and hire. Cicero saith in his Oration which he made for Archias the Poet: We all are drawne to desire commendation, and they of greatest place and expectation, faine with full gale after honour and fame: coueting no other recompence, or greater guardon for their Vertue, then glory onely. The same Cicero, in another Oration made for the defence of Milo, saith: Wise and valiant men do not so much labour in exercise of their vertue, for the receipt of wages, as for the honor that ensueth thereby.

A Poet of Antioch, much loued of Tully and Lucullus.

A Romaine, much honoured by Tully.

This being well considered by the Romaines, they (more then any other Nation) sought how to honour and illustrate (beside due recompence) such as stroue to do any notable or vertuous acte. So that in short time after, and proceeding on with the same determination; Rome afforded the resort (more then any place beside) of no meane number of worthie men, excelling both in Armes and Government, that by them shew attained to sway the Empire of the whole world. In regard whereof, for example and instruction to these instant times, as also to delight such as enquire after Antiquities: I thought it very conuenient, to supplye this place with some breefe declaration, of the manner obserued amongst the Romaines, in yeelding honour and renowne to such men, as had obtayned any victory for them.

Now because among all honors whatsoever, Triumph was reputed to bee the very greatest; we will discourse thereon, according as we finde it set downe for our instruction. Triumph was a forme of entrance, or (as we may well say) a kinde of Welcome, which they vsed in Rome, to their Captaines and Generalles, with the verie greatest pompe and solemnitie that could bee expressed vnto men. And albeit Triumphs were much vsed among the Romaines, yet were they not the first inuenters of them. For Diodorus Siculus, and Pliny, doth both say, that Demus, called Dionysus in Antiquitie, and named also Pater Liber, was the first that euer Triumphed in the world. It appeareth likewise, that the Carthaginians vsed to Triumph: for Iustinus (among the other honours of Hasturbalus) saith, that he Triumphed foure times.

Moreouer, wee reade of Triumphs among the Kings of Egypt, and especially of King Sesestris. Neuerthelesse, to speake truly, Triumphs were neuer so solemnized in any other Nation, as they were among the Romaines: for vpon the day that any Captaine triumphed, the people of Rome ceased from all kinde of Workes whatsoever, and not any matter (concerning profite) was permitted to be done.

And to make this solemne Triumph the more compleate, the people of al places neere neighbouring thereto, came thicke and threefold thither to behold it. And all the Citie, Temples, Streetes, Gates, and Windowes, were enriched & hung with clothes made of Gold, Silver, Silke, Leases and Flowers of sweete smelling fauour, beside all other magnificencies & costs that might expresse any signe of ioy. The Senate and all the Priests, with the whole Nobilitie of Rome, and generally the better sort of people, went forth into the fields very honourably apperelled, to enterayne the Triumpher: who entred Rome, clothed in purple, crowned with Laurell, and mounted on a golden charriot, drawne by foure milke white horses. All his prisoners went before him, attired like slaues or seruants, hauing their heads close shorne or shaven: and the Captayne or King of the prisoners by him vanquished, went nearest to the Charriot before anie other. The Souldiours of his owne Armie entred in due order, bearing branches of Laurell in their hands. Then followed before him, Chariots and Waggonss filled full of amour, which hee had taken from the enemy: beside other waggons laden in like manner, with Plate of golde and silver, money, iewells and other rich shapcs or trophies, with such gifts and presents, as hee had receiued of Kings, or any other friends to Rome. Great Castles, Towers, and other Edifices of wood, made artificially, representing conquered Citties and Fortresses, were likewise carried before him: making liuely representation, as they marched along, of such battailes as had happened in the last warre, and so exactly to the life; that they were very dreadful to the beholders. These things were so many in number, so mighty, and of such rare diuersitie, that the Triumph (sometimes) required the vse of three severall dayes, because all the representations might be the more amply noted and conceiued. The Triumph consisted of various inuentions, with many rare deuices, too long to be reported.

Nor was this honour of Triumph, allowed and granted to euerie Captaine or Victor: but there were Lawes set downe, and notable occasions to be considered, before such fauour could be obtained. The Captaine that meant to demand it, came not at all into Rome: but abode at the Vaticane, and thither the Senate returned him answer, whether such grace might bee permitted him, or no. First of all, no chiefe, or commander of an Army might triumph: except hee had bene Consul, Proconsul, or Dictator; for Triumph was neuer granted to any of meaner condition. In regard whereof, Marcus Marcellus had triumph denied him, albeit hee had worthily conquered Syracusas; and Scipio also, although hee had subdued Spain. For, it was necessarily required, that the battell must be great and notable against the enemy, and aboue fise thousand men at the least slayne therein. Of these matters, Valerius Maximus is Author. We likewise reade, that Cato, and L. Marius, being Tribunes, made a Law, whereby they ordained seuer punishment for any Captayne, that deliuered a false report of the number slayne in fight. Nor was it enough for a man to win the battell, how doubtfull & bloody fouer it were; but hee must subdue the whole Prouince or Country, & leaue it peaceably to his successor, bringing home his army braue & victoriously, which was the cause (sayth Titus Livius) that Triumph was denied to Titus Manlius, notwithstanding all his great victories in Spain: for hee should haue compassed the acquisition of som new country, or entred into a new warre, & not defend that only which was formerly won. Vpon the same occasio also, great Quintus Fabius triumphed not, though hee had conquered them of Campania.

It was obserued as a custome also, that on the day of Triumph, the Triumpher should invite the Consuls to suppe with him; which they would refuse to doe, because (at this feast) no person should bee present, to whom greater honour might be done, then to the Triumpher. The Triumph alwayes ended in the Temple of Iupiter in the Capitoll, where the spoiles (won from the enemy) were altogether offered, and deliuered up to public vse. And because the triumpher shold not ouer-glory himselfe in these high honors and fauours done him: some say, that a slaue or bond-man was seated by him with permission, to cast and scoffe at him all the day long, & to reproach him with such injuries as seemed best to himselfe, as a plaine apparance, that such dignities depended but on transitory graces.

Now, to make this triumphall honor the more intelligible; we will make rehearsal of some one or two, especially that of Paulus Aemilius, that worthy and famous Captayne of Rome, who obtayned his triumph iustly; for vanquishing & taking Perseus, the powerfull king of Macedon, conquering and ruining his kingdom, and therefore made his Triumph, according as it is remembered by Plutarch, in this manner. Our first remembrance, concerneth the people of Rome in general, with them of all the neighbouring parts round about, attired after their very best ability of performance, and contending for places in houses and windows, where best they might take view of the triumph. All the Temples and Churches in Rome were set wide open, deckt and richly hung with Tapistry, Greene boughes of Trees, beside plenty of incense and sweet smelling perfumes, and so were all the streetes in like manner. Now because in the City the concourse of people was infinite, resorting from so many severall places, in earnest desire to behold such a solemne spectacle, there were certain men appointed with staves in their hands, who had charge to make way for the Triumphs passage, and looke to the peoples safe seating, because the matters prepared for this triumph grew so great, as they were enforced to diuide them into three severall dayes.

The first day was scarcely sufficient for entrance of all the Banners, Standards, & vanquished Ensignes; as also for passage of the Statues, Colosses, Tables, and Images, for all these were conveyed along in order, in rich and well appointed Chariots, Vvaggons, and Thrones. On the second day, the Armour and munition of the conquered king, and what else belonged to the Macedonians, was brought into the city: which Armours being rich and gloriously glittering, were conveniently placed on best sighted carriages, meetest for their full and ample beholding. After these chariots and waggons, entred three thousand men, carrying silver money (open to be seene) on great Plates and Vessels of silver, each one weighing three talents, of which Plates and Vessels there were 350 in number, and foure men allowed to carry each piece of Plate. The rest that served to make up the full number of three thousand men, carried Fountaine Pots, Ewres, Basons, Laours, very curiously wrought in gold and silver, beside other vessels of the same mettals, most rich and magnificent to behold: and the passage of these companies continued so long, that it required the second dayes whole employment, marching along in due and comely order.

The third day being come, the break of day no sooner began, but in the first band, & beginning of the Triumph, went Drums, Pipes, Clarions, and Trumpets sounding, not sweet and delicately, but in such steame and vigorous manner, as if they were instantly to enter battail. After them were led six score kine, all white, having their hornes richly gilded, and their bodies covered with costly cloathes: all these were helde as sacred to the Gods, crowned and decked with garlands, and chaplets of faire flowers, & they that guided the, were brave gallant youths, sumptuously apparelled for this service, and for the sacrificing of them; and by these kine went as many comely children, carrying Plates of gold and silver for the sacrifice. Next unto the kine, were ranked such as carried gold money in chargers of gold, being twenty seven in number. And behinde them, followed they that holpe to beare the great Bolle or Cuppe of golde, weighing ten Talents, which Paulus Aemilius had caused to be made, enriched with many sumptuous and vnuallable precious stones. They which carried the chargers of money, were such as had bin neereft in fauour, about the Kings Antigonus, Seleucus, and other Kings of Macedon, especially the forenamed Perseus. Next followed the chariot of the conquered King, with the Armes and Weapons which he vsed to wear, his Crown, Scepter royal and rich Robe laid upon the Armour. Behinde the chariot, were the children to the poore king led as prisoners, with a great number of his chiefeft Officers; as the Masters or Gouernours of his household, his Treasurers, Chancellors, Secretaries, and others of high employment in his affaires. They all wept, & expressed extraordinary signes of griefe, beholding themselves brought into such a seruitude; which moued all the beholders to much compassion.

Of the children belonging to this king, there were 2 males and 2 females, but so young in yeares, as they were not capable of vnderstanding their misfortunes; whereby the people were so much the more incited to pity their condition, & thought it vnbecoming, that affliction should be seene seene in such tender yeares. In this Triumph, the Father followed his children, attired after his Countries manner; but yet in blacke habites, pacing on troubled and fearfully, as indeed he had good reason, considering his present estate, and whence he was false.

After the King, followed his friends & fauourites, with a great number of his familiars, who all looking on their King, confounded themselves with sorrow, to see his reuerend cheques furrowed with teares, and many of the Romans bemoaned his misery. Then after were brought the crownes of gold, which the ancient Cities of Greece had presented to Paulus Aemilius, who followed the triumphant, mounted vpon a goodly Chariot, cloathed in purple tissue of golde, bearing a Lawrell branch in his hand, and a crowne of the same vpon his head. Behinde him followed the people both on foote and horseback, some hauing branches of Lawrell and Palme in their hands, and some with Banners and Pennons, singing in honour of their Captaine, triumphing thus after his victories, with other most delectable sights to behold; and in this order Paulus Aemilius triumphed through Rome. Others also did the like, with some things added or diminished, and so they went to offer their spoiles, in the Temple of Iupiter within the Capitoll; and there, according to the forme and manner, as their blinded religion then required, they gaue thanks to their Gods for the victory obtained. And notwithstanding that in this fashion they obserued & performed their customary triumphs; yet they had a Law for it, according to which Law, they gaue triumph by desert, making a distinction of the gates & streetes, whereat they were to enter, and whereby they should passe along, the times also being ordered and appointed. But concerning other things, as sports, playes, & Feasts of diuers kinds, it was permitted, that euery man might augment and enrich his triumph, and his chariot also: for it is found recorded, that they had a custome, to be drawne by four white horses, and yet notwithstanding, some haue bin drawne by as many Buls.

Great Pompey, when hee triumphed for Africa, he entred in a Chariot drawne by Elephants. Suetonius saith, that Julius Caesar when hee made his triumphall entrance, had his chariot drawn by forty elephants. VVith the like Beasts triumphed the Emperour Gordianus. And Flavius writeth, that the Emperour Aurelianus, who was king of the Goths, triumphed in a chariot drawne by Harts. VVe reade also, that Mark Anthony in his triumph, had his chariot drawne by Lyons. The Roman Captains had a custome beside when they triumphed, to haue a young child, or many in their chariots: whereof Cicero maketh mention in his Oration pro Munera. Others caused to be led in their triumphs, an infinite number of wilde and sauage Beasts, as Lyons, Ounces, Beares, Tygers, Rhinoceros, Panthers, Dromedaries, & other kinds of beasts, as did Titus Vespasian, according to the relation of Iosephus. Some other also would haue their entrance with diuersity of Musique, as well by instruments as voyces, with infinite other like delectations. Among all which triumphs, some were more singular then the rest; as those of Pompey & Caesar; of the two Brethren Scipios; and likewise of the Emperors, whereof Iondus speaks in his Book of Rome triumphing, & according as Paulus Orosius saith, that there were 320 triumphs in Rome; the last whereof was the emperor Probus, from whose time since, Rome ran to her decadence.

In Rome there was yet another kinde of solemne welcom, which was somewhat lesse then triumphing, being called Obatio, and giuen for victories when as something wanted of such necessary conditions as required triumph. As for example, if the Captaine had not bin Confull or Proconfull, or had made war without great resistance, or little bloodshed in battle, or had conquered people of slender esteeme; or if the war had bin done without expresse authority from the Senate, & such like other conditions; then in stead of triumphing, this Obatio was granted to him, & it was performed in this manner.

The Captaine entred Rome on horsebacke, in stead of a chariot, and some of them (in elder times) entered on foote, crown'd with the leaues of Myrtle, which were offerings to Venus, because such triumphing was not reputed Martiall, but (as it were) veniall, according as Aulus Gellius saith. The people attending on this Captaine, were not armed, neyther sounded Trumpets, Drums, or any other instruments of warre; but Flutes & sweet musickall instruments, soft and delicate. Nevertheless, they entred in order, and with their booty, and the Senate went forth of the City to meete and receiue him, making a great feast for him, as also highly praying & commending him.

I finde that many excellent Captains haue requested & accepted of this honor, and the first was Posthumus Liberius, hauing vanquished the Sabines; and Marcus Marcellus for his victory at Syracusa. Suetonius affirmeth, that Octavius Caesar entred thus, after the Phillippick battailes, & the warre of Sicily. The cause why this small triumph was so named, is described by Pliny, for in declaring that diuers Captaines were denied this kinde of triumph, and could by no means obayne it: hee proceedeth to yelde a reason, why this Quatio was to be reamed. The sacrifice (sayeth he) which the Captaine then offered, was a Sheepe, but in the Latine tongue is called Ouis: but the other Triumpheers offered a Bull, and therefore vpon the word Ouis, the reception and entertainment made vnto the, was called Quatio, or Oualis. Some other say, that it took name by a certaine found in the peoples voyce, of Oe, or else Oue: but because this is a matter of small importance, it shall suffice to say, that such a thing was named Oualis, eyther of the word Ouis, or of the other voyce of Oe or Oue.

It was also permitted to the Triumpheers, to erect their Statues in Temples, & common places of resort: also to build Arches and Collombs, named Triumphaill, framed of Marble, and in or on the, to insculpe (most excellently) their battels and victories, for their owne perpetual memory. The vestiges or footings of the are (at this day) to be seene in Rome: and these things wer thus done, in imitation of Trophées, anciently vsed among the Grecians, helping themselves thereby in manner following. In the same place, where the Captaine had obtaigned any victory, a great tree was prepared, the branches whereof were all cut off; and then vpon the trunk was fastened all the coat-armours of the vanquished, as a victorious and honourable memory, and it was called Trophæum or Trophæum, after the greek word Trophis, which signifieth a fleeting conuersion, or retreated, because (in that place) the enemy was put to flight, or disgracefull retreat, and so the Romanes afterward were glad to follow their fashion.

Salust writeth, that Pompey hauing overcome the Spaniards, planted his Trophées on the top of the Pyrenean Mountaines: and this course (by tract of time) was in such esteeme, that they grew to be made of stone. But this matter can approue it selfe to be much more ancient, & that other Nations haue made vse thereof: for we reade, that Saul hauing vanquished Agag, king of the Amalekites, and beeing come to Mount Carmell, he erected there a triumphall Arch, as a memory of his victory. In breefe, the honour of triumph was esteemed and affected, more then any other honour in Rome, so that for obayning it, the Captaines would expose their liues to all traualle and perill. Beside, the Triumpheers grew to great wealth, both by the enemies spoyle, and the gifts of their friends, and so much the rather haue I reported these things, because Princes may thereby receiue example, how to honour and remunerate their Captaines and Soldiers to their merits. But in these decaying dayes, luggards, and such as doe nothing at all, are as well, if not better respected, then they that adventure their liues and goods, both for seruice of their Prince, & profite of their native country.

CHAP. XLI.

Of such names of immortal honour and renowne, which the Romane Captaines haue granted and giuen them, according to their severall victories.

Ver and beside this high dignity of Triumphs, the Romane Captains had farre greater honours giuen them, by names & surnames, which were imposed on them by the people and Prouinces, that had bin conquered and overcome by them. And as it was a notable forme of exaltation to honour; so did they immortalize their houses of descent, by contrary names of glory glory and fame, onely through their memorable adions, which procured so many worthy and illustrious Families in the City of Rome.

For our first entrance into this discourse, we may take an example by the three Metelli, whereof one (according as Salust and some others write) because he had overcome King Jugurthe, conquering also his lands and kingdome of Numidia; was surnamed Numidicus. The second being Quintus Metellus, for the victory he obtaigned against the king of Macedon, was surnamed Macedonicus. And the third, Creticus, because he conquered the Isle of Creete. But much more ancient then these, were Martius Coriolanus, and Sergius Fidenatus. The first was named Coriolanus, after the Towne Coriola in Lati, by him conquered. And the other by the like acte on Fidena, a Towne in Italy. Another Metellus also was surnamed Balearicus, because he had conquered to the Romane Empire, the Islands called Balearie, now termed Maiorque and Minorque.

Lucius Mummius was surnamed Achaicus, because hee had subdued Achaia and Corinthe. So the other Brutus, in regard he brought the Gauls in subiection, was surnamed Gallus. The two Scipioes, being brethren, were honoured by the names of the people whom they had vanquished; the one in Africa and Carthage, and the other in Asia, because he conquered also in Antioche and in Asia: for hee was the first that displayed the Romane Coullors or Ensignes in Asia. Another Scipio afterward, (sonne to Paulus Emilius) (of whose triumph we haue already spoken) & Nepheue adoptiue to great Scipio, was likewise surnamed Africanus; because hee at last and won the great and puissant city of Carthage. Nevertheless, hee receiued a greater honor and guerdon, to be surnamed Numantinus, and he himselfe held it in farre higher respect; because in Spain he destroyed Numantia, and utterly ouerthrew the Numantines.

I finde in like manner, that Emperours attributed vnto themselves the surnames of conquered places, speaking them expressly in their Letters misliue and other influents; namely Seuerus, and his successors after him; as for Arabia, Parthia, Armenia, Germania, and other Prouinces by them subdued. So one named himselfe

Arabicus, another Parthicus, another Armenicus, so Germanicus, and Asiaticus: each man according to such victories as he had obtaigned, so did hee magnifie himselfe.

Moreover, for other matters and reasons, the Romane Captaines were illustrated by especial names, for their greater magnificence and splendour. As we reade of Marcus Manlius, who for defending the Capitoll from the forces of the French, was surnamed Capitolinus. The family of the Torquatus receiued that surname, for taking a Chaine or Coller from the necke of an enemy, for a Coller or Chaine in latine is called Torquis, and so were diuers of them therefore named, Quintus Fabius Maximus, because by long delays & dissimulations, hee had held out Hanniball in warre, only for the defence of Rome; they surnamed him Cunctator, which is as much to say, as a temporizer or delayer. And for the same reason also, they termed him (beside) the Shield or Buckler of Rome, which redounded to his greater advantage and honour.

Marcus Marcellus, who liued also in those times, in regard of his great power and valiancy, the continuall battels which (without ceasing) he gaue to the enemy, was called, The sword of Hanniball. And that excellent Captain Sylla, though somewhat cruel, was surnamed Happy, in regard of his prosperous victories. Pompey likewise was so renowned by his successe in warre, that he had the surname of Great giuen him, then which title, I know not what could more haue raised and exalted him. So farre extended the dignity of surnames, granted to Captaines in those dayes, especially to such as were vertuous Commanders and Generals, as they were also called Emperours, which in these moderne times, is the title of supremest dignity, and which could not then be giuen, but to a Captaine, Prator, Consul, or Proconsull, that had bin victorious in some notable battaile, and had desolated the enemies country, by the death of a great number of enemies: As if two thousand of his men were slaine, there must then ten thousand perish on the enemies side, and not otherwise it was granted.

With this fo gracious and happy a surname, was Iulius Caesar, the Father of Iulius Caesar honored, for the victory which he had againſt the * Samnites & Lucanes, in the time of Sylla. Pompey alſo was called Emperour, for the memorable victory he wonne in Africa, againſt Domitius Marcus Tullius Cicero, being Proconſull in the warre againſt the Parthians, was by them of the Army named Emperour, for the victory there obtained. Julius Cæſar, before he was called to the Empire, was ſtyled Emperour, by reaſon of his many victories. But if this Capitaine had not ſuffered great reſiſtances in his battailes, he had not beene worthy of that name, & yet notwithstanding he was reſprehended, ſo that Marke Anthony murmured againſt him, and yet becauſe he had taken a great City, on the further ſide of the River Enphrates, he was content that they ſhould call him Emperour. After Julius Cæſar and his ſuccellours, inueſting themſelves with the full Seigneury of Rome, & knowing well, that the name of King was in horror and deſtation among the people, they would be named Emperours, which title hath continued ever ſince, & is the very greateſt of all.

So then we ſee, that for ſuch honours, the Romans ſayled not in their gratification, as well to their ſtrange friends abroad, being vnder their reward, as to the home-borne ſonnes of Rome. Becauſe like as they were powerfull and rigorous, in fighting againſt enemies; ſo were they as gracious and liberall to ſuch as aſſiſted them. So that in the ſame kinde of bounty they gaue to king Atalus the Province of Aſia, with the title of king: for which (afterward) he was ingratefull, becauſe (by his teſtament) hee returned all his profits to Rome. To Eumenes the brother of this Atalus, becauſe he had well ſerued and aſſiſted the Romanes, in the warre againſt Antiochus: the Senate gaue him all the Cities and Townes, which hee had conquered from Antiochus in Aſia. To king Deiotarus of Galatia, becauſe hee had ayded Pompey, in the warre againſt Mithridates, the Romans gaue him the Province of the leſſer Armenia. In the like manner was king Maſiniſſa of Numidia gerdoned, hauing bene embraced by Scipio, as his companion and friend to the people of Rome: to him was giuen all whatſoeuer he had conquered in the kingdome of Syphax, who had aſſiſted the Carthaginians.

Nor were theſe gifts and preſents allowed to Capitaines, and men of apparancie onely; but likewiſe to them of the meanest condition, they gaue gifts, prerogatiues, and great honours. The Conſull Marius, knowing the well deſerving of two companies, that had fought valiantly againſt the Cimbrians, a people among the Allemaignes, and were come into Italy with him, he receiued them as Citizens of Rome. When being reprov'd for doing ſuch a thing contrary to their Lawes, he made answer: In the noiſe and clattering blowes of weapons, there is no voice of the Law heard.

CHAP. XLII.

Of ſuch Crownes, with other recompences and ſalaries, which the Romans gaue to Soldiers. Alſo of puniſhing offenders, comprehending (in this caſe) an excellent form for warre, and good government of a common-wealth.

HE Romans were not careful onely for honouring & gratifying their Capitaines, but offered them (beſide) infinite other graces & fauours, rewarding them honourably in diuers and ſundry kindes, with Crownes & Jewels; as holding them in particular eſteeme and reputation, and according to the merit of their actions in Armes, in the ſame ſort were they reſpected and requited.

When a Capitaine had obtained a victory in ſome notable battaile, were it vpon the Sea or Land, and had therein taken ſome Towne by force, or done any other ſingular enterprize; immediately after, they had a cuſtome to make diligent inqueſtion, concerning the valour of the particular bandes and ſquadrons. Then mounting vpon the Theater, after they had giuen thanks to the Gods for the victory obayned: in generally they commended the whole Army, and eſpecially extolled the band or ſquadron, that had fought with moſt man-hood. Afterward they reuealed particular men in the companies by their names, publiſhing the worth of their vertue and courage, in no leſſe meaſure then they had deſerued: terming them friends and louers of their country, ſaying alſo, that the Common-wealth ſtood highly obliged to them. And this being done, they gaue then preſents of Gold and Silver, of Crownes, Girdles, Bracelets, Jewels, as alſo very excellent armour for horſes, made ſo curiouſly, & deliuered with ſuch defences and prohibitions, as no man was ſuffered to weare or haue the like, without he had deſerued it in the ſame manner. Hiſtories are full of theſe things, and particularly Titus Livius, ſpeaking of the Conſull Papyrius Censor, ſaith; that he gaue Bracelets of Gold to fourteene Centurions; and afterward to a ſquadron, he gaue very rich & coſtly Ornaments. As much hee ſaith of Scipio, being in Spain, and other places.

Now, concerning the Crowns which they gaue, they had diuers names, and were according to the degrees of merite. They had the Crowne Obſidionalis, the crowne Triumphalis, the crowne Oualis, the Corona Ciuiſis, Corona Muralis, Corona Navalis, and Corona Caſtrenſis. Pliny ſpeaketh of them all, and ſo doeth Aulus Gellius.

But that Crowne of greateſt excellencie, and more eſteemed then all the reſt, was Corona Obſidionalis, which extended to the circled or ſiege of the Campe, and it was giuen onely, for hauing deliuered an army enſloved and beſieged within a Towne or Citie, or when a camp was ſtrictly enuirowed. So that by ſuch a worthy deede of armes, the place or people accounted themſelves to bee deliuered from death, or mercileſſe imprifonment: for no other action whatſoeuer, was this honor & reſpect to be giuen. The crown was made of greene leaues, for they cared not to haue it made of Golde, or other mettall, but of the graſſe and hearbes of the ſame field, where the enemich had bin ouerthrowne or forced to flight. With this Crown was crowned the Great Quintus Fabius, becauſe when Hannibal was before Rome, hee defended and deliuered it from his beſieging. Emilius Scipio, was alſo crowned therewith in Africa, for hauing deliuered the Conſull Manlius, with certaine bands. Calpurnius obtrayned it alſo in Sicily; and ſo did the valiant L. Cincinatus Dentatus, and ſome other.

Corona Ciuiſis, or the Citizen crowne, was made of Oaken leaues and branches, with the fruite or Acornes hanging on it. This was giuen to him that had ſaued a Citizen, when his life was in extreame perill, killing his enemy, & making good the place where the danger hapned. This crown was ſo much made account of, that ſometimes it fell to ſuch a mans Honour, who for ſauing one Roman citizen, at his deliuerance ſlew two of his enemies. But becauſe he defended not and made good the place from ſuture perill, doubt was made, whether he had defended this Citizen Crowne, or no. Neuertheleſſe, Law was diſpenſed withall, and it was concluded to be giuen him, ſeeing hee had deliuered the Citizen, and ſlaine two of his enemies in a place ſo perillous, which was not in his power ſtill to protect, although the Law imported ſo much. And albeit a man had deliuered a King, or a Capitaine of confederates and friends, yet could hee not haue his crowne to reward him, except hee had deliuered a Roman. I find that Pliny recordeth, that this very ſame crown had bene giuen to one, who ſlew the firſt enemy that mounted on the wals of a City or Fortreſſe, being defended by or for the Romans.

This Corona Ciuiſis, was the moſt excellent, next vnto the Obſidionalis, and might dayly be worne, and in all places. Likewiſe, he that deſerued this Crowne, was of ſuch account and eſteeme, as hee might ſit in the Theater, or at Feaſtes, where hee had alwayes his place neereſt vnto the Senate. And when hee entered, the Senate would riſe vpon their ſeate, to do him honor.

He ſtood alſo free and exempt from any Office or charge whatſoeuer, except his pleaſure was to accept it: and moreover, for his ſake, and in regard of him, his Father and Grandfather (if they were living) ſtood exempted alſo. Many Romans obtained to weare this Crowne, & eſpecially the moſt valiant Cincinatus Dentatus named before, who wonne fourteene of them. The ſecond Capitolinus had fixe; and to Cicero, by particular diſpenſation, one of them was granted, becauſe he had defended Rome from the conſpiracy of Catiline. Theſe Crownes, whereof wee haue made relation, although they were made but of Hearbes and Leaues, and might might more properly be called Garlands, or like to the French chapters of flowers: yet were they (notwithstanding) much more esteemed and renowned, then if they had beene of the finest gold.

The reputation and eſteeme of this citizen Crowne.

What Romans had the honor to weare this Crowne.

As for the Murall Crowne, called Corona Muralis, it was of golde, and given to him that had assaulted and ascended the walls of a city, or a castle, mounting first vp the scaling Ladder, and both freeing and defending the walles, which caused, that the Crowne was made in forme of an imbatelled wall. The first (according to Pliny) that obtained this crowne, was Manlius Capitolinus. Scipio also gaue it to Quintus Trebellius, and Sextus Diguitus; because that they (both together) wonne first the enemies wall, before any other.

Corona Castrensis, sine Vallaris, was giuen to him that (in the fight) entred first into the Barriers, Railes, or Listes of the enemies Campe, comming off againe with credite and reputation: this Crowne also was made of gold, and shaped according to Bastions and Rampires of a field for warre.

Of the like mettall was the Nauall Crowne, Corona Naualis, which was bestowed on the man, that first (in fight at Sea) boarded and entred an enemies shippe: and it was in the shape of the prow or poynt of a ship. Marcius Varro made no disdaine of this Crowne, when it was offered vnto him by great Pompey, in the war against the Pirates. Octavianus presented it also to Marcus Agrippa, and to Sylla: many other likewise had the honor thereof, wherof now I omit to speak.

When any Souldier of Rome, were noble or ignoble, had made any proefe of his bodie, were it at the course of Launce, or in single combat: the Romaine Captaines or Generals were wont to giue him or them collers or chaines of gold and silver, or bracelets, or girdles, accordingly as they had deserued, with other priuileges and preheminences. And such prizes they might giue to his friends, that had assisted them in the war: but as for the Crownes, they were reserued only for Romaines. Of all which things wee finde many notable examples in the Romaine histories.

Suetonius writeth, that Octavius permitted to Marcus Agrippa: that he might bear a Banner of Azure colour: in regard of a victory which hee had obtaigned at Sea, against Sexsus Pompeius. He further affirmeth, that it was he who deuised first the gifts of Collers and Flagon chaines, with other particular presents beside, allowed only in such affaires, which would require too long a space heere to report.

And heere it is well worth the remembering, that the Romaines were so valiant, that some one man hath wonne the honour of all these rewards, or the greater part of them. For Pliny and Solinus doe name such men, amongst other Marcus Sergius, who obtained the most part of them. And in the warre at Thrasymenus and Trobia, where the Romaines were vanquished by Hanniball, he wonne the crown called Corona Ciuias, as also in the overthrow at Cannas. This man was so valiant, that hauing lost his right hand in the battell, he shewed great valor with the left, and by meanes of a Steele hand made him, in steed of the other lost, he foyled and slew 4. men in one day in the field of Batell each after other: in which braue day of fight, and others beside, he receiued 23 wounds, & al in the fore part of his body.

Yet notwithstanding, neither this Marcus Sergius, nor any other beside, did ever deserue and attaine to so much as Lucius Cincinnatus Dentatus, Tribune of the people, of whom we spake alittle before. Of him write Plinie, Solinus, Valerius Maximus, and Aulus Gellius, affirming, that in jewells and presents of price, some greater then other, he obtained only by actions of Armes, 320. and more. Beside, that he entred Rome with 9. seuerall Generals, when they performed their solemne triumphs, & whom he had assisted in their victories. He had a great number of Brooke Spears, shiuerd Lances, shafts of Laurelins, pikes without heads of Steele, giuen to him as signalls of honour. He had 18. collers and gold chaines; 83. of silver: Of armors and furnitures for horses fitting war seruice, and thereunto particularly appoynted, hee had five and twenty: an hundred and fortie bracelets; eight Castrenses; three Murales, one Elidionale, and I know not how many Nauall. In seuerall fought battailes, hee had taken five and fourtie wounds, all of them before vpon his bodie; and no more then one only behind, and thirty foure times hee had disarmed and dispoyled the enemy, hauing personally bin present in fixe score encamped battells. Nay, he was so valiant and fortunate in Armes, that hee was surnamed the Romaine Achilles: and although his performances may seeme to the world incredible; yet notwithstanding the multitude and conformitie of histories doe aouuch them.

The Romaines, for famous actions in Armes, conceded (beside) other honours and preheminences, as power of publique iudgements, and sitting in the chaire of Curules, which was the seate of the Adies and Prator, and which was permitted to Scipio. Sometimes also there they gaue consent, for the greatest authorities of Souldiers, according as they were suffered by the people to doe: concerning a degree or state, submitted to the libertie of the Patriotes and people.

Captaines likewise were permitted to erect triumphall Statues, and to decke and cloathe themselves, euen as if they had bene Consuls. The Senate granted (by forme of salary and congratulation) that they might place in Temples, the armes and spoiles of enemies conquered by the in battels: and such things were rearmd Mannibz, as much to say, as spoyles and booties taken from an enemy.

Furthermore, the Romaines had a commendable custome, concerning such as had bene slayne in their warres; that their children should haue and enioy the like wages, as they gaue vnto their fathers liuing. And to olde Souldiers, that had long time followed the wars; such good allowance of land, as they might well and easily liue thereon. Suffering them also to dwell in Cities, Townes, and Provinces conquered and subiected, where themselves pleased to make election. In this manner the Citie of Smill was made a Colony for Rome by Caesar: which Colonies (according to the common French saying) may be rearmd a new dwelling, or transmigration of people. In briefe, the Romaines neuer left a good action vnrequited, nor without some great priuiledge: for the which cause, more valiant men were found among them, then in all other nations beside.

I spare to speake of many other requittals, which the Romaines vsed in respect of Armes, thinking already I haue sayde enough. Notwithstanding, it is a matter most certaine, that as they excelled all Nations, in both acknowledging and rewarding honest seruices: so they came not a iote behinde vs, in teaching and correcting where occasion required. For when men were not to bee moued by rewarding honest seruices: or by necessity and gaine, to doe what was good; yet they were compell'd to doe no vile thing, both in respect of shame, and feare of punishment. For the paines were great and rigorous against such as shewed themselves to be slothfull and negligent: because when they lost honour, being called thereto, and might by their owne indeuour haue had it; they were well and soundly whipt, till the blood followed. Some were manacled with yrons like slaues; and if they fled away, and forsooke their Captaines in battaile, they were impaled or spitted on stakes, or else crucified: for, answerable to the delict, so was their punishment.

Titus Livius writeth, that the Souldiours of a Squadron, belonging to Appian Claudius, to whom the keeping of a place was giuen in charge; forsooke and lost it. He being desirous to inflict punishment, and yet to mixe it with mercie: they were selected by numbers of tenne, and then to cast lottes, and they on whom the lot fell, were put to death for all the rest. Iulius Frontinus sayth, that Marke Anthony did the very like to a band, which had not defended the rampires, but suffered the enemies to set fire on them. Other inflictions also he imposed vpon Souldiours, for disobedience and other offences, requiring more time then I am permitted. Wherefore I will shap my conclusion thus onlie, that as those times wanted not remunerations and honours for well doing; so, they were as forward in correcting wicked and bad actions.

CHAP. XLIII.

¶ Of the reason wherefore Sleep was granted and giuen to man: And likewise, that too much sleep is vicious and hurtfull.

Sleepe was naturally giuen to man for his conseruation; because there is not any naturall worke, but it hath neede of rest and repose. Aristotle sayth, Every creature that hath blood, sleepe: and there he proneth by good reason, and likewise by experience, that fishes doe sleepe. Sleepe is a repose of all the senses, and proceedeth from the fumes and euaporations, which (in regarde of foode receiued) arise from the stomacke to the braine, by the coldnesse whereof, the hot vapours are tempered, and make the exteriour motions and senses sleepey: then retryng the vitall spirits to the heart, all the members become drowlie, and rest from their trauaile, vntill such time as the vitall spirit (which is the instrument whereby the soule frameth her operations, gouerning and commanding the whole body) both recouer new forces, and ceassing ordiminishing those vapours, man awaketh from sleepe, and then the senses and powers returne more freshly, with farre greater power to their operations.

Concerning the occasions of sleepe, Aristotle discoumeth at large in his Booke of Sleepe and Vigilance: and Plutarke declareth diuers opinions of the Philosophers, beside sundry naturalists. But although it is for the rest and health of the body, yet it must be taken moderately; because long sleepe (saith Aristotle) weakeneth the naturall and animall spirit, euen as the moderation thereof doth giue them vigour: for many things are necessarie, which neuertheless are hurtfull, if they be receiued excessively. Foode is both needefull and sauourie, and yet notwithstanding, if it exceede measure, it harmeth, and hath no rellish at all. In like manner, moderate trauaile is wholesome; but vied with extremity nothing is more damageable. And so I say of sleepe, that it should not be taken but vpon necessitie, for recreation and repose of the senses, the spirits and members of the body.

Too much sleepe is very dangerous.

All things are to be vied with in moderation and correction.

ouer-much Sleepe (as it ouer-lodeth the members and senses, making them slouthfull, and enfeebling them by idleness) so it ingendreth so many humidities in the bodie, that they make it sicke, and killeth it, because in the time of sleepe, all the moistures of the bodie (with the naturall heate) retire themselves to the exteriour partes, and then they make no euacuation of the superfluities and humidities thereof. Also, sleepe immeasurably vied, not onely is prohibited by naturall Philosophers and Phisitions; but likewise it is reprooued by all wise men of vnderstanding. Aristotle sayth, During the time of sleepe, there is no difference betweene the wise man and the foole. And questionlesse, although a wife man had not any other occasion to make little vied of sleepe, but for equalling himselfe with a forthright Idiot; yet hee should auoyd and shunne the excesse (though sleepe maintaineth life, and is very wholesome) in considering with his best cogitations, that he which sleepe, is not liuing. And as Plutarke sayth in his Booke of the contention betweene fire & water: The man that sleepe hath no more strength or knowledge in his sleeping, then if hee were dead. Pliny is of the same opinion, saying; Sleepe taketh from vs the halfe part of our life, considering, while we are in sleepe, we neither know nor feele, whether wee are liuing or no. Ouid, and other Poets beside, with men of no mean learning, do call sleepe, The similitude of death.

Saint Paul, in the fourth chapter of his first Epistle to the Thessalonians sayth, Brethren, I would not haue you ignorant, concerning them that are asleepe: in speaking these words, hee plainly meaneth death. Then it followeth thus: Such as sleepe in Iesus Christ, will God bring with him. Sleepe likewise is the resemblance of negligence and slouthfulness, according to Saint Gregorie, who saith; For a man to sleepe, is to keep himselfe and persecute in his finnes. If sleepe thus had not bene vnderstood to sinne, Saint Paul would neuer haue sayd so many times: Awake ye now, and sinne no more. A man then may very very well shame, to spend the most part of his life sleeping in his bed; for therein he sinneth no lesse then he that sitteth all day at a Table feeding: in regarde, that these things ought not to be taken, but for the sustentation of life, and not the hurt thereof, and of the soule also; wherefore sleepe is allowed for sustentance, and not for voluptuousnesse.

Seeing then it should bee employed onely for the health of the bodie; let vs now vnderstand, after what maner a man should lie in his bed for Sleep, to the end it may be profitable to him. I reade, that the most profitable kinde of sleeping for any well disposed person, is first to beginne sleepe vpon his right side; and afterward (for the most part of the night) to turne and rest vpon his left side; and in the ending of his sleepe, to turne a while on the right side againe. The reason is, because the stomacke of a man is seated in such sort, that the mouth thereof leaneth somewhat more to the right side then to the left; but the hollow heart or botome thereof, declineth a little toward the left side. So that by lying down to sleepe (for an houre or two) on the right side, the stomacke extendeth it selfe and resteth vpon the liuer. And hence ensueth two especiall commodities; the first, that the stomacke ordereth it selfe, and in that preparation, the foode descendeth downe the more easily: the second, that the humidity of the meate receiued, refresheth the liuer, and by that refreshing, naturall heate taketh strength in the stomacke, to beginne and cause digestion.

After that these two good effects haue followed one another, then it shall be fitting to turne vpon the other side, because by being so turned, the liuer cometh and couereth the stomacke, and embraceth it euen with wings, (as it were) so that his foode retaineth more to the liuer, and thereby perfecteth digestion. Neuertheless, it is good in the morning, for a final consummation of that times sleepe, to turne againe vpon the right side, to the end that the stomacke may beginne to eate and discharge the liuer, and likewise to expell the ayre or superfluitie of the passed digestion. This rule is good, and will bee well acknowledged by him that hath a qualified liuer, and his stomacke not cold, but that at these two members are found and temperate in him. But he that hath an ouer-hot liuer, and a cold stomacke, as many times it cometh so to passe: it is not good for him to sleepe vpon the right side, because the stomacke falling vpon the liuer, straineth and pretheth it in every part, heating and enflaming it excessively, so that the vpper part of the stomacke continueth vncouered by the superiour part, cooling and weakening it more and more; whereby the very greatest heate of the liuer carrieth and beareth vpon it, all the little left in the stomacke before, whence ensueth bad digestion, and consequently a sickly disposition. Wherefore the man that hath a cold stomacke, and a hote liuer, it is not wholesome for him to sleep on his left side; because the stomacke being wholly couered with the liuer, it maketh digestion; and as for the liuer, lying so aloft vpon the superior part, it is both discoloured and discharged, and by that meanes refresheth it selfe, and is not enflamed at all.

There are some also, that make a custome of sleeping on their belly, which helpeth and comforteth digestion, because it assembleth and retaineth naturall heate in the stomackall part, which is in the better disposition for euacuating superfluities. The contrary cometh to such as sleepe on their backe, with the face openly discouered: in regarde that naturall heate extendeth it selfe abroad, by which meanes digestion is weakened, and the superfluities can not be purged by the mouth, nor by the ordinarie conduites and passages: but remaine in the breast and in the throat, which oftentimes causeth stuffings and suffocations, with Epilepsies and other infirmities.

The wife therefore doe also counsell and aduise, that a man should not sleepe too much stretch out in his bed, because thereby digestion is greatly weakened and impaired: for according to the Philosophers rule; when the vertues and forces are vnited together, the operation is so much the better. But being moderately and indifferently heaped or doubled, the carnositie which couereth the stomacke, ioyne the more closely to it, heating and strengthening it better then before. These rules whereof I haue spoken, are necessanecessary for such as bee dainty and delicate, and those of weaker disposition, but that be healthfull, lusty, and able, the best rule that they can observe, is to keepe the custome which they haue bene most vsed to.

CHAP. XLIII.

Of an ancient use and custome in Spaine, in making their account of times, by these words Here de Cæsar: What that Here is, and wherefore, and when the use thereof was left.

In ancient times they had a custome in Castile, when-soeuer they dated writings & instruments of reckoning or worth; they wrote downe the words of Here de Cæsar, in such sort as we set downe the yeare of Grace, or of our Lord God, and the same stile was obserued in Chronicles and Histories, as hath bene obserued by many diligent Readers. And although this matter hath bin seene and discoursed by many, yet few people haue vnderstood the occasion and originall of this vie, neyther wherefore the word is termed Here.

In mine opinion, there may bee two good reasons rendred. The first, that this word Here was written with an aspiration, and so haue I found it in some places of the Spanish History; although in some other it is not so. But being so, we say, that it cometh of the Latine word Herus, which is as much to say, as Lord: and thereby it followeth, that Here may be vnderstood for Lordship, Soueraignty, Monarchy, or Reigne and Dominion: and that Here de Cæsar, implyeth the Monarchy of Cæsar, that is to say, the beginning of Monarchy, which is vnderstood of Octavius. Of this opinion is Antonius Neriensis, for in his vocabulary for the Spanish Language, he saith; Here de Cæsar, is namely the Monarchy of Cæsar.

Altrelogers in their accounts, and especially king Alphonso in his Tablets, nameth the beginning of reignes by the word Here: as that of Philip, that of Alexander, that of Nabuchodonosor, that of Cæsar, and many other. And yet notwithstanding, although this may seeme to bee a case cleare and euident, yet there is a kinde of difficulty wherein it is expedient to yeeld satisfaction. To wit, that as Ensebius, Paulus Orosius, and diuers other writ, Christ was borne in the 42 yeare of the Empire of Octavius: if it be so, it appeareth that Here should anticipate the 42 yeares of Christs Natiuity, in regard that it hath respect to the beginning of Cæsars Empire, according to due consideration. Neurtherlesse, it anticipateth but of thirty eight yeares, according to king Alphonso his setting downe: wherefore the Text hath not sayed, for euermore Here de Cæsar, preceded the birth of Christ thirty eight yeares.

I vnderstand this to ensue from Ensebius, Orosius, and all the rest, who naming the birth of Christ, to bee in the two and fortieth yeare of the Empire of Octavius, begin their account of his Empire, at the first day of his entring Rome, soone after the death of his vnkle Julius Cæsar, where he arriuing, was made Capitaine with the Consuls Hirtius & Pompeius, against Mark Anthony.

In setting downe the account of time so, and not otherwise, the birth of Christ cometh iustly to bee in the two and fortieth yeare of his Empire: notwithstanding, they that make their account by Here, leave out foure yeares at the beginning. And it seemeth they had good reason so to doe, because in those 4 first yeares, Octavius held no command in Rome, neyther had the gouernment without resistance: for at the entring of those foure yeares, he had warre against Marke Anthony. Then going afterward to Rome with his troopes, he had the Consulship perforce, in the place of Hirtius, he being dead at his coming.

When these things were done, hee made an accord & conuention with Mark Anthony and Lepidus, where they became all three (one after another) to gouerne for a certaine time, and made the cruell proscription, whereby they did put to death diuers of the principall men in Rome. Moreover, he and Marke Anthony passed into Greece, in persecution of the murderers of Cæsar, where they fought a battaile against Brutus and Cassius: after whose death death and discomfiture, he left Mark Anthony in those Easterne parts, and returned into Italy, where he opposed himselfe against Lucius Antonius, the brother vnto Marke Anthony, and besiedged him in Perusia, confining him to yeelde to his mercy. Thus hauing vanquished and expelled all his enemies, hee came (without any contradiction) to Rome, to gouerne Italy, France, Spaine, and Germany: for Lepidus was in Africa, and Marke Anthony in Asia; therefore his entrance and Seignury, was foure yeares after his coming from Greece.

In regard whereof, the account of Here and Monarchy, beginneth (by good reason) there, which is thirty eight yeares before the birth of Christ: so that Ensebius, Orosius, and all the rest, who set downe the birth to bee in the two and fortieth yeare of Octavius his Empire, doe begin their reckoning, from the day that Julius Cæsar was slaine, he being his Vnkle. And this is prooued apparantly, because it appeareth by all histories, that Julius Cæsar was slaine in the yeare seuen hundred and ten, from the foundation of Rome: & our Lord was borne in the yeare seuen hundred and fifty two, whereby there is a distance of two and forty yeares, all which are granted to the empire of Octavius. In like manner, according to Ensebius, Julius Cæsar was slaine in the yeare of the worlds creation, five thousand, one hundred, fifty seven: and our Lord (after the same Ensebius) was borne in the yeare five thousand, one hundred, ninety nine, wherein there is a difference each from other, of the same two and forty yeares.

If we come to account by Olympiades, Julius Cæsar was slaine in the second yeare of the 164 Olympiades; and Christ was borne in the third yeare of the 194. Inclusive; which is also the same difference of two and forty yeares: in which respect, they set the empire of Octavius, two and forty yeares before the Natiuity.

Albeit his true empire began four yeares after the time when his Here had originall, and thirty eight yeares before the Natiuity: for during those foure yeares, hee was no Lord nor Commander, as all the Roman Histories do approve. Plutarch, Appian, Dion, Suetonius, and more then all the rest, Titus Linius, or to speake better, Lucius Florus saith, That Octavius coming to Rome, when his Vnkle was slaine, was but eigheteene yeares of age, and was Consul at nineteene. Then the warres being past, and all his enemies vanquished, he returned victoriously to Rome, & Antonius confined him to the three and twenty of his age. So that by this account, and likewise that of Titus Linius, the empire of Octavius began foure yeares after the death of his Vnkle Julius Cæsar, which agreeeth with the account of Here, thirty eight yeares before the Natiuity.

Some others doe allow of another reason or opinion, concerning this Here, by writing it with a diphthong E, without aspiration, and they say it is deniued of the Latine word Aera, for come or money, Aera constata, and that it had originall, from the beginning of taxes or tribute money, which was payed to Octavius, and called Aere, or the tribute of Cæsar, and not the empire of Cæsar, and that it was termed Aera Aere. It is further affirmed, that it was the name of a coyne or money, which was reckoned at a certaine value, and that from the time that was ordered and imposed, so they numbred and counted the Aere. Saint Isidore is of this opinion, speaking thus. Aera singulorum annorum constituta est a Cæsare Augusto, quando primo censu excogitabo Romanorum orbem descripsit. Dicta autem Aera, quod omnis orbis as reddere professus est reipublice. Therefore it appeareth plainly, that this manner of account, came and receiued name of his money and tribute then payed. So hee auoucheth in the chapter following, in speaking of the Quinquenniall yeares, where hee saith: Ad hoc enim Consules, ad hoc Aera narrant. In like manner it seemeth, that Ambrosius Calepinus, in his Dictionary gaue this diction such originall, saying. Astrologia quoque initium, a quo supputationes incipiunt, Aeram vocant: dicta Aera ex eo, quod omnis orbis as reddere professus est reipublice.

Fryer Alphonso, of the Order of S. Dominick, in his Eucheridion of times, hath these very words, Another beginning came of accounting by the Aere of the same Octavius, who hauing the whole world in his hand, would know what people he had vnder his Empire: and therefore commanded by Edict, that every one should be registered in the towne of his birth, to the end they might giue him him (in signe of Seignury or dominion) a kinde of money: and because this money was of metall, the description thereof was named Aera. So that (according to these Authors) this manner of numbring the years by Here, came from the tribute which they payed, and it was so written in Latine, Aera.

Notwithstanding, there remaineth yet another difficulty, of no meane importance, to wit, it seemeth that the Edict of Cæsar began not so long time before the Natiuity, as the thirty eight yeares which they count of the Here. Also it appeareth by the second chapter of S. Luke, that it began in the yeare when our Lord was borne, because he saith Exst. Edictum à Cæsare: There came out a decree from Augustus Cæsar, and therefore the beginning accordeth not with that of Here. VVherevnto (in mine opinion) answer may be made, that on the hither side of the East parts, to wit, those of Italy, France, and Spaine, this Edict might be begun by the commandment of Octavius, when hee had bene entailed Lord and Emperor peaceably in Rome, which was thirty eight yeares before Iesus Christ was borne: but in Assyria and Iudea it was not then made knowne, because the Prouinces remained vnder the gouernment of Mark Anthony, vntill they came vnder the Monarchy of Cæsar, nd there is no contradiction to be found, but that eight and thirty yeares (before) he gouerned France and Spaine, and measurably impatronizing himselfe to be accordingly published. VVherefore it might so come to passe, that the first which was made knowne in those Countries, was that whereof S. Luke speaketh, and yet neuertheless, there were other Countries and Prouinces, where that Here had receiued beginning before.

Venerable Beda sheweth this clearly, writing vpon the same chapter of S. Luke, expounding the words, Et describetur vniuersus orbis, he saith thus. Signant hanc descriptionem, vel primam esse harum, quia totum orbem concluderint, quia perque iam parte terrarum leguntur fuisse descripta. It seemeth this description, to bee the first that was vniuersall to the whole world; because before it, many Citties and Townes in particular, had bene described or set downe. S. Ambrose affirmeth as much vpon the saide chapter of Luke, saying: There were found many other Lands and Prouinces, which had bene registred downe. Lucius Florus, in his abreuiation of 133. Bookes of Titus Linius, writeth: That Cæsar, some after hee had vanquished Marke Anthony, imposed a tribute vpon all France, which was little lesse then thirty yeares before Christ was borne.

But whether the cause arose by the first reason, of tearming it by the name of Here, or by the last; it is sufficient that it began eight and thirty yeares before the Natiuity. This custome of accounting by Here is very ancient, especially in Spaine, as also among the Arabes and Sarracenes, and I think that the Gothes afterward vsed it, and it was not left so long as the Romans reigne endured. Isidore, in writing of the Gothes, and of this Here, approueth it to be ancient. And although I cannot directly say, when it began, yet I know well enough, that it hath bene long time vsed in Spaine, as appeareth by the Spanish Chronicles, euen vntill John the first, King of Spaine (who lost the battaile of Aluabarata in the fift yeare of his reigne) commanded, that from thence forward, the Here de Cæsar should no more be vsed in writings and histories, but the birth of Christ, which was in the yeare 1385; and in the Here de Cæsar, 3421.

The End of the Fourth Booke.

OF NOBILITY POLITICALL AND CIVILL.

THE FIFTH BOOKE.

Nobility, which many of the greater sorts of wits, with great prooffe of vn-corrupted verity, & much flowing Eloquence, haue gone about to deriue out of diuers foundations, is of three sorts: and is diuided into Nobility Cæstially, which consisteth in Religion: Nobility Philosophicall, which is got by Morall vertues: and Nobility politically, whereof this present Treatise is. Out of the two first sorts of Nobility, no man can come Noble, except that he the same, be a good man also. But out of this third sort, a man, although he bee neuer so wicked and vngracious, may yet excell the rest of men, euen in the highest degree of Nobility: so as did Caligula, Nero, and such others like.

The matter of Nobility, was in ancient time accounted of two sorts, viz. Theological and Morall: For why, Nobility is a thing honourable, and of it selfe laudable: But without vertue, nothing (according to the opinion of Cicero) can be commendable, or praise-worthy. Of which thing, the feate and situation of the Temple of Honour among the Romans, was a notable example: whereunto there was no entrance or way, but by the Temple of vertue.

But by the preposterous innouation and change of things, that Nobility which was proper onely to the good, gaue place, and in stead thereof, that Nobility which is alike common vnto the bad and to the good, slept to the helme: yea, euen the word Nobilis (or Noble) it selfe, which some will haue to haue bene so called, as who should say, Nobilitas, or remarkable, or for some vertue notable, began to be indifferently taken into both parts, good & bad: as nobile Scortum, a noble harlot: nobile Scelus, a noble villaine. Neyther in question of Political Nobility, are we any more to haue recourse vnto the Diuines or Philosophers, and much lesse to the ancient Romane Constitutions (for the most part) discerning all things by Magistracies, Charges, and Offices, but onely vnto the dispositions of the Princes and Monarchs of the world: who hauing the power of the gouernement of the world (as it were in a sort common together with God) after their manner, gouerne Nobility according to their owne pleasure and good liking, and so haue made the same hereditary. And hereof is it, that a stranger, made a Nobleman at Rome, or else where, is not at home accounted in the number of the Nobility, his Prince being thereto vnwilling, and so contrariwise also. VVherefore, they which examine Politicall Nobility, according to any other rule, then the custome of euery Nation, are vtterly out of the way. Yet in this so great diuerty of manners and customes of Nations in all places, the same Definition of Civill Nobility agreeth vnto them all, viz. Quod sit qualitas, siue Dignitas qua quis legitime à Plebeia conditione eximitur &

Politically Nobility could not be bad as to the good.

In question of Political Nobility, we are not to haue recourse vnto Diuines, or Philosophers.

Political Nobility is not to be taken for a quality, but for a condition, as the Romans called it.

Of this Nobility, there be two kinds, viz. Nobility Nature; that is to say, by birth: and Dative, which is by the Princes gift. For as for violent Nobility, such as was that of Nemrods, I utterly reject it.

But that these things may be made more manifest, we will by certain of the better Common-weales, even vnto these our times, derive the beginning of this dignity, and the manner of obtaining the same, as it were euen from the first infancy thereof, taking both the matter & the examples we therein vse, out of most authentical and approved Authors, the sentences almost nothing, and much lesse the words, much changed, so that the well affected Reader, cannot of right, lay any thing thereof to our charge.

began to be Nature.

IDare contrary vnto the common received opinion affirme, nobility Dative to haue bin before, & more excellent then Nobility Nature, exaple being taken frō Adam himselfe, whom all men know to haue bene made, and not borne: and verily to haue bene a Noble-man (if any other) as formed by God to the Image of himselfe, endowed with all good gifts, and made Lord and Soueraigne Ruler of all creatures; yea, euen of the whole world. But that celestiall Nobility he soone (alas, too soone) lost, by hearkning vnto his wife: and that worldly Nobility which he yet retained, being vnto his children deriued, began first in them to be Nature, or Nobility by birth. If any man therefore consider Adam his owne race and Progeny, he must needs confesse all the men of that age, to haue bene together Noble. But as in mans body for the preseruatiō of the whole, diuers functions, and offices of members, are required; euen so, in that first sociey of men (as in all others) a distinction of persons was necessary: wherefore the first Common-weale, which was of the family of Adam, and of his children, consisted wholly of Noblemen (to wit) of the children of one Father, and he the same, being a King, a Prophet, and a Priest; but yet not all of them to be with like honour reuerenced. For he, that first Housholder as it were by the decree of Nature, gaue the preheminance and cheefe place vnto his first begotten Sonne, so long as hee kept the right of his Birth-right, which order other families. Afterward following, constantly obserued: so that he which was first by Nature, should be accounted also first in honour. Yet neuerthelesse, was it altogether lawfull for the Father of the family, to make choise of his own children, that so according to euey one of their desarts, he might bestow vpon them honours, or take them from them.

Of the great number of Adams Progeny, & the discord of the Brethren among themselves, at length arose the diuision of Families, and so consequently, the vncertainty and forgetfulness of kindreds, and deadly hatreds and fallings out withall. By warre, the change of mens estates and conditions, and seruitudes are brought in. The vanquished, of Noble become base and vnnoble: & contrariwise, the victors, of base persons, became Noble. Men for the preseruatiō of themselves, haue out of families assembled together into Villages; out of Villages, into Cities; and out of Cities haue growne together into Prouinces, and so into most great kingdoms. In dangers and distresses, according to the rule of reason, wise men are called vpon for their counsel, valiant men for their aide and defence, vnto whom, as vnto men most worthy, the government is committed; whereas the rest are enforced without difference, to obey without any respect of their stocke or kindred.

These things to haue thus bene in the Iewes State and Common-weale, is vnto all men knowne, which are but easily read in the old Testament. First, that Principality and prerogatiue, was giuen vnto the first begotten, you shall easily vnderstand, if you shall diligently consider, that when Adam by reason of his great yeares, was not able longer to attend to the government of the church, and of the common-weale,

weale, Seth was made Governor, who then held the place of the first begotten. Vnto Seth euen for the same cause succeeded Eben: vnto Enoch, Conan: vnto Conan, Mahabel: vnto Mahabel, Iered: vnto Iered, Canoe: vnto Canoe, Metubusel, vnto Metubusel, Lamech: vnto Lamech, Noah: who ruled ouer his Progeny an hundred & ten yeares after the Deluge; at which time, the dispersing of his posterity happened. Which dispersiō being made, euey one of them bare himselfe as Prince of his owne family, which preheminance passed still vnto the first borne of that stocke and family: so that the first begotten of the principall family, still held the same. Neither ought any man to doubt euey one of the Patriarkes to haue ruled as cheefe men ouer their owne Tribes and Families vntill that the government of the whole people was deliuered ouer to Moses. But concerning Moses himselfe, we reade in the fourth of Exodus, him and Aaron to haue gathered together all the Elders of the children of Israel, which was the first Assembly. In the 24. of Exodus, the Lord commandeth seauenty of the Elders of the children of Israel, to come vnto him, together with Moses: which seauenty (in the same chapter) are as it were by a knowne name called Nobles or cheefe Persons of the children of Israel. Moses beside, oppressed with the multitude of sutes, following the counsel, of Iethro, chose out of the people certain Captains of thousands which should beare rule ouer a thousand families: others of hundreds, who commanded ouer an hundred: others of fifties who had the command ouer fifty: and others of ten, who bare rule ouer ten, & determined of their lesser sutes and controversies. Now that there were many Captains of thousands, euen in one and the selfe-same Tribe, it is out of holy Scripture manifest; and these men, Moses here & there calleth, The Heads of the Fathers, the Heads of the Tribes, Princes, and Heads of the Soldiers; and amongst them were 12 cheefe Princes, especially chosen of the 12 Tribes, who sometimes were alone by themselves chosen out for some especial commission. But what manner of men Moses made Rulers ouer the Israelites, and what manner of companions he chose forth as assistants vnto himselfe in the government of the common-weale, he himselfe in the first chapter of Deuteronomy thus plainly witnesseth. And I spake vnto you the same season, saying, I am not able to beare the burden of you my selfe alone. For the Lord your God hath multiplied you: and behold, you are this day as the starres of heauen in number. &c. Bring (from among you) men of wisdom and of vnderstanding, & men knowne in your Tribes, that I may make them Rulers ouer you. And you answered me and said, that which thou hast said, it is good for vs to do. And so out of the Tribes I tooke the Captains (men of wisdom and experience) & made them Rulers ouer you. Captaines ouer thousands, and ouer hundreds, ouer fifties, & ouer tens, & Officers among your Tribes, &c. But wee ended both by the weight of the words, and by reason, are enforced to cōiecture, Moses being a wise man, in this election and choise, to haue preferred men for their wisdom & experience famous and well knowne, both for the gaining of the fauour and obedience of the people, and also for the better government of the common-weale: neyther to haue any thing regarded such, as boasted only of the prerogatiue of their birth; for otherwise, instead of helpers, he should rather haue associated vnto himselfe, the perturbours of the publike peace. Wherefore we set downe those seauenty Iudges by the commandment of God, appointed by Moses to haue bin of the dignity of Senators, vnto who some men adde two moe, viz. Moses himselfe, and the High-Priest, as if that six had bin appointed out of euey one of the twelue Tribes.

Wherefore, by those things which we haue now already spoken, it is euident, as well Dative as Nature Nobility, to haue bin in vse amongst the Israelites, & sometime euen in one and the same family, to haue passed vnto the first begotten alone, or to some other graced with some publike Office in some family, whilst the rest borne of the same stock, in the mean time stucke fast within the bounds of them of the vulgar state and condition. And concerning the kings of the Israelites, it is to be thought also, as it is of the kings of other nations, that they according to their pleasure, ennobled many, euey by reason, or by affection moued and induced so to do. But let vs now from the Iewes, passe ouer vnto the Gentiles.

¶ Of the first Greeke Nobility.

Nothing was euer more vnconſtant the Greeke Common-weale, with perpetuall changes ſtill floating vp & down. The beginning of their Monarchy, I (as moſt are wont) will no further fetch, then from Cecrops. He firſt called the rude Athenians out of the fields, into a ciuill ſociety, built twelue Townes, and diuided the Citizens of them into Souldiers, Artiſcers, Huſbandmen, and Shepheards. Every City had Magiſtrates of it owne, neyther did they but in times of great danger reſort vnto the King: yea many of them at times tooke vp Armes againſt their Kings. They which inhabite the Champaîne Country, were commanded by ſome few. The Mountiniers were governed by a popular eſtate, and they which dwelt by the Sea-coaſt, had a mixt gouernement, in a meane betwixt both. And they which out of the whole body of the people, were called vnto the gouernement of the Common-weale, were honored for Princes, Senators and Noblemen. Plutarch writeth, ſuch men as were of greateſt power in the Cities, to haue bene thruſt out by Theſeus, that hee himſelfe might ſo alone raigne, yet diuided he the people into Senatours, Huſbandmen, and Artiſcers: of whom hee would haue them of the firſt ranke, to excell the reſt in dignity: them of the ſecond fort, to excell the reſt for neceſſary uſe; & them of the third, to exceede the reſt in multitude and number. But in the choiſe of the Senators, he had reſpect vnto their wealth, their learning, and eſpecially their vertue, which things were required alſo in the perſon of the King. For Demosthenes in his Oration againſt Nearſheweth, after the Common-weale ſet in order by Theſeus, neuertheleſſe by his hands ſtretched out, to haue appointed a King out of the number of the which were thought to excell in vertue. Vpon the Senators he impoſed the charge of bearing of Office, to conſider and determine of matters of Religion, to interpret and expound the Law and ſacred rights: and when he was deſirous more to encreaſe the City, hee called all men indifferently vnto an equal part of the Common-weale. Wherefore, in Theſeus his Gouernment, Nobility was gotten by riches, knowledge, and vertue. After the Kings, there was in the City a double Democratie, one which conſiſted in the power and gouernment of the richer ſort of the Citizens; and another, which reſted in them all in generall which were free-men. Solon (the diſcord betwixt the common ſort, and them of the richer ſort of the people being appeaſed) after the ſlaughter of the Cylonians, reſtored vnto his country, the Democratically or Popular gouernment, the Oligarchy or gouernment of ſome few, being quite taken away. He deuifed foure orders or degrees of Citizens: Them, which could of their dry & wet commodities, fill five hundred of their meaſures (called Medij) hee placed in the firſt order or degree. Them which could fill foure hundred of thoſe meaſures, hee placed in the ſecond ranke. Them which could fill three hundred, in the third, and al the reſt in the fourth. And called the firſt of theſe Modides, the ſecond Eguites, the third Zengia, and the fourth Leioi. All publicke Offices, he appointed to be committed to them, which were placed in the three firſt degrees, and they ſo hauing borne Office, were accouſted in the number of the Nobility, but vnto the fourth ranke was no publicke Office or Magiſtracy communicated; & therefore that ranke was altogether baſe and vnable. But after Solon, Aristides, and Pericles participated the Magiſtracies, euen vnto the baſeſt and loweſt ſort of the people alſo, as Xenophon in his Booke concerning the Athenian Commonweale, ſetteth it down for right and reaſon, that they, euen of the meaneſt and pooreſt ſort, ſhould indifferently be called & admitted vnto all preferments in euery part of the Common-weale, for that they more profited for the enriching of the City, then did they of the Nobility. Euen plaine Citizens, hauing well deſerued of the Commonweale, were therefore among the Athenians ennobled. So Leo, for that he for the welfare of the commonweale, had ſolemnly vowed his daughters to death, was accounted & regiſtered amongſt the ten Worthies. And Nobility once by the Father obtained, enno-ennobled his Children alſo.

But the Athenian commonweale was not ſo lauiſh & prodigall in the communicating of Nobility, as was in auncient time the Romaine Common-weale ſparing and curious in the beſtowing thereof. Wherefore this the Romaine State and Common-weale ſhall afford vnto vs greater ſtore and plenty of matter of this kinde and nature.

CHAP. IIII.

¶ Of the first Romaine Nobility.

Romulus to draw ſtrength vnto the city of Rome, but lately before by him built, ordaind an Aſylum or Sanctuary, where vnto the poore and baſe people out of Countries and places thereby by ſtockes reſorting, gaue the firſt encreaſe vnto ſo great a city. And out of this rabblement of people Romulus choſe an hundred Senatours, which by Inuencall the Sarycical Poet is in theſe verſes noted.

*Nil tam vni longi repetita, longis regulas

Then Romulus for their honor, would haue to be created, Fathers: and for their age, Senators, and both them and their progeny he appointed to be of the ranke of them that were of the Senatours diſcended. But afterward, the Common-weale being communicated alſo with the Sabines, he choſe out another hundred. Tarquinius Priſcus (or as ſome other rather would haue it) Brutus added vnto them another C. called the Senatours of the meaneſt ſort of the People. Valerius Publicola, after the Kings were driuen out, choſe threeſcore and foure more then an hundred, of the order of Gentlemen (in ſtead of ſo many Senators ſlaine by Tarquinius Superbus) which were called Adlecti, or men choſen: for after the kings drine out, ſuch as he ſaw to be wife, ancient, and of approved honeſty, he alcribed into the Senate, as into the moſt graue & reuerend Counſell. After thoſe firſt foundations of the Romaine Common-weale thus layd. Citizens of Rome diſcended of the ſtockes of Senators (who before had borne the chiefe and greateſt Honors) were by the Dictators, Cenſors, or Triumvirs, created Senators, and afterward alſo of the Order of Gentlemen were called into the Senate.

Wherefore, the Order of Patricij, and of the Senatours, to haue ennobled ſuch as were thereof, there was neuer any doubt; but concerning the order of Gentlemen, ſome there be, which make queſtion. Tiraquellus thinketh the Romaine Gentlemen to haue holden the middle place betwixt the Patricij (or them which were diſcended from Senatours) and the Plebeij or Common People: for that Tacitus calleth them Illuſtres, or men of marke. Martiall alſo calleth the Order of Gentlemen, the Leſſer Order and the Order of Senators; and of them that were diſcended of Senatours, the Greateſt Order.

Many are alſo of opinion, Nobilitie to haue beene giuen amongſt the Romaines, by the beſtowing vpon them Rings of Golde: and moſt certayne it is, ſuch gift of Rings to tranſfere the ſtate and condition of a Free-borne man vnto them to whom they were ſo giuen, without which free eſtate no Romaine was deemed capable of Nobility. But when the vie of rings of Golde began in Rome, it is not manifeſt. Pliny waiteth it of long to haue beene the Badge or Cogniſance of them which were about to goe Ambaſſadours vnto forraigne Nations, and the reſt of the Senators, to haue beene without them: neyther was it the manner and faſhion for any other to vie them, then ſuch as had for that cauſe publickly receyued them. And ſuch Golde rings they vſed onely abroad, and iron rings at home in their houſes.

But afterward, the cuſtome of wearing of Gold rings beganne to be vſed of all the Nobility, as it is written in Titus Livius in his ninth booke, in theſe words; The Senate to haue burnt with ſuch rage, and diſſaynce, becauſe Cneius Flautus a late freed man was made Adlectus, that many my of the Nobility thereupon, laid aside their gold Rings, and Trappings of their Horses: wherein Plinie witnesseth many to haue bene deceived, which thinke them of the order of Gentlemen to haue then done the same. For that (sayth hee) is also added: but the Trappings were also layde aside, for which the name of Gentlemen is put too. It is also recorded in the Annales, Rings to haue bene then layde aside by the Nobilitie, but nor by the whole Senate in generall. Whereby it is manifest, that the Gentlemen as then had no right to weare a Ring, and that it belonged but vnto the Nobilitie onlie; that is to say, vnto the Patricij, and the Senators, although they were not themselves Patricij; that is to say, descended of Senators, for that the dignity of a Senator gaue beginning to Nobilitie.

But after that Iudiciall causes were translated from the Senate vnto the Gentlemen, the vse of Rings together withall, passed vnto them also; which was not then so much the cognifiance of Gentlemen, as it was of Judges, and yet not of all them, but of them which were of greatest dignitie and honour. Rings (sayth Plinie) diuided the other Order from the vulgar People, as soone as they once beganne to be men of marke and fame, and afterward, But Rings verily put a middle and a third Order or Degree of men, betwixt the Common-people, and the Senators or Fathers: and that name which horses of seruice before gaue vnto men, this name (I say) the Judges now giue vnto money: neyther was that long agoe done: for Augustus the Emperour, disposing of the Courts, the greater part of the Judges wore Iron Rings, and they were not called Equites (or Gentlemen) but Iudices (or Judges.) The name of Equites (or Gentlemen) rested in the troops of publike horses. But afterward, in the ninth year of the reigne of Tiberius, when the Order of Gentlemen was come into an vnion (for so he termeth it) order was taken for the credite of the wearing of Rings, as that they should be vnto all Gentlemen common. And at length (sayth hee) when as Caius Sulpitius Galba going about to gaine the credite of a youthfull good name with his Prince, by the fines of Tauernes and Viſtalling (houses) had complained in the Senate,

euē Chapman and Pedlers to be defended from the penalty of such their misdemeanor, by the wearing of Rings; it was for this cause by the Senate decreed, that it should not bee lawfull for any man to wear a Ring, but vnto him who being free borne, both by his father and grand-father by the Fathers side, was valued at 40. Sesterces. And by the Law Fulvia concerning the Theater, to such as had place and did sit in one of the foureteen orders or degrees. Heereby it came to passe, that they seemed to be of the Order of Gentlemen, which did weare golde Rings, for that it was not lawfull for any so to doe, but such as had a Gentlemans substance. And therefore Suetonius writeth, Julius Caesar when as in exhorting of his Souldiers, he oftentimes shewed the finger of his left hand, and said, that he could willingly, for their sakes, be content to pluck off his owne Ring; to haue bene thought in so doing, contently to haue promised vnto euerie one of them, the right to weare a Golde Ring, and the substance of a Gentleman. But after that it was permitted to all Gentlemen indifferently to weare them, that marke (sayth Plinie) beganne to bee indifferently of all men desired: For before, Gentlemen and Judges were knowne by their Iron Rings; but at length, whilest the Order of Gentlemen is separated from the Free-borne-men, the wearing of Rings was communicated with them that were bond-men, and of seruile condition: that is to say, with such as were of bondmen and slaues, become free. Howbeit this right of wearing of gold Rings, was not wont in ancient time to be giuen to any other, but to such as had right manfully and valiantly behaved themselves in the wars; neither was the right of wearing of a gold Ring, euer giuen to such, as were of bond-men made free, except they were also made free-men borne, (which was in ancient time a Priuledge not to be granted but by the Prince.) And it was alwaies in ancient time, accounted a greater matter to be a freeman borne, then to be rewarded with the right to weare a gold Ring: For that sheweth vs euē from our birth to be freemen borne, whereas this right of wearing of a gold Ring, indeed, either blottes out, or as much as it can, washeth away the stains of seruitude; yet so as that the figure thereof for euer remaineth. But the creating or restoring of a man vnto Gen- tury, commeth nearer vnto Nature, which bringeth with it all the commodities of naturall Gentry, and that belonged onely vnto the Prince, to restore agayne a man banished or cast into exile, vnto his former estate and place: who being so restored vnto their bloud or birth-right, were not onely ingrafted into the number of the citizens of Rome, but also inrolled among the Quirites; that so, they might be partakers of all the honours and offices of the Common-weale. Therefore it is of Plinie called iux Quirium; that is to say, The right and Priuledge of the Quirites.

There was also among the Ancients, a certaine right of hauing of Images or Statues, which was by the Senate giuen vnto such, as had notably borne some great Office, or worthily deferred some great honours, which was not so much for the marke and signe of Nobilitie, as of the stocke and Family whereunto they were giuen. For, they which obtayned Statues for their stocke and family, there was no doubt, but that they thereunto brought Nobilitie also. And I know not what greater or more excellent thing there was, then to haue the right and power to vse Statues and Images.

Plinie in his nine and thirtie Booke thus writeth; Apud Maiores, Imagines in atrijs erant, qua spectarentur, expressis vultus singulis disponebantur armarijs, ut essent imagines qua comitarentur gentilijs funera, semperq; defuncto aliquo, totus aderat Familia eius qui vnuquam fuerat populis. Stemmata vero lineis discurrebant ad Imagines pictas. Tabula vero codicibus implebantur, & monumentis rerum & magistratuum gestorum. In the time of our Ancestours, Images and Statues were in their Courts to be seene, liuely counter-faits and portraictures were in all their Studies and Closets placed, to the end that there might bee still Images, to attend and set forth the Funerals of such as were to be buried of that stocke and Family. And alwayes, when any Gentleman of note and marke dyed, all the whole race of them that were then liuing of that house and Stocke, accompanied the dead corpse; and from their Armes, lines were drawne along vnto the painted Images of them whose Armes they were. As for their Studies and Closets, they were full of Bookes and Records, testifying the Noble acts by them worthily performed, and the honourable Offices by them in the State & Common-weale borne and discharged, whilest they yet liued. Whereby it is declared, Statues and Images to haue bin rather the signes of some great Office well discharged, then of any Nobilitie. Neyther, that all the Images, of all that were of the stocke and race of them, to whom the right of Images belonged, were wont to be carried at the Funerall solemnities of their kinsmen, but onely the Images of them, who with great praye and glorie, had borne and discharged some honourable Office, and who had of the Senate obtayned that right and priuledge.

Wherefore Cicero reckoneth vp this right of hauing Images, amongst the ornaments of Magistrates. Such as are, the Gowne, the Senators Robe, the Chaire of Estate, and, to haue the preheminance to deliver his munde and opinion first: All which things passed not vnto their posteritie, so that they might vse the same in such sort as did the Nobility, of such as had bene Consuls, Praetors, and such like: which the Roman Lawes would haue to descend vnto their Nephewes in these degrees; that as well the women, as the men, vnto the Nephewes sonne, should be accounted of the same dignitie that their Ancestors were of. In briefe, he that had brought the right of hauing of Images into his Family, is to be thought to haue done no more, but that his owne Image might be carried forth at his owne Funerall, and the Funerals of them of his owne stocke and Kindred; and not, that the Images of his posteritie, should also in such Funerall solemnity be carried; but onelic the Images of them who had gotten the like right. And these Images were kept at home in their houses, and were carried forth at the Funerals of them of their house and stocke, for an example of their Noble acts by them done. But concerning Images and Statues, many thus doe thinke, That they which had the Images of their Ancestours, were accounted and called Ancient Noblemen, and those which had but onely their owne Images, were reputed and called New Noblemen: but such, as had neither Image of their owne, nor of their Aunccestours, they were reputed as base and vnnoble. And yet they of the common sort of the people, having obtained the Offices (called Curules, or of the Irony Chayre of Estate) had also their Images. And thus much concerning the right of Images and Statues: Now will I againe retorne vnto Romulus.

As Romulus had diuided the people into two degrees or orders (viz.) the order of the Senators, and of the Common persons, calling their Progeny Patricios and Optimates (or the Progeny of the Fathers, and of the Nobility) and the Progeny of the other Plebeios (or a Progeny descended from the vulgar and common sort of people) so diuided he their Offices and vocations also. Vnto the Patricii or such as descended of the Senators, hee left the liberal professions (viz.) the bearing of Armes and Offices, the making of Sacrifices, the deciding of controversies in Lawe, and the administration of all busineses belonging in publique vnto the citie and Commonweale: But to the Common people he left the bearing of Armes, also the tilling of the ground & the feeding of cattle: other base trades and occupations (not becoming free-men borne) he assigned vnto strangers, Marchandize, and seruile ministries, he wholly committed vnto them.

The Romans themselves, he would not haue to exercise any base trade, or laborious and painefull businesse; vnto whom hee forbade all vnhonest maner of gaine, for all such manner of gaining was thought vnseemly vnto such as were Fathers in the Common-weale: neyther in ancient time could one be chosen Senator, or one of the Patricii, but by an expresse Law, to that end and purpose propounded to the people, which was the greatest office belonging vnto a King, a Consul, or a Dictator. But in what things the Patricii were discerned from the common sort of the People, is by many examples tried: for the Patricii which excelled in Nobility, and which were honestly begotten and well brought vp, had a Tablet or Tewell on their breasts, and little Moones on their feet, for they vsed Irony Buckles, crooking horned wile, like vnto the Moone, which they say was ordained by Numa, that Senators and their posterity, should vnto their black shoes tie Moones, as if by the Character of the Moone, the number of an hundred had beene designed and figured, in which number the Senators were then contained. But the Tablet they wore was of Gold, made in forme of an heart, where-with they of auncient time, are reported to haue also sealed their Letters: which Tablet free-borne boyes, and the sonnes of such as had serued on horse-backe, vfed to weare, together with the imbrodered Gowne called Prætexta, vntill they were seuteene yeares olde, which time expired, they then in a solemne feast hangd it vp vnto their household, or harth-gods, whom they called Lares. Euerie honourable and noble youth wore this Prætexta or imbrodered Gowne about his coat, but after child-hoode past, this Prætexta being left off in the seuteenth year, and sometime in the sixteenth, and fifteenth also, they put on the gowne (called Toga virilis) or Mans Gowne: that which was imbrodered with Purple, was wont to be giuen only to them whose fathers had borne the great Offices (called Curules) or some other great honors. The order of Gentlemen, and the Common sort of People, in auncient time did weare no Purple: The garment of the Tribune of the People, and of them of the Comminaltie, was a cloake, such as they called Sagæ, Endromides, and Cuculli, Casocks, Maniles, and Cloakes with hoodes. But in succeeding times, the Commoners indeede did weare Purple, but yet different from that which the Senators wore (viz.) of a darke colour, and died with the iuyce of hearbs, and not with the right Tyrian purple die. Beside that, the Patricii, by the institution of Romulus had the Auspicia or offices of Divination belonging vnto them, and the Senate the offices of Priesthood. But this ordinance (saith Dionysius) continued not long, for that al things were made common with them of the Comminalty.

And lest any man should thinke the dignitie of the Patricii, and of the Senators to be the same; Tacitus reporteth, the Emperour Claudius to haue selected out of the Senate, euery one of the most auncient sort of the Senators into the number of the Patricii, there being now but a few left of those families which Romulus called Atiurum, and Lucius Brutus, Ma-turum Gentium. But there is another thing wherewhereat thou wilt happily more maruell, which is, that the Comminaltie growing strong (as there was a passing ouer from the Rate of a Commoner vnto the degree of one of the Patricii) so diuerse of the Patricii also went ouer vnto the Comminaltie, and so became of their numbers. The election of the Senators, according to the alterations and changes of times, belonged sometimes vnto the Kings, afterward to the Consuls, and to the Dictators. After the Kings driuen out, we reade, the Consuls to haue chosen such of the Patricii as were dearest vnto them, and afterward some of the Commoners also to bee Tribunes of the Souldiers with Consular power, vntill that it was by the Law provided, that the Censors should Warde by Warde make choice of them in the Senate. By and by after a substance was required for the creating of a Senator, and if he that was so chosen, did afterward waste and weaken his said substance, he lost also his order and degree.

Wherefore it is manifest, the Romain Nobilitie to haue beene established in the dignitie of the Patricii, and of the Senators, which not to haue beene denied vnto the Order of Gentlemen, we gather of that which followeth, although some others be of other opinion. Dionysius affirmeth, three hundred Gentlemen to haue beene chosen by Romulus, out of the most honourable Families, tenne out of euery Warde. Some of the Gentlemen were such as serued vpon a publique horse, altogether in the Citie; other some of them were such as serued vpon a priuate horse in the Armie abroad. The publique horse the Censor appoynted, and publique Horse-men, or Gentlemen, he created, as well out of them that were descended from the Senators, as out of the Comminaltie, who at length were for their substance created also, as were the Senators. But a *Gentleman*s substance was foure hundred thousand Seiterices, which being consumed and spent, the reputation and dignitie of a Gentleman, therewith took end also. Isidore writeth, That although a man were by birth a *Senator*s sonne, yet vntill he came to lawfull yerres, he was but a Romain Gentleman, & so afterward came into the order of the Senators. Lucy bringeth in Perseus King of Macedon, thus speaking. Equites Romani principis inuentis, Equites Seminarium Senatus, inde lectos in patrum numerum Consules, inde imperatores creant. The Romaine Gentlemen (saith he) are the Princes of the youth, the Gentlemen are the Seminarie of the Senate, out of them being chosen into the number of the Fathers, they create their Consuls, out of them they create their Generals. The Romaine Gentlemen did weare the Robe of Estate, neither could any man be of the order of the Gentlemen of Rome, but that hee must be free-borne. Wherefore, to be a Romain Gentleman, was somewhat a greater matter, then simply to be a free man borne. Yet Pliny hath written, the wearing of Rings, to haue inferred and put a middle and third Order into the People; and them to haue begunne to be euerie where renowned, and to haue diuided the other Order from the vulgar sort of People, or the Comminaltie; as if hee should haue saide, The Gentlemen at the first to haue beene Commoners, but afterward to haue been men of better note & make: which according to the words of Isidore before recited, may seeme to be compared vnto the Senators children, who were accounted among the Equites or Gentlemen, vntill they came vnto the Senators age.

In the question of Nobilitie, not onely the ignorant, but euen the learned also, much erre, whilst they agree not vpon the proper signification of these words, Eugenia, Nobilitas, Generosus, Nobilis, Ingenius, Gentilis; that is, Honour of birth, Nobility, a Gentleman, a Nobleman, a man free borne, a Gentleman, For while they interpret Eugenia the Greeke word, Nobilitas in Latine (and with vs Nobility) the more generall word is brought in place and steed of the more particular: or as the Logicians vse to say, Genus pro Specie. For why, Eugenia or honour of birth, is but the one kinde of Nobilitie, called Natine, (and not all kinde of Nobilitie) requiring a certaine antiquitie of stocke, of riches, and of vertues as Aristotle would haue it) whose words are these: Non diuites, neque boni, sed qui à virtutibus, diuitijs, vel antiquis bonis descenderunt Eugenes sunt habendi: Not the rich men onely, neyther the good men alone, but they which haue descended from Vertues, Riches, and good Aunccestors, are to be accounted Noblemen borne.

Nobility of birth, which is called Eugenia, is of Oforus defined: Splendor vel dignitas generis in quo maxime virtutes extiterunt vitæ & Communi salutare & commodum. The latter or dignity of stocke, wherein most great vertues haue flourished, wholesome and commodious for the common vse of mans life. Which Oforus is affirmeth, to be as it were subject to rottenesse, and with olde age to be able to be consumed and ended. But this rule is not in our Court receiued. Symon Symonius in these words reprooueth Oforus, his name being concealed, or else some other man of the same opinion with him. Supine loquuntur qui aunt quendammodum summa Senectus mentis vni & consilium debilitat, sic etiam Nobilitas splendorem mediocri vetustate augeri, extrema vero Senectus confici. They speake ydly (saith he) which say, that as great old age doth weaken the force & iudgement of the minde, so also, the glory and lustre of Nobility to be with moderate antiquitie increased, but yet to be with extreme olde age extinguished. For as the similitude (saith he) agreeth not, so neyther doth it well conclude: For the more ancient that a Stocke or Familie is, by so much the credit and reputation thereof is greater. And yet hee the sayde Symon forgetting himselfe in another place stumbleth at the same stone, by setting bounds and limites vnto the same Engenia, or Natine Nobility, and by decreeing that a long and continue race of Noble Progenitours, in whom great vertues haue oftentimes shined vnto the number of three discens, doth make a true Noble Stocke, or Eugenia. And that the beginning of a Stocke or Familie, is no further to be deriued, then from the fourth Predecessor, left in searching further, euen Kings themselves (as Isayth Plato) should be deriued from Slaves, or Slaves from Kings.

Of this Eugenia or Natine Nobility, all ages haue best thought, but yet so, as that all the right of Nobility should vpon it be ground: for a man may be Noble, although he be no Eugenes, or from Nobles descended; yea, he may be more honourable then he which is so descended, although not so ancient a Gentleman. As a new made Earle, compared with an

Esquire of a most auncient Familie. As Agathocles, of a Potter made a King. What was Romulus? VVhat was Tullius Hostilius? And what was Tarquinius Priscus?

But let vs now come to search out the signification of the aforesaid words: The Romaines diuided their People into Free-men and Slaves; of Free-men, some were of Bond-slaves made Free-men (whom they called Libertini) other-some, were Free-men borne, (whom they called Ingeniti.) The Libertini were Citizens of Rome, who were three wayes manumitted or made free; that is to say, by Will or Testament, or in the open Congregation or assembly of the people, or before some publique Magistrate which had power so to doe. And hereupon happily in auncient time, when as this our Kingdome was much oppressed with seruite state and condition, the word Franklin, for a man made free, or enfranchised, was in vse, except you had rather it to haue beene vse, for a Free-borne-man.

But they were called Ingeniti, or Free-borne-men, who neyther themselves, neyther their Aunccestors had euer serued as Slaves. And their Aunccestors they reckoned vp, euen from their Grand-father, which is euident by these words of Linie. An nunquam fundo audistis Patricios primos esse factos non è Calo dimissos, sed qui patrem Cicere Auamque possint? Did you euer heare it spoken, the Fathers to haue beene first made, and not sent downe from Heauen, but such as could reckon vp their Father and Grand-father: that is to say, nothing but Free-borne-men.

Freedom of birth, opened a way vnto all degrees of Honours, which (euen as Politick Nobility) was cyther Natine, or Datiue; that is to say, by birth, or by gift. Natine Freedom was by certayne Magistrates giuen, and as length or else by Princes themselves, and that two manner of wayes, the one secretly and not so plainly, by the gift of a Ring, the other more expressely by name and perfectly, by restoring of men to their birth or blood. And whereas men of seruile condition were but by one name called and knowne, Free-borne-men, and Men of free estate and condition, had two or more names. And the name which they tooke from their Stocke or Familie, is called Gentile.

Gentile, or proper to them of that race or kindred. And yet it is to be noted, names giuen by chance, sometime to become proper to a stocke or family. As Tullius was a name proper & peculiar to a Familie, but Cicero was a name gotten by chance, and fained of the Pulle called Cicer, (or the Cichpe(e)) the forme whereof one of that family had vpon the end of his nose, who thereof was first so surnamed: but that same name of Cicero began to be Gentile or proper to that Familie, as to Cicero the Orator, to his Brother, and to their posterity. Truly in his Tropicks defineth, Gentiles esse qui eodem inter se sunt nomine, qui ab Ingeniis oriundi sunt, quorum Maiorum nomen seruitutem seruierit: qui Capite non sunt dimittunt, them to be Gentiles (or of the same stocke and family) which are among themselves of the same name descended of Free-borne-men, none of whose Aunccestors had serued as slaves, or had beene condemned to loose their liberty, state, or Country.

They which were called Gentiles (or of the same stocke or family) were of necessity to be descended from Ingeniti or Free-borne-men; for that of Slaves, and of them whom they called Libertini or men of slaves made free, there is not stock or family. Wherefore, the right of Gentility, or of hauing of a Stocke and Familie, although it was different from Nobility, yet is it not to be doubted, but that it was in great esteeme & reuerence among the Romaines, and to them, to haue aboue all things desired to be called Gentiles, as men that had beene descended from some good stocke or kindred. And that desire hath euen yet vnto this day possessed all Italy.

For among the Venetians they are called Gentilhomini, who deriue their stock from the first Inhabitants of that Island; and which are themselves Patricii, or descended from the Senators. And that word Gentilhomini, as it were by hand deliuered from the Italians to the Frenchmen; from the Frenchmen removed to vs; and at the length, together with the new place of dwelling, hath begunne to put a new signification, differing from that which Gentilis or Gentilitas was of, amongst the auncient Romaines.

For it is false which some, & they learned also, haue deliuered, Gentilitie to haue been proper onely vnto the Patricii: for why, it was common vnto the vulgar sort of the people (as was Ingenuitas it selfe) which appeareth by this one place of Suetonius. Patricia gens Claudia (but etiam & alia plebeia nec potentia minor nec aequitate) orta est in Regibus. The Clauian stocke and family, of the order of the Patricii, (for there was another house of them also of the Comminalty, neither in power nor in dignity inferior to the other) rise vp at Regills. But they seeme to haue beene deceived, by that which Livy writeth, Romulus to haue created an hundred Senators, which he called Minorum gentium (or of the greater families) and Brutus another hundred also, called Minorum gentium (or of the lesser families). But this proueth not, that we must therefore grant, only them of the order of the Patricii, to haue had a stocke and family; neither did this so calling of them, Minorum and Minorum gentium, diuide them from the common people, but theselves among themselves only; for that, where as they were all chosen of Free-borne-Citizens (and which had their stocke and family) yet such of the as Romulus had created, brought the honour of the order of the Patricii sooner into their stocke and family, then did they whom Brutus had freed vnto them. They are also called Gentiles, who in likenes of name agree among themselves (although there be no kindred amongst them at all.)

Among the Athenians they were called Gentile, that is to say, Gentiles, not they which were ioyned among themselves in stocke or blood, but were of those sort of people, who diuided into Wardes, grew into a certaine society and fellowship among themselves. For among the Athenians there were foure Tribes, and euery Tribe was diuided into three Wardes, which made twelue Wardes. And euery Warde was diuided into thirty parts, which they called Gentes or Kindreds. But againe to the purpose.

VVhy a Stock or family among the Romaines is so be deriued from the Grandfather, neyther could consist but in two at the least (viz) the Grandfather and the Father. Some thinke the reason thereof to be, for that the Latine word Gens significeth a multitude, which requireth mo then one; and yet Gens seemeth to be called, as it were Gense: (that is to say a stock or kindred) the Letter V. being taken away. Howbeit these two words differ, the one of them from the other, for that Gens signifies a stocke and beginning; but Gens importeth as it were a certain multitude of Stockes, and of beginnings of Families and Houses.

Ingeniuty, or freedom of birth, had the Ornaments thereof from nature, and had respect vnto liberty, which it still deriued from the Grand-fathers. But Gentility was a matter of the ciuill Law, and was referred vnto the ancientnesse of Agnation (or kindred by the fathers side) differing from the other onely in antiquity of stocke: for it is not needfull to deriue or take Agnation farther then from the Father.

Which if it bee so, then Gentility and Nobility are all one and the same thing. And they confound Gentility (whereof the common people no lesse want and boast, then doe the Noblemen) with Nobility: which deny him to bee a Noble-man by birth, but he whose Grandfather was Noble; neither agree they with themselves, when they dare to affirme (but by what authority I knowe not) Nobility together with the seed of the Parents to bee passed ouer vnto their posterity, according vnto that saying of Mantuan:

Qui virt in folijs venit à radicibus humor:
Et patrum in natos abeunt cū semine mores.

The beauty of the fairest branch,
doth from the roote proceede:
And so the Fathers manners do in their off-spring abide.

And otherwise out of Horace:

Est in Inuencis, est in equis patrum
Virtus: neq; imbellem feroces Progenient Aquila Columbam.

In Bullockes, and in Horses eke,
the Syres worth we proue:
Nor doth the hardy Eagle hatch,
the weak and fearefull Dove.

By which Analogies, the learned Poets very well about to stirre vp Noble and courageous youths, to the imitating of their Fathers vertues, being otherwise not ignorant Nobility whereof we intreat to be a thing ciuill or Politically, & not naturall. And indeed of vnreasonable creatures, there be diuers kindes, but of men there is but one fort. VVherefore, as an Eagle bringeth not forth a Dove, so neither doth a man beget a Hare. But admit that good men are begotten of good Parents, and valiant men, of valiant fathers. But if this be vnto mankind proper, why are not good and valiant children begotten by good and valiant common persons also? For why, they are men alwe as the other, but nothing is then this rule more deceitfull. For through the corruption of mans nature, we see it oftentimes to happen, an vnthrifty sonne to be borne of a thrifty Father: a foole, to be begotten of a wise man; a Coward, of a valiant man. Neither is this now any noueltie or new matter, but such as tooke roote euen in the first corruption of our Nature. For accursed Caine was the first begotten sonne of Adam, a most good father, and of him the same was good Abel begottē. Jacob also and Esau, were the twines of a most blessed father: of which two, God loued the one, and hated the other. And if there be any thing of great operation, which is passed ouer together with mans seede, it is altogether vice; so farre off is it from being of any vertue, which is cuer with labour and study begotten, but born neuer. An Emperour (as Ferretus writeth) for his bodily substance is no better then other men; and yet for the highnes of his dignity, is most like vnto God. Demosthenes saith also, wicked Sonnes (as it were by a certaine fatall destinie) to bee borne of good Parents. It is also commonly laide in the Greeke Prouerbe, The misfortunes of the Worthies Sonnes. VVhat should I produce the Mathematicians and Astrologers, which affirme Nobilitie and Ignobility much more certainly to depend of the force and influence of the starres, then of the constitution of parents.

And yet the vulgar sort, and not without cause, vse to expect some greater thing in Princes children, then in poore mens; of which their hope and expectation, there are many causes alledged, as the great means Noblemen haue, for the best bringing vp and instructing of their children (for it is a shame vnto the sonne if he should degenerate from his Father, being a Nobleman.) In briefe, the plenty of Kinsmen and Friends giuing the good Counsell. Neither was the Poets minde any other, if you marke his conclusion.

De

*Doctrina sed vim premoens infirmam
Religio: cū uisus pectora roborant.*

*Instruction, helps Dame Natures power,
And teaching, strength those mindes of ours.*

By Natures ingrafted or hidden power, hee vnderstandeth certayne seedes of vertues, which by the goodnesse of God alone, are yet in mans Nature, which become not otherwise fruitfull then do the seeds of Hearbs, according vnto the manner and fashion that they are manured & ordered with; so that a man well brought vp, may much more easily obtayne Philosophicall Nobilitie, then can a man that hath bene well borne.

Wherefore poore Country-mens Children, who know nothing more then their beafts and cattell, seeme rather to be rude Silvans then men. Whereas others, borne in better place, euen in the same Schooles, and in the same Studies, strue with Noble-mens Children, and would to God they did not so do, both with greater profit and praise.

Other reasons yet remaine, which proue Politically Nobilitie not to bee a thing substantiall, but meer accidentall: for why, it may be both present and absent, without the corruption of the subject whereof it dependeth; so that the passage thereof may be letted by some heynous offence committed. It is also lost by voluntary departing or relinquishing of the same (when as Nature in the meane while cannot be thrust away with a forcke) which wee reade to haue bene done, of many of the Romaine Patricijs, who refusing their Patrician dignity, took on them the state and condition of the vulgar sort, or Commoners. Now many, through the Lawyers termes, are in this matter deceived, who call the extinguishing of Nobility for some offence committed, The corruption of blood: which manner of phrase and speech, they vse not, for that Nature Nobility is naturally and essentially in the humour of blood, more than other hereditarie facultie, but because the right of inheritance, which is by the degrees of the communication of blood directed, is by that meanes determined or ended, & in hatred of the crime, it is called Corruption, with the infection whereof, all their children are polluted and defiled.

Neither can a stronger argument be devised, to proue Nobility not to be mingled with the blood, then that the Nobility of the Grandfather ennobleth not his nephue by his son, condemned to lose his liberty, late, or country. Of which this ciuill institution, a naturall reason is giuen; to wit, for that an vnable man leteeth & hindereth the extreame to be ioyned together. But yet it was wont to be demanded with vs, no otherwise the it was long agoe with the ancient Romans, whether the nobility of the father being a Senator, do profit his son, being borne before his father had obtained that dignity? And whether such Nobility in the son, be Nature or Dative? Whereunto I answer, The child by our custom, to be immediately by his fathers nobility ennobled, & their children, like the boughes of a tree, removed into a richer ground, are green & flourish with the same new moisture that the bodie of the tree doth. And such Nobility hath deserved to be called Nature, for that it extendeth not but to them, which are borne of such a father. As for example: A Baron, being honored with the title of an Earle, his first begotten son forthwith taketh vnto him the title of some Barony, and all his daughters are saluted Ladies and Adames.

Wherefore we conclude Nature nobility to be drawne from the father, & not to be needfull for vs to seek for it further: for it may be, that sometime it cannot be deriued from the grandfather, as in case that some great offence of the father come betwixt: for a man borne of a noble father is without all doubt by descent noble. But if anie man wil contend him, not properly to be Eugenes or nobly descended; I answer, the common sort of people most of all, do respect the same, but the Iudiciall Court to haue thereof no care at all. For otherwise some new Princes should be of lesse Nobility, then some meane Noblemen, if the priuileges of Nobility should be bestowed, after the ballance of proper and true Eugenia. Adde moreouer, that if true Eugenia should be vrged, it requirerh not only our great grandfathers grandfather, but euen all the rest of our ancestours in continuall order, after them to be Noble, Rich, profitable for the Common-weale, good mē, & without spot or imputation.

An hard speech indeed, but an harder rule, and a consequence, of all most hardest.

hardest: Such a noble descended person, is a rare Bird, and yet some such there be: but concerning that matter, heare Aristotles opinion. Eugenius, verily (saith he) I haue found but in few, and no where an hundred good Eugenies. Wherefore the Athenians called their Noblemen by more vñall words, Eupaterios and Eupatrides, as who should say, Men borne of Noble fathers: although I do know these words to be oftentimes confounded with the word Eugenies.

I haue frankly affirmed Nobilitie to descend from the father to the children; and what if I should say the same force to be in the Mothers nobilitie also? Surely, both reason and the opinions of Doctors, and ancient customes also, will be present for the defence of this cause. If Nobility draw any thing naturall at all from the Parents, almost the whole constitution of the Child, is to be giuen vnto the Mother. It hath also such shape (if we may beleue Philosophers) as the Mother conceiue, together with the seede. For first, it taketh life from the Mother, it taketh likewise nourishment of and from the Mother, encreasing from the Mother; and in briefe, by the consent of all men, it, together with spirit and vitall humour draweth from the mother, aff. ctions, Vertues and vices. And that such power is in the Mother, it is manifest by the precepts of Physicians, who command Parents to be most careful to what Nurses they put their children to be nursed. In briefe, if the vertue of the Father be in the children to be reuerenced, why should not the Mothers be so also? The manner of the Sex, doth neither diminish nor encrease Nobilitie, which is for it selfe to be desired. Nay, in tender women it seemeth to haue both more admiration and grace.

It is of a certayne Lawyer well written; That amongst the causes for which the honour and dignitie of persons, is encreased or diminished, that is of others the lightest, which is drawne from the difference of the Sex: Ispanius reporteth, the fūnes of the women of the Illyries, of Delphos, and of Pontus, to haue bene assigned vnto the houses of their Mothers, and not of their Fathers. Plutarch writeth, that amongst the Ximthij, the Sons were ingrafted into the stocke and family of their Mothers, and from them the name of the stocke and kindred to be deriued, and not from their Fathers. The same thing Herodotus reporteth of them of Licia: as that they should take the name and credite of their stocke and kindred from their Mothers, and that he was with them a free-borne-man, and Noble, that was borne of a free-born-woman, and Noble; although his Father were a Slaue or base common person; yea, and by the Lawes of the Romaines, the Sonnes in some cases follow the beginning of their Mothers. Neyther is it a thing vñheard of with vs, nor with other Nations, Sonnes to haue taken vnto themselves, names from their Mother, which were of greater nobility then their Fathers; as Kainatus de Clara. Spartianus and Trebellius Pollio, haue written, Marcianus or Macrinus, to haue bene by his Mother noble, his Father being but one-ly a valiant and martiall man. You may also with Cornelius Tacitus reade this sentence: Iam depulso Nerone, quisnam eligeretur inquirebant, ex omnibus Rubellius Plancus, cui Nobilitas per matrem ex Julia familia. Nero being now deposed, great inquiry was made, who should be chosen, and Rubellius Plancus was in euery mans mouth, who was nobly borne by the mothers side of the Julian Family. And from these, Virgil, Ouid, and Statius Papinius disagree not, whose verses I haue thought good heere to set downe.

What wanted in the Fathers blood, the Mothers did requite the same; And the base house reioyced much, by such a match to grow to fame. By Mothers Stocke accounted blest. And Fathers vertues with the best.

Now the Reason which many Doctors bring, to proue the Sonne to be partaker of his Fathers Nobilitie, is this; Eucritie thing compound, partaketh of the forme and matter which agreeth to both the parents. Wherefore, where the Law repugneth not with reason, this rule is to be helden for true.

And now concerning Nobilitie Datine (or by birth) I haue thus much spoken: and from hence I will directly proceede vnto Nobility Datine, or to Nobility which cometh by gift.

CHAP. V.

Being about to search out the other kinde of Political or Ciuill Nobilitie (viz.) Nobilitie Datine, and that even from the first beginning thereof, certayne things before sayde, seeme heere necessarily to be againe called vnto remembrance. Their argument is first to be refused, which say: That seeing Adam was a common Father vnto all men, whereof cometh it, that one man should be better then another? It is thereunto answered out of the same Olde Testament, out of which the question is risen, beeing of the like Authoritie and credite both with the Christians and the Iewes. Noah when he had planted a Vineyard, and had tasted of his planting, hauing drunke of the wine, lay drunken and bare in his Tent. And Cham seeing the priuities of his father, tolde it to his brethren, who vpon a naturall honestie and vertue, with a Claske cast vpon their shoulders covered their sleeping father with their eyes turned from him, and not seeing their Fathers nakednesse. But Noah awaked, and knowing what his younger sonne had done vnto him, he cursed Cham, commanding him to be a slave of all finnes. By this shamefull and vnworthie fact, Cham with all his generation, carryed away his Fathers curse, seruitude, and the Title of obscure and base persons; whereas contrary-wise, Sem and Iaphet found all the Names and Titles of Honestie, Nobilitie, and Vertue, and their Fathers blessing withall.

The Datine Nobilitie, whereof our present speech is, was for many causes rayfed and inuented. And first of all, vpon vrgent necessitie. For when as euill and wicked men preuayled, and good and honest men were oppressed: it was necessarie the good to be distinguished from the badde, and for the preservation of the publique tranquillity, to be seperated and diuided from them: wherefore, wise, iust, and vertuous men, and the lights, as it were, of the world, shining before others, were set ouer the rest, that they might bee vnto all men an example of godlie and honest life, that they might decide and determine all things. And at that time such wise men and prouiders for the Common-weale seemed by vertue to procure vnto themselves Nobilitie. For the olde Proverbe prevailed with them: Vertue, and not blood to ennoble men. Such men were by the People called, chosen, & appointed Counsellors and Iudges, who by their subiects were elected and created Kings and Princes. And they, which for their worthy deeds had obtained such honourable Titles and Offices, ennobled both themselves and their posterity.

Another cause also why Nobility began to be honoured, was the Ignorance & vnskillfullnesse of the vulgar and Common sort of people, who haue their sence, reason and vnderstanding so dispersed and scattered, as that they cannot gather, discern, or iudge any thing certaine, firme, or sound. Wherefore, for the maintenance of the publique peace and tranquillity, it was necessarie to make choice of Princes (that is to say, of Gouernours) men, for their vertue and wisdom, famous and Noble, who might compose and set in order the troubled estates, for lacke of knowledge disordered, and with singular wisdom, and action, as it were by a certaine cunning, drawe the rude people vnto a more ciuill kinde of life, and courtesie of behaviour: such as were Iupiter, Pallas, Ceres, Bacchus, Apollo, and many others. And these men, by their wisdom, vertue, and skill, obtayned not onely the Titles of Nobilitie and Dignity, but were of the vnskilfull multitude, accounted for gods also, and receiued from them euen diuine honors.

We see Nobilitie to haue risen also, of the abundance of wealth and riches: for many pinched with extreame pouer- tie, enforced to hang vpon the richer sort, and giuing themselves altogether ouer into their power, reputed them for Noblemen, and for such, both esteemed of them, and honoured them.

Nobilitie also beganne of Noble and worthy acts done; for in auncient time, when as Nations were by their enemies oppressed, if any valiant and courageous man had from such oppression deliuered his Country, he therefore was aboute o- ther men worthily honoured. Many also in auncient time by Martiall prowesse obtained Nobilitie, and therefore of the peo- ple accounted Noble: as was Dauid for the death of Goliath the Philistine. Some, immediately from God were elected and called vnto Nobilitie, as Iosua, Gedeon, Iephtha, and the rest of the Iudges of Israel, who were Generalls ouer great Armies: other some, were againe by God chosen euen from the Plough, to be rulers ouer the people, as the Princes of the twelue Tribes of Israel. King Saul called out of the field; Dauid from feeding of his flock, who thought themselves vterly unwor- thy of such a princely calling. But such as God hath ennobled, are of vs aboute all others to be accounted most noble.

Yea, no small part, but euen the great- est part of Datiue Nobilitie, gained vnto themselves honor and glory by their skill in martiall affaires, carrying home with them victory and triumph ouer their ene- mies; so as did Horatius Cocles, Titus Manlius, Scipio Africanus, and his brother L. Scipio Asiaticus: I speake not of great Emperours, such as were Vespatian, Domitian, Nerva, Traian, Antonius, Seuerus, Theodosius, and many others, who were part of them accounted Fathers of their Country; part of them Benefactors, but all of them best Princes, whose Images are vpon their Coines, euen yet carried about; and publique Statues were in the honour of them, with certaine soleinne Ceremonies erected, to the intent that all others with their valour and vertue, should with their decedes, as it were, in struing-wise, aspire and grow vnto the like glory.

Others also, borne of most base and low condition, who by Armes in time of warres, for their wisdom and courage, haue bene promoted to be great Empe- rours, Casars, Dukes, Princes and Earles: as were Tullius Hostilius, Numa Pompi- lius, Tarquinus Priscus, Iulius Cesar, Oc- tavianus Augustus, and such other like, from hence, tooke the beginning of the Titles of their vertues. For certaine it is, at the first vnder the Roman Empire, when as they had subdued the Germanes, Itali- ans, the Spaniards, the Britains, the Gauls, and other most mighty kingdoms, Dukes, Earles, and Barons, not then to haue bin in such fort, as now they be, but from thence to haue afterward sprung vp and risen. All their Offices were executed by Tribunes and Lieutenants. There was a greater Tribune, who was next vnto the Emperour and his successour. There was also a great Officer called Tribunus Celerum, Lieutenant of the Armie, of the light armed and most readie Souldiers. Those which with a Cohort, or band of men, were the Keepers, and had the guarding of the Emperours person, and they among the Romanes, which were of the first Order, next after the Emperour, were called Tribuni Celerum, as they were long agoe in the time of Romulus, and of the other fixe kings succeeding him.

The great Officers, called Magistri Equitum, or Maisters of the Horsemen, had like power with the Dictators, and with the Emperours, as Lucius Peneftellus, Pomponius Latius de Magistratibus Roma- norum; and also Flavius Vegetius, and Marcus Cicero do; intreating of Mar- tiall affaires, describe. But Pomponius La- tius writeth Romulus to haue called the Generall of an army, whom the Germanes call Hertzogen Tribunū Celerum. Salust in his Treatise concerning the Conspiracie of Catiline, hath called them Dictatores, & Imperatores; that is, Dictators & Emperors. Beside that, Great Magistrates called

Praefecti Pratorio, were of so great credit and authority, as if appeale had bin made from their sentence, they might againe appeale from the Emperour, vnto the Praefecti Pratorio. For most wise, good, and iust men, by the Emperours chosen out, were created Praefecti Pratorio, vnto who they were wont to commit almost the whole estate of the Common weale. The Emperour Seuerus granted many things vnto the Great Officers called Praefecti urbis, and Praefecti Pratorio, of all which, heere to speake, were but needlesse. For heere we speake onely of the authority of the Praefectus Pratorio (or Captain of the Guard) which the Emperour onely gaue vnto him, who is the chiefe, liuely, and ver- ry essentiall Law it selfe; who were of po- wer to thrust Citizens into exile, and to restore them vnto their estate againe. Vwhereby it is most euident, Princes and Governours of People to haue had the power and authority of the sword, to pu- nish the offenders, and to administer Ius- tice: whereby they were afterward thought to procure and get a great name of No- bility, both vnto themselves, and to their posterity: and right probable it is, the au- thority of Princes and Dukes to haue first risen of the Tribuni and Praefecti: which Princes, at such time as the Romane Em- perours remoued out of Germany & Italy into Greece, are read to haue taken vnto themselves the Imperiall power: which authority and regall priuiledges wee see (euen at this day) by Kings and Emperors to bee granted vnto Dukes and Princes: so that the election of Princes & Dukes dependeth not of their Subiects (as doth the election of Kings) but is Datiue, as of gift, to be referred vnto the fauour and bounty of the Emperours and Kings, to whom they haue bene subiect. And in the former times, the names of Duke and Prince were names of Offices, and not of Honours and Dignities. And so in the times of the Romans, the Roman Kings, their Dictators and Consuls, & also their Emperours, were in the administration of their ciuill affaires, all martiall men, both horsemen and footmen.

But beside these great Offices of the Tribuni and Praefecti, there were other publike offices and charges; some called Ordinary, for that they kept orders in the army, and stood in the front of the battaile. Those in the time of Augustus, were wont to be called Aquilifer; and of Fl. Vespatianus, Flauides: some called Aquiliferi, carrying an Eagle in their En- signes, and other some called Imaginary, bearing the ensigne of the common or generall Army of the people of Rome notable with the Letters, S. P. Q. R. That is to say, Senatus Populus, Que Romanus: or the Senate and people of Rome, whom wee can more fitly compare vnto none, then to our Standard or Ensigne-Bearers.

But if wee would heere prosecute all things in order, this Treatise should with- out measure encrease. But now in this place wee onely goe about, slightly as it were to shew the beginnings of Noble Dignities & Offices, least any man should suspect them to be but altogether thin, & fained, and vpon no reason grounded. Rehearsing thele things in the mean time by the way, that when we shall come vnto our owne age, it may appeare, how much Powers, Dominions, and Nations differ among themselves. For they who in au- cient times were vnder kings and empe- rours appointed Governours ouer Regi- ons and Countries, are now become he- reditary possessors thereof: & they which before were but Noble Ministers or Ser- uants, are now become absolute Nobles.

Beside that, in the meane time it most plainly appeareth of that which is afore- said, that the kindred, stocke, and discent of the Nobility in former ages flourished and became famous onely for vertue, no- ble actes, and valour of minde. And that Vertue being set apart, wee are all forsa- much as concerneth mans nature, the sonnes of Adam. Vwherefore, according to the rule of Theologicall or Philoso- phicall Nobility (whereunto our Ance- stors especially addicted themselves) to boast of Nobility by birth, without ver- tue, was but a vaine thing.

*Quamgenus & Proasus & que non fecimus ipsi,

For our proud Stocke and Pedigree,
and things we did not make,
VVe scarce reckon them for our owne,
or for our owne them take.

VVherefore wee pray and exhort all men,

men, that forasmuch as vertue commeth not by inheritance, euery man would endeavour himselfe, of himselfe to become Noble. For they which otherwise vaunt and boast of Nobility, seeme onely honourers of vertue, vpon another mans credite, and liue not by their owne, seeing that they be rather base persons, bearing themselves brag, vpon another mans vertue. But for the most part quite out of order, so the fashion and manner of the world now is. For what cannot flattery, the fauour of Princes, and too much indulgence do, and bring to passe.

PARERGON.

It is sufficiently manifest, by that which is aforesaid, what the iudgment of my Friend and Vncle Robert Glouer was, concerning Politicall Nobility in ancient time, amongst the Gentiles: which Philosophers heretofore, haue set forth to vs as a waunting thing, (and Diuines as a thing vncertaine) whilst they in speaking thereof omitted the Ciuill Rights of persons.

It were verily to be wished, that the ornaments of vertue should euery where be conferred and bestowed vpon none, but vpon such, as in whom vertue it selfe resteth: for that as the encreasing of honor, so the credite and reputation thereof also, is propounded to be gotten, not by ambition, but by industry. But seeing that Politicall Nobility is another thing, whereof there be diuers beginnings, and those of such sort and condition, as maketh in euery man that hath them, a beginning and excellency proper and peculiar to themselves, it is from the rest of the kindes of Nobility (viz. Theologicall and Philosophicall) by this only difference distinguished, that whilst they rest onely vpon Religion and Vertue, this Ciuill Nobility resteth vpon the custome of Nations.

In the prosecuting whereof, for that he finished not the same, I verily tooke it most greedously: for many things seemed to me to be therein wanting, which might much haue concerned the matter: As the peculiar forme of enobling of men, vsed in euery kingdome apart, and especially in this Empire and Island, as the very method and order of the worke seemed to me to make shew of. But forasmuch, as he in his life time perfected not these things: For,

—Absolut clarum cita mors Achillem.—

Vntimely death soone tooke away Achilles, and clos'd him in clay.

Least Pemisses head being onely by A-pelles perfected, the body being not yet drawne, the whole worke in the meane time altogether imperfect or deformed, should lye neglected and vnregarded, I thought it a thing worth the labour, to supply that defect, with such things as hereafter follow: to the intent, that at length amongst others, I might in fewe words, and as it were at a glimpse, shew what orders of Nobility are with vs also: what Rites and Ceremonies are vsed in promoting of men vnto the degrees of Nobility, that from hence the forme of creating of the being before vnderstood, I might afterward with greater fruit, and fuller pleasure, come vnto the persons themselves, with their families, marriages, changes, and noble aages; and at length in a iust volume (if God shall see it good) more at large, and fully delight the Readers.

But if we shall compare these old and most ancient times of the Romane Empire with ours, wee shall finde no signe or token of that ancient Nobility in the Courts of Princes. If you shall seeke for such as they called Patricij or Senators (whom the Romanes reuerenced as men sent downe from heauen) you shall finde them no where but in Citties, exercising Vfury and Merchandize (trades vterly forbidden the Romanes) at whom (although within their owne walles they be much regarded and esteemed) our noble Courtiers were wont to scorne & iest. Or else if it please you, goe vnto the time of Pope Priuan, who (forsooth) made Charles the Sonne of King Leues the 8. in France, a Senator of Rome, when as he should rather of his owne right, haue graced him with the Cardinals hat. And indeede, it was a very ridiculous comparison son of the French King his Sonne with a Senator of Rome, as the matter now standeth.

Wherefore let vs see, and as breiefely as we can touch, how, & by what degree after the empire of that City (which first built by Shepheards, at length became Mistress of the whole world) began to decline from so great an Estate, together with the change thereof, by little and little, drew with it the change of Noble dignities and titles also.

After the translating of the Romane empire by Constantine the Great, all that excellency of publicke dignities, whereof it is expressly and sufficiently enough before spoken, seemeth to haue bin changed into a certaine other forme, and a new manner of enobling of men to haue bin deuised. And verily, the names of Honours and Dignities in the east-empire, seeme to haue bene diuers from the west-empire: and the Latines, after the empire rent in funder, and seated at Constantinople, seeme to haue bene subiect vnto the Greekes. For he that was there next vnto the Emperour, eyther by reason of the neere closeness of blood, or by institution, and was of the Latines called Primus was of the Greekes, by a generall name saluted Despotes; that is to say, Lord: as he is at this day calld Monsieur among the Frenchmen. The later VVriters, were wont also to call him, the same man Sebastus, according as the emperors had deuised honourable titles, where-with they might grace their friends, and binde them vnto them. The third in dignity from the emperor, was the Sebastocrator: whom hee whom they called Cesar, followed as fourth.

But whilst the emperor Basilius, was wont to be called Sebastus, & also Cesar, he the same man, at one & the same time enjoying all these titles, these dignities were then as offices, and not as titles of honour. But afterward, they as honourable names of dignities, even without any offices at all belonging vnto them, began to bee according to the emperours pleasure, bestowed and disposed of. And for a time, the next in honour vnto the emperor, was called Cesar: as The king of the Romanes at this day, is in the VVest. But afterwards, Sebastocrator was the second in honour, & Cesar the third, at such time as Alexius Comnenus appointed his Brother Isaacius to be Sebastocrator: of whom Zonaras speaketh more at large. And last of all Alexius Paleologus being Despotes was made next in honour vnto the Emperour, vnto whom he the same Emperor Comnenus hauing no Sonnes, betrothed his eldest daughter Irene, and graced him with the Title of the Despotes, as hee which should haue bene heire of the empire, if he had not before dyed.

Protophastus had the first place & degree of honour from the emperor. And at length Panhyperphastus began to be the most stately and maiestical name of all others, being a new title, of a new dignity, iauented by Alexius Comnenus, to gratifie Michael Taronitus withall. Eparchus was also a name of great honor, as who should say, the cheefe of all the Princiuall Presidents. Contostolus was Generall of the Auxiliary forces, which out of France, Sicily, and Italy, serued in the East. Whereof he was called The Great Contostolus: and otherwise Comestabilis, which of the Italians is interpreted Contostabile. Trungarius was he, which had the command of a Fleet at Sea. But him which commanded the Army at Sea, they called, The great Duke, and in Greek, Megadux, for difference sake, imitating therein the Latines. For he which led the Army at Land, was called Egemon; but hee which ruled at Sea, was called Dux. And ouer the Army at Land, commanded alwayes, eyther the emperor himselfe, or the Despotes, or the Sebastocrator, or the Cesar, or the Panhyperphastus. And vnto this Great Duke whom they had as cheefe Admirall, they made subiect all the Drungars of their Fleete, their Admirals, their Proto-Comites, and him the Great Drungarius himselfe, before whom they also appointed the emperours Statue on horse-backe (which they called Contus) to bee carried before him in their forces at Sea. They had also their Great Logotheta, whom we at this day call the Chancellor. Their Logarithes, whom the Frenchmen call Controleur. And their Protostator, or Marshall of their Army. Their Primicerius also and Primangulios, and many others of that sort, I willingly passe over, least in prosecuting of euery one, my discourse should grow too long and tedious. These were all honorable dignities, and that for the most part not so much for the necessity of their Offices or order, as so made by the fauour and good liking of the Emperour.

But whilst it seemed so good vnto the Emperours, so to appoint the feare of the Empire at Constantinople (where all things now ly swallowed vp of the Turkes) they left the west bared of their Legions, and strengthened onely with Fortes, vndefended and subiect vnto the inuasions & fury of the barbarous Nations: vpon the fall and decay whereof, the ruine of the East Empire (at length) ensued also. Italy and Affricke was at that time gouerned by their Exarchi, Toparchi, Comarchi, Carthularij, Spatharij, Gustuladi, and Capitani. But at length, when Narses the Eunuch, and one of the Romane Patrij, was by Iulianus the Emperour, appointed Gouernour, he brought in them whom they called Consulares, Præsides, and Correctores. But after, that hee that Narses, prouoked with the iniuries and despights of Sophia the Emperesse (and with anger enraged) had called in thither the Longobardes out of Pannonia, they became by little & little to vary, concerning the titles of Honour, and names of Dignity.

For Narses being dead, Longinus (one of the Romane Patrij also) by the same Emperour chosen Gouernor or Exarchus in his stead in Italy, for the repressing of the Longobards, but a little before called forth by Narses, and euen now about to come, ordained Dukes thoroughout the Prouinces (haply to the imitation of Constantine the Emperour, who is reported to haue provided by Law, that Countreyes and Townes should be assigned to Dukes, Earles, and olde Captaines, which hauing log serued, were to be rewarded for their good seruice done and past.) And vnto this purpose tend the words of Guichardine himselfe, which I haue thought good hereunto also to adioyne.

By the translation of the Empire vnto Constantinople (saith hee) a way was opened vnto the power of the Roman hyshops, for the authority of the Emperours, dayly more and more weakened and decreasing in Italy (both by their continual absence, as also for that they were still busied with warres in the east) the people also by little and little revolting from them, & the City of Rome selfe, being at length oftentimes by the Goths and Vandals taken & sacked;

the authority of the Emperours began to decay and vanish away in Italy. But the barbarous people, at length againe diuened out of Italy by the power of the Emperours, the gouernment began againe to be managed by Grecke Magistres (of whom he which commanded ouer the rest, was called Hexarchus, and had his seate at Raenna) who appointed Gouernours ouer the rest of the Citties of Italy, which Gouernors they called Dukes. From hence, came the name of the Hexarchship of Raenna, wherein all places were comprehended, which had not Dukes of their owne, but were vnder the command of one Hexarchus. Not long after, a notable change and alteration of matters ensued from the Longobardes: For they, a most fierce and cruell people entering into Italy, possessed the country called Gallia Cisalpina, of whome it hath also taken the name of Lombardie. They added also vnto their Gouernment Raenna, with all the Hexarchship thereof, besides many other parts of Italy, extending their armes as farre as Picenum, Spoleum, and Beneuentum, ouer which, they appointed Gouernors to rule and command, whome they called Dukes, &c. So the Longobards raging and roaming farre abroad in Italy, at length, with thirty of their Dukes, in vaine attempted to haue taken the Cittie of Rome. And so it came to passe, according to the manner of warres, that the Titles of the dignities of the former empire being neglected, all things began to bee gouerned by the Generals and Commanders of the armies, viz. by such as they called Dukes, Earles and Princes.

These people, Charles the Great, son to Pippin King of France, by the Romans called into Italy, hauing taken Ticinum, the Metropolitall Cittie of the Insubres, & there Ilain Desiderius (of a Consulable promoted to be King of Italy) ouercame and subdued, and was forthwith by the generall consent of all men chosen emperor of the VVest Empire: who as hee would haue the Empire it selfe to be called, The French Romane Empire, so euen in the beginning thereof he had a purpose to make it hereditary, and made the Great men, & such as were with Honourable Titles graced, to be altogether free: and bound them by oath, as men in Fee, holding onely of the King, and of the Emperour: so that if by chance they should fall from their faith and allegiance, or dye without issue, hee then ordained those their dignities to be transferred vnto others: & that his ordinance was called Inuestitura, or an Inuestiture. The bounds and townes of his kingdome, he committed to be gouerned by Counties or Earls. The bounds & borders they called Marchias, or Marches: whereupon, the Gouernours of the Marches, began to be called Marchiarum Comites, (or Counties of the Marches) and at length Marchiones, or Marquesses. And them whom he set and placed in the Prouinces, for the administration of Iustice, and the keeping of the people in their allegiance, were then called Missi (or Men sen) or otherwise Legati: that is to say,

The Emperours Legats or Lieutenants. But such as the people afterward of them felues created, for the administration of Iustice, and the gouernment of Citties, being two or moe in number, being chosen after the manner of the ancient Roman Common-weale, were called Consuls. The French Romane Empire, with this successe made by Charles the Great, wa: left vnto his posterity almost hereditary: which in short time after also, vnder the Emperour Charles the Grosse (Nephew in the fourth degree vnto Charles the Great, & before, King of Germany) deuolued from the French-men vnto the Germanes.

Vnto whom also (within a few yeares after) Otto the Great, King of Germany, and he Emperour, also succeeded: who following the steps of Charles the Great, gaue such perfections vnto his beginnings, in bestowing and disposing of honours & dignities, as that he is not so much for his firman and noble acties, to bee compared with the most mighty emperours, as for his wholesome Lawes, and herioicall Ordinances, of all posterity of right for euer to be commended. For this man, after the ancient manner of the Longobards and French, entertaining every most valiant man into his wars, graced with Royalties such of them, as had done him worthy & faithfull seruice, and these Royalties were all manner of dignities, lands, & gouernments of Prouinces) which he according as he thought good, bestowed vpon such as had of him well deserued. And now men began more plainly to make a difference of titles and dignities. For the titles of Dukes and Counties (being with the ancient Romans but the bare names of personall offices and charges) now receiued other customes: and a Duke (at first chosen for his vertues & noble acties) they now began so to call him of his Duke-dome: as they did also a Marquesse, of his Marquisat, and an Earle of his Earldome. And he which had the command of people, from some King, Marquesse, or Earle, was called Capitaneus (or a Capitaine.) But they which had such command from Capitaines, were called Valasores (or Valasours.) And they which had it from these Valasours, were called Valasini (or Valasines.) Whereupon this new beginning of Politicall Nobility, beeing tar & wide disperfed through the kingdomes of the Empire, they at length were deemed rightly Noble, according to the manner and custome of euery place & Countrey, who eyther themselves, or their ancestors liued, so graced with these, or such like priuiledges.

And these be the things, which according vnto the variety and alteration of times, we haue read in the most approved Authors, concerning the titles of honours and dignities. In recounting of which, we haue thought this most especially worthy the noting, that all the streames of Nobility (but especially the greatest & cheefest of them) came and issued all out of the Canipe. Which degrees of honour and Nobility, before that wee compare them with ours, it shall not repent vs in distinct rankes, orderly to runne through the beginning of euery one of them.

And first to begin withall, They in Campes were called Principes, or Princes, (of whom at this day, wee euery where make so great account) which seated in the first rankes, excellen others in strength and age, and which followed the Spear-men, diuided into fifteen bands or troops, so placed, as it were for a refuge & cleefe for them: to the end, that if in battaile the Spear-men should be enforced to retire, they might in safety flye vnto those Principes, as vnto principall men of more approved and assured seruice. Whereof Castra Principalia, the Principall tents, and Porta Principalis, the Principall port, where those Principes or Principall men were wont to ly with their bands; are so often read of in Linie.

Next vnto Augustus the Emperour, they which in the emperors name gouerned the Romane affaires, were called Principes Senatorum, or Princes of the Senate. But afterward, the emperour would haue the place or title of a Prince, to bee a dignity next vnto a King, who amongst the ancient Axioms were called Eschings, and with vs Cytones. But now it is as it were a generall name, diuersly giuen and attributed vnto many at once, and orderly comprehending in it all the greater sorts of dignities: yea in some places, according to the manner and custome of the place, the title and dignity of a Prince, is inferiour vnto the title and dignity of a Duke, or an Earle.

Duces or Dukes tooke their names from the Latine word Ducendo, as who should say Ducifores or Leaders; for that they marching before, led their followers. Wherof we reade the Latine phrase, Ducere bellum, that is to say, to leade warre, for Gerere bellum, to make warre. And so His bellum asidue ducunt cum Gente Latina. These men make continuall war with the Latine Nation. And they which as Dukes or Generals were leaders of Armies, were wont to vie such Ensignes as the Consuls did: whereupon, the word Ducatus, sometime signified the Region or Country, ouer which the Duke commanded: and other while, the Military government and commanding authority it selfe. Vnto which manner of men, for doing by them honourably and valiantly in the wars achieved and performed, triumphall Ornaments were sometimes awarded. Amongst the ancient Germanes, vnto a Generall or Leader of an army, were assigned twelue Counties or Earles to attend vpon him.

Marquesses were so called of a certaine iurisdiction bound vnto some certaine place. So he which had the command and government of any frontier Territory or Sea-coast, was called Marchus, or a Marchus: and they which received of the Fees, were properly accounted the Palatini of the King, or of the kingdom, as men standing with the Generals. Ad eadem Regni, at the gates and entrances of the kingdom. Other some there bee, which goe about to deriue the word Marchus from Marca (a word of the Celtic) from whence they deriue the word March.

chare in French, to ride: and the Marchomani as a people so called, for that they excelled in good horse-manship.

Now of Counties or Earles, as there were diuers kinde, so of them amongst the ancient VVriters, are read diuers and sundry sorts and orders; such as among the rest were Comites Sacri Palatii, or Counties of the Sacred Pallace: Antijur (or Principall Courtiers) and Comites stabuli, or Constables. For Vesiderius from a Constable, by the Longobards chosen and appointed to beking of Italy, was slaine by Charles the Great. And it is elsewhere read, hee sent Burchardus the Constable, with his Fleete to Corfica.

There were also Comites Militum, or Counties of the Souldiers, of whom the Romanes would haue always two residing in the East, and were thereof sometimes called Comites Orientis, or Counties of the east. And in breefe, there were Counties of Prouinces: such as were the Counties of Spaine, of Brittaine, and of the Saxon Coasts in Brittaine.

The Gustaldus in Italy, and a County, seeme in ancient time to haue bene all one: There be some also, which beleue a County in olde time to haue bene called Comarchus.

The name of a Vicount sheweth a beginning not to be doubted of: For he to whom the County in the Camp committed the authority of his iurisdiction, was called Vice-Comes or Vicount; as were in the ancient time the Proconsul, & the Proconsul his Lieutenant or Deputy.

But whereof the Barones or Barons were so called, is not yet wel knowne; for vnto the Romanes as concerning their dignity, they were vnto us vnknowne: howbeit, that they assume it to be a Latine word, by that saying of Cicero to his friend Atticus. Apud Patronum reliquosque barones te in maxima gratia posui: Hee brought you into great fauour with your Patron, and the rest of the Barons.

Other some obtrude vnto vs the greek word Sapien, which significth Grave. But howeuer it cometh to passe, if credit be to be giuen to our most learned Lawyer Braddon, the Barons were still accounted for most valiant men, for hee would haue them to be called, labora belli, or the strength of warre. And by the Lawyer Radus, a Baron is defined to be a man having uing from his Prince the power and authority of the greatest, middle, and lowest correcting of offenders. But sufficeth it now concerning these matters, to haue sayde thus much, as purposing of the same, to speake more at large hereafter.

And let vs now come nearer vnto the matter, by comparing of ancient things, with others of latter time; to the intent, that by applying of those ancient things vnto this our Age and Time, the reason as well of the Names as of the Dignities themselves, may the better and more manifestly appeare.

Like as the Empire of the Greekes, was by the Turkes ouerthrowne and brought to nought, euen so also was the empire of the West, by the cunning and ambition of the Bishops of Rome, rent in sunder and weakened. Which, how great it was, the very ruines thereof doe now scarcely declare. The maiestic whereof, is yet by the Seauen Princes Electors (of the Germanes called Comogestum) vnto the Ornament of the Christian world vpholden and maintayned. The Septemvirate of Germany, the Emperour Otto the third, and Pope Gregorie the fift, ordained in the yeare 960. Vnto whom afterwards the Emperour Charles the fourth engaged the reuenues of the Empire (hauing promised vnto euery one of the Electors, an hundred thousand crownes) that he would appoint Venceslaus his sonne, heire of the Empire. But the Money being not payed, it came to passe, that the Patrimony of the Romane Common-weale, which was appointed to the vires and maintenance of the warres (and for that onely cause was subiect to alienation) was privately distributed and diuided amongst them, vnto euery one of them a part, whereby the power of the Empire was afterward almost brought to nothing, the Seauen Princes Electors of Germanie, keeping all vnto themselves, and compelling the Emperors by oath, that they should not reuoke the Lands and Pawnes before ingaged.

And Kings, to whom it was a pleasant thing to be deliuered from another mans power and command, erected to themselves Monarchies.

But they which in most great Kingdoms hold the second place, next to the Kings and the Kings sons, are according to the forme of the Emperors army, called Dukes. The title of an Archduke is but one alone, belonging to the house of Austria, by the emperor Frederick diuised, to grace his nephew Phillip withall, at such time as he was to marry Joane the heire of Spaine.

The name of Marquess, is a title of dignity onely in Transilvania, and Valachia. And so also is the Doge of the Venetians, who is also called a Duke.

And as in warres Counties or Earles were assigned vnto Dukes, so our Counties now at this day, are thought next in dignity to follow the Dukes.

For a Marquess at this day, is nothing else in his owne proper signification, then a Countie vpon the Frontiers & Borders: which in the Germaine tongue is more significantly called a Marquess: with whom a Countie is called Graf. And whereof come those honourable names of the Salitzgrau, Landgrau, Marquess, Erzgrau, & Burggrau: that is to say, The Countie Palatine, the Countie of the Prouince, The Countie of the Borders, The County of Rhene, The County of the Castle or Garrison. And yet according to the diuers custome of places, Marquesses in some places are preferred, and goe before Counties or Earles.

The beginning of a Vicount, the very etymology of the name it self hath tanght vs.

Barons are also euery where according to the dignity of their degree, power, & grauity accounted honourable. France hath also onely foure peculiar Great and principall Lords, whom they call Vidames (viz.) Chartres, Chalons, Amiens, and Gerbery. So hath it pleased men according to the custome of places, vnto new forms of Honours and Dignities, to giue olde names. But nothing is euery where, and in all places so sincerely obserued and kept, as is that olde and generall diuision of People, into Noble and Vnoble, with a certain difference of the Vnoble sort among themselves, as of the Noble sort among themselves also.

For such with easie exercises get their liuings, such as excell in wit in the knowledge of Martiall affaires, in learning, in wealth, or in vertue: these men, in these times, are as it were the Seminaries of Nobility (as were in ancient time the Gentlemen whom they called Equites, among the Romans, the nursery of the Senators.)

A Duke.

All the vulgar people are base and vnnoble.

All gentlemen are alike Noble.

The difference of Nobility.

Nobility, the greater and the lesser.

In some places of Italy there be hereditary Knights.

In many places also there are Esquires by birth.

Many noble & famous Gentlemen, haue also from Lawyers and Merchants descended. And although some of the vulgar & common sort of the people, be among them of better account and reputation, then some others of them, yet in respect of the Nobility, they are altogether base and vnnoble: like as all free-borne men, which are not of the vulgar and common sort of people, are indifferently and alike noble, according to the French Proverb: le suu Gentilhomme comme le Roy. I am a Gentleman as well as the King. Il soy de Gentilhomme: The faith of a Gentleman.

Yet it is to be knowne, antiquity and high functions, to haue their estimation in Politicall Nobility, as they haue in other things. And heereof as seemeth vnto me, are those distinctions of Nobility, named, and vnnamed: or of the greater and lesser Nobility, as some others would haue it. And Named Nobility I call that which is by hereditary succession graced with Titles and Fees. As a king taketh that his denomination of his kingdom: a Duke, of his Dukedome; an Earle, of his Earledome; and a Baron, of his Barony: who may also be called Maiores Nobiles, or The greater Nobility, although not altogether so properly, for that that distinction of Nobility, indifferently comprehendeth all sorts of Noblemen, & the higher Magistracies (bestowed vpon men for teame of life only, or during the Princes pleasure.) The rest of the Nobility vnder the degree of Barons, may be called Nobiles Imminuti (or vnnamed Noblemen) or Minores Nobiles, that is to say; the lesser Nobility.

And yet there are some of them which seeme to haue Named Nobility, although they be not in the same ranke and order to be placed: such as are Knights and Esquires. But forasmuch as the Titles of Knighthood and of Esquires, are not hereditary, they are accounted amongst the lesser Nobility.

The Frenchmen in the meane time, and we Englishmen also, doe by more knowne words, better discern the greater Nobility from the lesser, but not without a certaine injury and wrong done vnto the latine tongue, from which wee deriue our Nobility. For who is he which knoweth not the Latine word (Nobiles) indifferently to comprehend all such as are about the common and vulgar sort of me?

Which word is in French or English expounded (Noble). By which word, the common sort of Englishmen calleth or noteth no man, vnder the degree of a Baron.

The rest vnder the degree of Barons, are in French called Gentilshommes, and in English, Gentlemen. Of which, such as are neither Knights nor Esquires, we call them but onely Gentlemen, without any addition; and in French, Gentilshommes simples, or plaine Gentlemen. Although it may be that some of these me can shew more Armes of their flocke, and deriue their Pedigree further, then can some others of greater dignity, or euen the emperor himselfe.

Wherefore, in Politicall Nobility, being simply vnderstood, these plaine tearmed Gentlemen are not inferiour vnto the Princes themselves, but yet in honor and dignity much. For the titles of Kings, of Dukes, of Marquesses, of Earles, & Barons, are as it were the names of most honourable Offices, and by reason of such additions, one becometh more famous and nobler then another.

These things being thus somewhat more at large and in general spoken, concerning Nobility, seeme as it were to open the way vnto the particular degrees thereof with vs. But the diuision of the orders & degrees of men, which our English Common-weale and Empire well beareth, at other times, by others sette forth, is exceedingly well set downe: who haue diuided the same into a King, into Nobility of the greater and of the lesser sort, Citizens, Men liberally brought vp, and Labourers. But forso much as I haue purposed to speake onely of the degrees of Nobility, and that the intention and scope of this worke tendeth no farther. I haue determined to entreat onely of the Kings, and of the cheefe named Nobility, whom it pleaseth vs to call, The Peeres of the Kingdom, The Common Fathers of the Common-weale, & in briefe, by one name, Great Estates, or Noblemen.

Yet in so great conuersions of things, and inundations of forraigne Nations, where-with this our Island from the first inhabiting thereof, hath bene oftentimes troden vnder foote, and for a long time

most greuously afflicted: to write such a serious discourse, as to set downe, what were the beginning Titles of our Noblemen, with the orders and degrees of honours, seemeth a thing most difficult and hard.

Concerning which things (freely to confesse the truth) seeing that I haue not well satisfied my selfe, I dare not with too much hasty confidence to affirme much, especially seeing that heere, as well as elsewhere, the Victors haue still especially endeuoured them-selues, not so much to oppresse the people by them subdued, as they haue done to inuolute their customes, and to change their lawes. Seeing that it is so by Nature ordered, that with the same fate where-with Monarchies and Kingdomes are ouerwhelmed, euen the Nations themselves, and Noble Families fall, and come to utter ruine also.

For first, the Romans by subduing the Brittaines, the naturall Inhabitants of this Island, went about with their Legions to ouerthrow all things.

But the Romans about five hundred yeares more or lesse after, being againe transported into France, the Saxons, or rather English-Saxons, called in by the Brittaines vnto their aide, raised warre against their Hoalls, and thrust them quite out of their ancient Seates, and first of all others, gaue vnto the kingdom the name of England. And these people the Danes also for a space thrust out of the kingdom.

But at length, when as this kingdom began (as it were) againe to breathe vnder Edward the Confessor, a most holy King, and last of the English-Saxons race, he being forth-with dead without issue, gaue occasion to the Normans to passe ouer. VVho at length preuailling, (Harold who withstood them being overcome) and the Englishmen being thrust out of their ancient inheritance, began forth-with to assigne the Landes and groundes in euery place vnto their companions and fellow-souldiours, and also to bring in the Normane customes and fashions.

Many things for all that, are yet extant in the most auncient Records, euen in the Heptarchy of the English-Saxon Kings, concerning those Noble-Men which were Rulers ouer the Countries of Chester, Leicester, and Lincolne, whom we reade to haue bene indifferently also called Dukes, and Counties of the Mercians. The Danes had also their Hereticks, and the Princes of their Hereticks. And Edward, the King and Confessor yet reigning, euen in the time next to the coming in of the Normans, in the charters and monuments of Churches, are found there to be Ethelings, Clytons, Patrick, Consuls, Earles, Palatines, Dukes, Senators, Stalbers, Thayns, Theobalds, Masters, and Princes. But yet with great inconsistency, of such their names and callings. For whom thou shalt reade to be called Counties, thou shalt elsewhere finde euen at one and the selfe-same time to be called Dukes. But the stile of Clyte, at first signified the Kings eldest Sonne, but afterwards, it was a title common to all them that were descended of the Kings blood.

The Titles of Countie and Consul signified the same thing, differing but in that Comes (or a County) was to be called a Comitatus (or of a Shire or County); and a Consul of Consuldo, or of the giving of Councell. A Stalber, and The Governor of the Kings house, to haue bene all one, it is out of diuers writings manifest. The Patrick and Thayns were Noblemen of the better sort; and I could almost affirme them to haue bene equall vnto our Barons at this day. Ministers and Princes, who in old Charters are set as lowest sitnesses, seeme to haue bene names of one and the same signification, and alike significant Noble-men: but what degree of honour or Nobility they were of, is altogether vnknewne. Neither seeme these honourable Titles to haue bene forth-with together with the victory, by William the Normane changed. For these men whom King Edward the Confessor in his Charter, concerning the Priuiledges by him granted to the Abbey of Waltham, in the year 1062: taketh to witnesse by the name of Counties Palatine (whom he but euen a litle before had called Dukes) and by the names of Procurators, Chamberlaines, and Princes of his Court: the Normane himselfe, in the second year after his victory, in his confirmatory Charter granted vnto the same Abbey, doth by the same Stiles and Titles take to witnesse also.

But, after that he had now confirmed the kingdome vnto himselfe in safety, the Counties whom he by his Royall Charter had rewarded with Countie and Lands, began to be one from another, distinguished, by the addition of the Title, of such and such a Countie. As witnesse Alanus Countie of Richmond; witnesse Hugh Countie of Chester; witnesse Roger Countie of Shrewsbury and Arundell.

VVherefore the English Saxons by little and little, eyther dead without issue, or oppressed, or thrust forth into exile, and so living in other places, all things were foisted vnto the Norman manner, as that of our Nobilitie at this day, there is not any which can so much as any little breathe of the Stock and Race of those most ancient Saxons.

These foundations of the auncient VVortheies and Nobility beeing layde by William the Conquerour: and oftentimes afterwards by Successours, according to the diuerse occasions and occurrents of times, by little and little continued and augmented, beganne at length in the reigne of King Henry the third, and Edward the first, to shine forth, who hauing now vanquished the VVelch-men their Neighbours, and contending with the Scottes bordering vpon them; for Principallitie and Soueraignetie; entreating of all things concerning the Common-weale, with the three States of the Kingdome (which consisted of the Nobilitie, the Clergie, and the Communitie) they themselves in their Royall Maiestie sitting in Parliaments, appointed vnto euery man a preeminence, according to the place of his dignitie: from whom, especially all the Nobilitie of our age, may seeme to deriue the diuerse and appoynted degrees of Dignities and Honours.

VVherefore a King, who may with vs be also called a Monarch, hauing in himselfe the supreme power, is of such great Maiestie, as that besides GOD alone, hee hath none his Superiour. Who from Equitie and Iustice seeking his chiefeest praise and commendation (when as any matter of greater weight or importance is to be decreed and set downe, concerning the welfare and honour of the Common-weale) doth ey-ther make new Lawes, before conceiued by the three estates of the Kingdome, or else abrogateth the old; and free from all homage for his Empire, is with the sacred solemnities of his Countrey, with a royall Crowne, by his subiects crowned, whom afterwards we with so great reuerence obferue and honour, both in the time of peace, as also in the time of war, as that (in so much as hee himselfe is the fountaine of all Nobilitie) he may for his onely pleasure and good liking, blesse and grace whom hee will, with Offices, Dignities, Honour, Nobilitie, and Riches.

Amongst the Nobilitie or Peeres of the Kingdome, the Prince is the chiefe, who is alwayes but one and himselfe alone, for hee is to be deemed the Kings eldest sonne, or heire apparent of the Kingdome, and hath of long beene graced with the Title of the Prince of Wales. The Kings sonnes in auncient times, before the coming in of the Normans, were wont to be called Ethelings, that is to say, Clytons, (as more Noble than the rest, whom they in Latine called Indytii, or Noble) as Edgar Clyto, Alured Clyto, and others. Our Princes of Wales are now with vs, the fame that the designed Caesars were among the ancient Romans, as who should say, heires of the Imperiall Maiestie; and whereupon at this day, the Germans appoint him which shall be emperor, King of the Romans, and the French stile him that is to succeed in the Kingdome, the Dolphin: but the Spaniards, together with vs, call him which is to haue the kingdome after the death of the king his father, The Prince, or Infant.

The first that was by this name called after the coming in of the Normans, was Edward, the eldest son of King Henry the third, who (his Father Henry being dead) and hauing there vanquished Leolin, was the first that vniued the Principallitie of Wales vnto the kingdome of England: vnto whom also, John the Scot earle of Chester, being dead without heyres male (other lands and reuenues being assigned vnto the sisters of the aforesaid Earle) the king his Father had giuen the same countie.

At length King Edward the third gaue vnto Edward his eldest sonne (a most famous and renowned warrior) then

The Prince of Wales.

The first Prince of Wales.

then Prince of Wales and Earle of Chester, the Countie of Cornewall also, which hee then had made a Dukedome: and by this meanes it is come to passe, that afterwards our Kings eldest sonnes or heyres, were by the Kings royall Charter, with great solemnities in full Parliament, created Princes of Wales; and Earles of Chester, (with the Countie of Flint, which belongeth vnto the Dignitie of the Sword of the Countie of Chester) but are called Dukes of Cornewall, euen from the first houre of their Natiuitie.

They which are accounted of the Nobility after the Princes of Wales, we call Dukes, Marquesses, Earles, Vicounts, and Barons. Aboue which, if I shall also place the most famous Fellowship of Knights, of our (by farre) the most honorable order, taking name of the Garter, I not shal haply seeme to haue done amis: forasmuch as it maketh Knights, and sometime them of the Lesser Nobility, (excelling others in vertue and valour) almost equall, not onely vnto Noble-men at home with vs, but euen with Kings and Emperours abroad. But of them we are elsse-where to speake.

All these Noblemen (I say) in the beginning to haue beene Generall and Leaders of Armies, or Gouernours of Countie, it is before declared. But afterward, as pleased the Emperours, to haue beene giuen them for terme of life: and at length strengthened with lands and fees, we see them to haue obtained a certayne hereditary perpetuity: wherefore, a Duke, who in ancient time was, as it were, the Constable of the Kingdome, and whose chiefe seruice was, to leade and conduct the Kings Armie in time of warre, now graced with Fees, and once authorized by the King, is become an hereditary Title. Our Kings descended of the Norman blood, so long as they themselves were Dukes of Normandie, graced no man with this Title of Duke, till Edward the Third; who first of all (as is before sayd) exalted the Countie of Cornewall into a Dukedome: vnto the example whereof, many hereditary Dukes were in like manner by our Kings created, howbeit that at this day we haue none.

Next vnto Dukes in order follow

A Marquisse.

Marquesses, who in ancient time were called Gouernours or Wardens of the borders or Marches: a Title vnto vs, before the time of King Richard the Second, vnto vnknowne, who in the tenth yeare of his reigne, by his Royall Charter first created Robert Vere earle of Oxford (his Minion) Marquis of Dublin the Metropolitall Citie of Ireland. By which example, many others afterwards obtained the like Creations by Inheritance.

Concerning either the etymologie or the office of an Earle amongst the Auncients, I haue elsse-where briefly touched some things, and leaue the same to bee more at large by others entreated of: Earles with vs, haue alwayes bene both of greatest authority and dignity, and of much greater antiquitie than either Marquesses or Dukes.

Neither is it any let at all, but that an Earle may be called Earle of any Countie or place, from whence he receiveth no profit, neyther therein holdeth any iurisdiction. Indeed it is in ancient Charters, declared them in old time to haue bene feed-men, and to haue beene rewarded with the third penny of the profit of that Prouince whereof they were called Earles; but now the maner is with vs, that the Titles of Earledomes, are according vnto the Kings pleasure conferred and bestowed, without any possession of the places at all vnto whom, the King, in stead of the third Penny, is wont to appoynt a certayne summe of money, to be yearly received out of the Exchequer, or his Customs: as wee will hereafter more at large declare.

Concerning the beginning of a Vicount with vs, there is no cause why I should from farre deriue it, forasmuch as we had none of them before the time of King Henry the first. For he in the eighteenth yeare of his reigne, created John de Beaumont, or Beaumont, a Vicount: Whereupon that which in ancient time was the name of an office, we now at this day do acknowledge it bee a certayne name and Title of Dignitie, as it were in the middle, betwene an Earle and a Baron; as wee doe a Marquisse; betwene a Duke and an Earle. This Degree of Nobilitie hath inuelture from the Kings themselves, with certain solemne ceremonies,

as the other degrees of Nobility haue.

Now the last of all, as well in order as specially in dignity, come fourth the Barons, whose conioyned power, compared with the rest, hath in the great affaires of the Common-weale alwayes bene the greatest. Of whose beginning, yet truth it selfe doubtfully wauereth. Lucas de Penna in L. f. c. de mancipijs, in his 16. book sayeth. Quod Reges cum plures haberent filios nec omnes Reges posse fieri (quod regnum diuidi nequeat) prospererent: ampla cuique donabant Castra cum iurisdictione & Imperio, unde Barones dicerentur, id est, filij alij excelsiores. For that Kings when they had many sonnes, which they well saw could not all be made Kings (for that a kingdom cannot be diuided) they gaue vnto euery one of them great Castles, with iurisdiction and command, whereof they should be called Barons (that is to say) Their sonnes, higher in degree then others. Other some will haue the word Baro, to haue bene deuied from the Greeke word βαρὺς, signifying grauity. But if it may be lawfull for vs with coniectures to contend, I deeme it not amisse, hereunto to ioine the curious conceite and iudgment of a certaine most learned man, and of great reading, who marking the great power and authority of Barons, suppoeth them in the beginning to haue bene the Generals or Leaders of Nations & people, dispersedly roaming and stragling vp and downe without any certaine resting places, after the empire was rent in sunder, who equally diuiding the lands by force or leaue by them gotten, as it were by tutelary law gouerned the people, holding of them in fealty, and subiect to euery one of their iurisdiccions, eyther with a meere souerainty apart, as Monarchs, or vnder forme other common Prince.

W^h hereof, Isidore happily hath called a man of greatest, middle, and meanest authority and command, Baronem, or a Baron. But they which were so in power and authority in a manner like and equal, were before in Latine called Patres homines (or like men) but of the Frenchmen and Italians, (speaking more contractly) parhommes, and parhomini, and thereof they might, saith he, be called Baroni and Baroni: for with a more easie pronunciation, they in their words easily admit b for p. And to giue more credite to this matter, he ioyneth thereunto the force of diuers Languages: For they whom the Frenchmen from the beginning, called Barons, we in the same sence in ancient time, called Thains, and at this day in english, Lords, whom the Germanes, as it were by a circumlocution, doe more fitly call free-heren, which with vs truly signifieth free Lords; that is to say, Lords hauing free iurisdiccions and territories. But from whence this very word Lord is sprung (which is not so much peculiar vnto Barons as to all Noblemen in general) remaineth yet doubtful.

Forasmuch as we after our manner and fashion, are wont to call all Dukes, Marquesses, Earles, and Vicounts, (and some of the greatest Officers and Magistrates of the kingdome also, although they be not Barons) after the manner of Barons, Lords: some say it to be a primitive & originall word of it selfe, sprung out of the Saxon word Hlaford, which is interpreted Lord: Other some also, suspect it to haue bene a deriuatiue word, and to haue bene first brought out of Burgundy: for it is manifest, the emperor Probus to haue sent hither into Britaine the Burgundians, whom he had overcome in the year 282. Who hauing heere seated and settled themselves, did vnto the Romanes right good seruice, if at any time rebellious did arise or was stirred vp against them, And in that place they commonly call, Allodium, which signifieth, Free and discharged from all homage and seruice: which manner of possession or owner, is euen at this day called Allodium: whom we, resting almost vpon the same reason, do in english call, A Lord. Contrary vnto those Allodij or Lords, are the Leudis or Leudis, as subiect vnto the Allodij, whereof perhaps the word Laydes is vied amongst the Scots, whom they with vs call also Lords.

But as concerning words and etymologies, let euery man chuse as he list: howsoeuer the names be deemed of, it is for the most part of all men granted, that free-heren or Lords (call them whether you list) to haue in all places liued as free-borne men, and of great esteeme, & I verily think them to haue bene the same, whom Cassius calleth Regulos in France: where euen yet vnto this day, certaine of the most olde and ancient Barons, are reported

ported and reputed by a certaine right of their Baronies, to contend for precedence with the new Earles. But how full of authority and dignity the name of a Baron and of a Baronage is, shall very plainly & easily appeare, if wee shall eyther respect the antiquity thereof, as they which of ancient time had hereditary iurisdiction annexed vnto their honour and dignity, and whereof wee at this day retain a shew in our Lords courts, commonly called a court Baron: or looke into the most honourable and reuerend prerogative of the in the cheefest assemblies of the kingdome. For all Dukes, Marquesses, Earles, and Vicounts, haue their seates with the Barons, in the highest assembly of the kingdome, in Parliament, onely by the name of their Baronies: Insomuch, that the greatest Duke sitting in Parliament (although he be placed according to the preheminance of his degree) yet holdeth he his place only by reason of his Barony: neyther is it for any other reason granted vnto our Archbishops and Bishops (as it was in auncient time vnto some Abbots and other of like sort) to sitte there, but that they haue the possession and dignity of some Baronage or Barony annexed and ioyned vnto their Bishopricks; yea, the eldest Sonne of a Duke who soeuer, although he be commonly called an Earle, as also the eldest sonne of an earle, although by the flatterie of custome, and in respect of his blood he be called in Latine Dimita or Dominus in French Signeur, and after our manner, a Lord, yet if wee shall consider the force of the Law, they are not to be numbered either amongst the earles or the Barons, but only to be accounted Esquires; neyther can they challenge any voyce or suitra in the Parliaments of the Kingdome, so long as their Fathers liue. Howbeit, wee haue it often in experience (I confesse) that as often as the King shall see the eldest sonne or heyre of a Duke, Marquess, or of an Earle, as well in wisdom and counsell, as of yeeres ripe and stayed, and whom he shall deeme worthie to bee present at the greatest assemblies of Parliament, him he promoteth vnto the height of that honour: and by a Vittie of Summons (as they terme it) his father yet being aliue, according to the name & stile (if he be the sonne of a Duke) of his Barony, or if he bee the sonne of a Marquess, or of an Earle, by the name whereof he was before called, and whereof hee was heire apparent, and into the inuelture whereof his father also before came.

This I say, sometime is done, and may be done, by the fauour of the Prince onely, whose prerogative is so indeterminate as that he may promote vnto honors, and admit into Parliaments whom hee pleaseth. As for example; it pleased our deceased Queen Elizabeth, in the year 1575. by her Writ of Summons, to call William Poulet, Baron S. John of Basing at this day Marquess of Winchester, (viz) the eldest sonne of John Poulet, Marquess of Winchester, and to assigne vnto him a place amongst the Noblemen of the Vpperhouse, due vnto the ancient Barons of S. John, vntill that their heires male sayling, the heire generall of the same family, had married with the stocke of the Poulets. This I say, the Queene might doe by her royall prerogative onely, the age and towardness of the young Baron being respected and looked into, which he could no way by right haue challenged, his Father yet liuing.

Henrie Stanley, Earle of Darby, was by Writ of Summons called vnto Parliament, his father yet liuing, by the name of Baron Strange of Knokin, and placed in the same seate wherein the Barons Strange of Knokin were wont of ancient time to sit. The like we now of late haue also seene to haue bene done to Gilbert Lord Talbot (at this day Earle of Shrewsburie) sonne and heire to George earle of Shrewsburie, but of late deceased, which places they could not by prescript forme of law as yet challenge vnto them, for that their Fathers then aliue, possessed both the dignities & reuenues of the aforesaid Baronies. So that I say, they were onely by the fauor of the Prince, promoted vnto such honour and degree, whilst that their fathers yet liued.

For wee rightly acknowledge no Barons, but them whom the Kings Royall Maietie hath first by his Charter created, or else the Parliaments preheminance & dignity designed, who so called and once admitted, and in Parliament placed, are alwaies after to bee held and accounted Barons, and to be reckoned amongst the Nobility of the Baronage of England, neither doeth it any where appeare, anie of them to haue bene afterwards reiecte or degraded, except by chance their posselions were so far diminished, as that they were by no means able to maintayne lo great an honour. For, as in ancient time the Romane Senatours, which had waisted or decayed their Senators substance were out of Senate remooued; euen so (I say) such are either of their own accord to abla n from coming into the vpper house of our Parliament, or else (I may say perhaps) are not therinto admitted, althogh that they for euer still retainne the stile and name of their Barony.

And these be they whom we acknowledge to be Named Noblemen: But how they bee now amongst themselves together, and feuerally apart, both in dignitie and preheminance distinguished, is out of the forme of their Creations or admissions to be better discerned: which things we will declare by the Letters Patents, or of Summons, giuen vnto euery one of them at the time of their Creation, (which Letters, we by two names call, viz: Royall Charters, and Parliament Writts) and by the ceremonies after our manner, ioyned into their Inuecture, and the custome of their precedencie, beginning first with the Baron himselfe.

For why, the name of the Baronage of England is right famous, and more honorable then the rest: resembling the ancient (I heare of a Reuerend Romane Father, registered to be one of his counsell of estate, & of the Senatory Dignity; and with vs giuing an entrance vnto all the higher degrees of honor, as did that among the ancient Romanes.

In elder time, it was for a certain space giuen vnto none, but vnto men for their martiall prowesse renowned, vnto whom the ensigne of a Barony was also giuen; as was the right to weare a Ring of Gold granted vnto the Romane Gentlemen. But afterward, not onely they whom martiall prowesse had commended, but euen they also whom their Nobility of birth, theyr manners, fortune, or wisdom hadde at home ennobled, were wont by the Kings Writ of Summons, to be called forth vnto the high assembly of Parliament. And at length also, King Henrie the 6. brought in the fashion to create some by this very name, by vertue of his Royall Charter:

which manner of forme and fashion, together with that other of calling by Writ of Summons vnto the Parliament, we onely at this day haue in vse, in forme following.

Letters of Summons, or Parliament Writts (as they call them) for the promoting of any one, or of whomsoever, vnto the Dignity of a Baron, in full Assembly of Parliament, are in a prescript appointed forme in this sort made: Changing onely such things as are of order to be changed.

ELIZABETH, by the Grace of God, Queen of England, France, and Ireland, Defendresse of the Faith, &c. Vnto her faithfull and well-beloued Henry Norris of Ricot Knight, Greeting. Forasmuch, as Wee by the aduice and consent of our Councell, for certaine high and urgent causes, concerning the estate & defence of our kingdom of England, and of the English Church, haue appointed a certain Parliament of ours, to be holden at our Citie of Westminster, the eight day of May, next comming, and there to haue speech and conference with you, and with the Prelates, the States, and Nobility of our sayde Kingdom: Wee firmly enioyne & command you, upon the Faith and Allegiance wherein you are vnto vs bound, that the weight of the aforesaid businesse, and the imminent dangers considered, all excuse whatsoeuer set apart, you be there personally present the said place aforesaid, to conserue with vs, & with our Prelates and Nobility aforesaid, concerning the aforesaid businesse, & there to shew your aduice. And of this, as you loue vs, and honour the safeguard & defence of our Kingdom, and the Church aforesaid, and the good dispatch of the affairs aforesaid, in no wise faile you.

Witness Our selfe, the day of _____ in the year of Our reigne the fourteenth.

ELIZABETH by the Grace of God, of England, France, and Ireland, Queen, Defendresse of the Faith, &c. Vnto all Archbishops, Marquesses, Earles, Vicounts, Bishops, Barons, Knights, Governours, Free-borne men, and all our Officers, Ministers, and Subiects, whomsoever, vnto whom these presents Letters shall come, greeting. Wee well perceiue and see the might and tpe of our Royall Dignity, not onely to be beautified, but encreased also, whilst the titles of honors, are by vs conferred vnto men for their vertues renowned, and in our most weighty affaires well experienced. For Wee thinke our Royall Crowne to be so much the more adorned and enriched, when as Wee call and promote graue and wise Men, especially such as are for the Nobility of their stocke famous, and for their wisdom renowned and mighty, into part of our Royall Councell, vnto the degrees of Honour and Dignity, and the gouernment of the Common-weale. Wherefore, Wee considering the long seruike, which our well-beloued and faithfull Councellor William Cecil, our principall Secretary, hath many waies done, as well in the time of our Progenitors, Kings of this kingdom, as also his faithfull, and most pleasing loyalty towards vs at all times, euen from the first beginning of our Reigne, not onely in the notable and graue affaires of Councell, but beside also, hath not ceased daily to doe, in all other expelitions for our Kingdom in general: and also the circumspection, courage, wisdom, dexterity, integrity, prouidence, care, and fidelity of him the said William Cecil, towards vs, our Crown, and Dignity.

Know you therefore, that Wee of our speciall Grace, certaine knowledge, and meere meritation, haue set, giuen, and in our Countie of Northampton promoted, made, and created, and by the tenor of these presents, do set, ordaine, and create him the aforesaid William Cecil, vnto the stile, degree, dignity and honor, of Baron of Burghley: and vnto the said William, haue imposed, giuen, and granted, and by these presents, doe impose, giue, and grant, the Name, Stile, and Title of the Baron of Burghley. To haue, and to hold, the same Stile, Degree, Dignity, Stile, Title, Name, and Honour, vnto him the aforesaid William, and the heyres male issuing of his body for euer. Willing and by these presents for vs, Our heyres and successors granting, that the aforesaid William, and his heyres male aforesaid, may successively beare and haue, and euery one of them may haue and beare the said Name, Stile, Degree, Stile, Dignity, Title, and Honour: and may be called and stiled, and euery one of them may be called and stiled by the name of the Baron of Burghley. And that he the said William and his heyres male aforesaid, shall successively in all things, be holde for Barons of Burghley: and shall so be used and reputed, & that euery one of them shall be used, holden, and reputed, as Barons. And that the said William, and his heyres male aforesaid, may haue, hold, and possesse, and their heyres male also aforesaid, and euery one of them may as Barons haue, hold, and possesse a seate place, and voice in our Parliaments and Councells, amongst other Barons, within our kingdom of England. And also the said William, and his heyres male aforesaid, may haue, enioy, and vse, and euery one of them, shall by the name of the Baron of Burghley, haue, enioy, & vse, all the Rights, Priuileges, Prebendunes, and Immunities of right, and lawfully belonging vnto the state of a Baron in all things, which other the Barons of our said Kingdom of England, in former times, in better sort, more honourably and more quietly, used and enioyed, or at this present doe enioy and vse: and this without any fine or fee, great or small, to be therefore to or vs, in any wise giuen, paid, or made into our Humpsey of our Chancery, or elsewhere, for that expresse mention of the certainty of the premises or of any of them, &c. These being witnesses. The most reuerend father in Christ, Matthew Archbishop of Canterbury, Primate and Metropolitan of all England, our wellbeloued & faithfull Councellor, Nicholas Bacon, knight, Keeper of our great Seale of England, and also our wellbeloued Cousins and Councellors, William Marquess of Northampton, Henry Earle of Arundell, Thomas Earle of Suffolke, President of our Councell in the North parts of our Kingdom, Henry Earle of Huntingdon, Ambrose Earle of Warwick, Master of the Ceremonie, Francis Earle of Bedford, Robert Earle of Leicester, Attaine of our House, Arse, Walter Vicount Hereford, Antonie Vicount Mountague: And also the reuerend Fathers in Christ, Edwin byshop of London, Nicholas byshop of Worcester, Edmund byshop of Rochester, William byshop of Chester: And also our wel-beloued and faithfull William Lord Lumley, James Lord Mountjoy, Henrie Lord Cromwel, Thomas Lord Paget, Roger Lord North. And our welbeloued & faithfull Councillors, Francis Knols, knight, Treasurer of our household, &c. James Crofts knight, Master Controller of our household, &c. Given vnder our hand, at Westminster, the 2. of February, in the 23. yeare of our reigne. By the Queene her selfe, according to the aforesaid date, by the authority of the Parliament.

The rites and Ceremonies vsed in Creating Barons by Charter.

William Cecil Knight, attired in a robe and Mantle, and in this forme brought forth, the xv. day of Februarie, the xiii. yeare of the reigne of Queene Elizabeth, was in the royall Pallace at Westminster, in a great assembly of Countiers, made Baron of Burgley. First, the Heralds go before, by two and two together, whom Garter alone followeth, carrying in his handes the Royall Charter; Henry Cary, Baron of Hunsdon, carried the Barons Cloake: after whome followed William Cecil Knight, in the midst, betwixt Edward Baron Clinton, on the right hand, and William Brooke Baron Cobham on the lefte: who entering into the Chamber of salutation (which wee commonly call the Presence Chamber) & making there obedience thrice, approached vnto her royall Maiesty, where Garter first deliuered the Charter to the Earle of Sussex, then being Chamberlain of the Queenes house, who gaue the same vnto the Queene, and she againe deliuered the same vnto John Wolley Esquire, to be read: VVhere, at the word (inuestimus, or we haue inuested) the Queen put vpon him the Barons Cloake, and the Charter being read, pronounced him the sayde William Cecil, Baron of Burgley, and his heyres male after him, as is before declared.

VVhich thing being done, the charter was againe deliuered vnto the Queene, who forthwith gaue it to the Baron to be kepte; who at length, after most great thankes giuen her, for the honour by him receiued, in his honourable attire, with a great noise and sound of Trumpets, departed to dinner, euen in the same manner that he came in.

After mid dinner, Garter with the rest of the Queenes Heralds, comming neere vnto the Table, and hauing first altogether cryed aloud, Largeesse, forthwith proclaimed the Queenes stile in Latine, French and English, and so with-drawing themselves a litle farther off, and againe repeating Largeesse, he repeated the stile of the new Baron in these words: Du tres-noble Seigneur Guliaulme Cecil Chenalter, Baron de Burghley: and so hauing done their obedience, and altogether crying twice Largeesse, they departed.

The manner and forme of admitting of Barons by Rescript or Writ.

His (I say) is the manner of creating of the Named Nobility, by royall Charters: now a fewe things remaine, to shew how the newe Barons are by VVrits of Summons chosen into the Parliaments: and in what sort they being thether called, are there placed. The forme of the writ wee haue before shewed, and the forme of theyr Admission, is this.

Henry Compton, Henry Cheyney, & Henry Norreis Knights, were by writs, called to be present at the Parliament at Westminster, ypon Thursday the 8. day of May, in the 14. yeare of the reigne of Q. Elizabeth, ypon which day, after that the Nobles were set on their seats, these three attending without, were by turnes in this manner brought in, and admitted into the vpper house. Garter K. at Armes, came before bare-headed, hailing on his royall coat, whom two of the last made Barons, attired in their Cloaks, robes, and Mantles followed, bringing in the knight that was to be in his new honour inuested, in the middle betwixt them. Him at length they bring vnto the Chancellor, vnto whome the Knight hauing made once or twice Obedyance, deliuereth his Writ of Sum-

mons to be read, wherein he declareth by what power & authority he is come thether: the Chancellor after the writ read with great courttesie welcomming him, dismisseth the new Baron (in his Barons attire) to take his place, which place (Garter going before them) they shewe vnto him: but the writ is by the Chancellour deliuered vnto the Clarke of the Parliament to be laid vp.

In the like manner were the other two Knights afterward brought in and admitted, and in their due order in their seates placed. So they which entred into the Parliament but Knights onely, goe out thence and are so accounted Barons, and enioy the like honor with the rest of the Barons of the kingdom.

The Kings Charter for the Creating of a Vicount.

The Copy of the L. Patents of K. Henrie the VI. creating Jo. Beaumont, vicount of Beaumont.

HEnry, by the grace of God, King of England, and of France, Lord of Ireland, &c. To all Arch-Bishops, Bishops, Abbots, Priors, Dukes, Earles, Barons, Iustices, Sheriffes, Governours, Bayliffes, Ministers, and other his faithfull Subiects, vnto whome, &c. Greeting. Know you, that we, when as wee fee it to beseme our Maiestie, with principall honors to promote them, who with dutifull seruice dayly attend vs, especially in such things which proceed from our meere Prerogatiue & gracious bounty; and them chiefly, whom the remembrance of their fathers and former Ancestors hath ennobled, and the merites of their owne vertues haue with manifest obedience and loyalty graced: that vertue so rewarded, may in it selfe be strengthened, and withall allure many vnto vertuous actions.

Heereof it is, that wee considering the Noble discent of our most dearely beloved cosine John Lord of Beaumont, & the good seruices which his Ancestors faithfully performed vnto our Progenitours, together with the most acceptable Offices which he euen from his infancy, hath hitherto commendably done vnto vs, and yet dayly performeth; as he desireth hereafter to continue the same, and to doe vs so much the more better honour: VVee of our especiall Grace, in this our present Parliament, glue vnto the aforesaid John Lord of Beaumont our cosine, and the heires male of his bodie, the name of the Vicount of Beaumont; and do really inuest him the said John, with the Armes of the Vicount of Beaumont, and assigne vnto him in our Parliaments, Councils, and other assemblies, a place about all the other Barons in our Kingdome. Vnto whom as it shall be more fit, and as it is shewed in the very State of a Vicount aforesayde, wee of our meere motion and bountie, haue giuen and graunted for vs and our heyres, as much as in vs is, vnto the aforesaid John and his heyres, together with the Name, Armes, and place aforesaid, twentie Markes to be yearly receiued vnto him, and to his heires male yssuing out of his owne body, out of the former issues and profits, of our countie of Lincolne, to bee paid by the hands of the Sheriffe of the sayde county for the time being, at the Termes of Easter and S. Michael, by equall portions. To haue & to hold to him and his heires aforesaid, the Name, armes, place, and twenty Marks as aforesaid for euer; for that expresse mention, &c. VVritesse our selfe at Redding, the twelfth of February, in the eighteenth yeare of our reigne.

By the Writ of our Primate Seale.

Here is so great a similitude and likeness in the Rites and ceremonies in creating of a Vicount, with those which are vsed in the creating of a Baron, as that but chaunging such things as are of necessity to be chaunged, a man would thinke them almost the very same. But this difference there onely is; that a Baron is conducted betwixt two Barons, whereas a Vicount hath an Earle on his right hand, and a Baron on his left (in case there want Vicounts) to conduct him, and is by halfe a gird vpon his shoulder about a Baron, as by the Picture following in the next Page appeareth.

¶ The Royall Charter for the creating of an Earle.

The Copie of the Letters
patents of Q.
Elizabeth,
creating Walter Deucreux
earle of Essex.

Elizabeth, by the grace of God, Queene of England, France, and Ireland, Defendresse of the faith, &c. Vnto all and singular Archbishops, Dukes, Marqueses, Earles, Vicounts, Bishops, Barons, and all others, vnto whom &c. Greeting. Seeing that they whom the Diuine providence hath put and placed in a Monarchy and Royall Seate, that they being as it were the Lieutenants of him that heauenly Monarch, vpon earth, may well, vprightly, religiously, decently, and wholesomely rule, gouerne and maintaine, whatsoever is to their custody and government by God himselfe giuen and committed: and that the Monarchs in their Monarchies, represent the same thing that the eyes do in the body, whose office it is to direct all the members of the body: Monarchs and Princes therefore as eyes of the Commonweale, ought diligently to intend, to looke about, and to search into all States and degrees of their Empire, without which wee must needs confesse, no ciuill administration, or politick gouernement, to be possibly made or framed. And so necessary is the preferuation of orders and degrees of men in great Empires, as that after they once see the Nobility of the States and Degrees, broken, rent, impaired, or shaken, or (as many things happen after the manner of men) by death afflicted or weakened, they ought with all speed to amend, repaire, increafe, and augment the same: so that others, whom both their owne vertues, and the glory of their Stocke and Ancestors hath ennobled, being called vnto Nobilitie and honour, the glorie of Degrees and States may for euer in the glorie and brightnesse thereof bee preferred and kept. Wherefore wee now seeing one honourable and glorious order of Nobilitie amongst the rest to growe few, and knowing right well our most famous and renowned Cousin Walter Vicount Hereford, Knight of our most Noble order of the Garter, Lord Ferrers of Chartley, worthily and valiantly to haue for vs behaued himselfe in that sedition tumult of wicked Traytors and Rebels, raised of most wicked and vngacious men in the North parts of our kingdom: In which tumult and power of armed Traytors, a most great and horrible danger was, not vnto our Kingdome onely, but euen vnto our person also intended: so that partly by his conduct, not onelie the cruell furie and rage of the Traytors and Rebels, was there in that place repressed, but many of the Rebels also were vnto our obedience reduced, and so the state of our Kingdome before sore troubled, became againe to be well quieted and pacified.

Wee therefore, for these causes and things by him so worthily performed, willing to promote him the sayde Walter vnto the State, Honour and Dignitie, of the Earle of Essex: and for that the aforesayde Walter is descended of the Noble Stocke and Family of the Bourchiers, late Earles of Essex, & is by the common Law of our Kingdome, next heire vnto Henry Bourchier late Earle of Essex. Know you, that wee of our especiall grace, certaine knowledge, & mere motion, haue erected, created & promoted the said Walter to be Earle of Essex, and also to the state, degree, dignity and honour of the Earle of Essex: and by the Tenour of these presents, do erect, create, and promote him to be Earle of Essex. And vnto the same Walter haue imposed, giuen, and bestowed the name, stile, and title of the Earle of Essex, and by these presents, do impose, giue, and bestow the same. And him the said Walter, in such the state, title, honour, and dignity of the Earle of Essex, by the girtting vnto him of a Sword, and the putting on of a Cap of Honour, and a Coronet of Gold, do grace, inuest, and really ennoble by these presents. To haue and to hold the state, degree, dignitie, stile, title, name, and honour of the Earle of Essex aforesaid, with all and singular the preeminences, honours, and other such things whatsoever vnto the state of an Earle appertaining or belonging, vnto the aforesayd Walter, and the heires male issuing from his bodie for euer. Willing, and by these presents, granting for vs, our heires, heires & successors, that the said Walter, and his heires male aforesaid, shall the name, state, degree, dignity, stile, and honour aforesaid, successively haue & beare: and shall by the name of the Earle of Essex aforesaid, be called, and stiled, and euerie one of them shall be called & stiled. And that the said Walter and his heires aforesaid, shall in all things successively be holden, vsed, and reputed, and euerie one of them shall be holden, vsed, and reputed, as Earles of Essex. And the said Walter and his heires male, shall haue, hold, and possesse, and euerie one of them shall haue, holde, and possesse a place in our Parliaments, and in the Parliaments of our Heires and Successours within our Kingdome of England, among the other earles, as earle of Essex; and in such sort, as the aforesayde Henry Bourchier, late earle of Essex had, held, and possessed the same.

And the said Walter also, and his heires aforesaid, shall enioy and vse, and euerie one of them by the name of the earle of Essex, shall enioy and vse all & euerie the rights, priuileges, preeminences, and immunities in all things orderly and of right vnto the state of an Earle belonging; and which other earles in all things, orderly & of right, haue before these times, in better wise more honourably and quietly vsed and enioyed, or do at this present enioy and vse.

And for because, that as the height of State and Honour encreaseth, so greater charges and burdens necessarily encrease also: and that hee the sayd Walter and his heires aforesaid, and euerie one of them may the better, more seemely, and honorably maintaine & support the aforesaid state of the earle of Essex, and the burdens lying vpon him the said Walter and his heires: Wee therefore of our more abundant grace, haue giuen and granted, and by these presents doe giue and graunt, for vs, our heires and successors, vnto the aforesaid Walter, and his heires aforesaid, for euer, twenty pound of Fee, or yearly rent, to be yearly received, of the issues, profits, and reuenues, of our great and litle Custome and Subsidie graunted vnto vs, or hereafter to be granted vnto vs, our heires and successors, aising, growing, or coming, within the Port of our honorable Citie of London, by the hands of our Customers and Collectors, or the Customers and Collectors of our Heyres and Successors there, for the time being, at the Termes of St. Michael, and Easter, by euen portions, to be euerie year payed. By reason that expresse mention of the true yearly valour, or of any other valour or certainty of the premises, or of any of the, or of any other gifts or grants by vs, or any of our Progenitors, before these times made vnto the aforesaid Walter earle of Essex, in these presents appeareth not: or any Statute, Ordinance, Act, Prouision, Proclamation, or restriction to the contrary thereof, before had, made, set forth, or provided, or any other thing, cause, or matter whatsoever, in any thing notwithstanding.

These being VVitneses. Our faithfull Councillor, Nicholas Bacon knight, Keeper of our great Seale of england: and our most wel beloued Cousin, Edward earle of Oxford, Lord Chamberlaine of england, Reinold earle of Kent, William earle of Worcester, knight of the most Noble order of the Garter, Henry earle of Kutland, Thomas earle of Suffex, of our aforesaid order of the Garter knight, and President of our Councill in the North parts of our kingdome of england: Henry earle of Huntingdon, of the aforesaid Order, &c. Ambrose earle of Warwicke, of the aforesaid Order, &c. Edward earle of Hertford, Robert earle of Leicester, of the Order aforesaid, &c. Thomas Vicount Simon. And also the reuerend Fathers in Christ, Edmund Bishop of Swum, & Edmund Bishop of Recheiter, our Almoner, And also our wel-beloued and faithfull, William Lord Howard of Effingham, Lord Chamberlaine of our House, of the Order of the Garter aforesaid, &c. William Lord of Burghley, our principall Secretary of the Order aforesaid, &c. Henry Lord Strange, Arthur Lord Gray of Wilton, of the order aforesaid: William Lord Sunder, Edward Lord Windsor, Thomas Lord Wharfen, Robert Lord Rich, Thomas Lord Paget, John Lord Darcey of Chiche, Robert Lord North, Edmund Lord Chandos, of the aforesaid Order of the Garter, &c. Thomas Lord of Buckingham, William Lord Devenare, Barons, Francis Knakes knight, Treasurer of our House, James Croftes, Knight, Controuller of our House. And our well-beloued and faithfull

Henry Sidney Knight of the aforeſaid Order, &c. and Lord President of our Council in the Marches of Wales: William Cordall Knight, Maister of the Rolles of our Chancery, and others. Given vnder our hand, at our Mannour of Greenwich, the fourth day of May, in the fourteenth year of our reigne. 1572.

CHAP. IX.

¶ The Rites and Ceremonies of creating of an Earle.

THe same Walter Fereux, Baron Ferrers of Chartley, & Vicount Hereford, hauing on an inner Gowne of purple silke, and covered with a Roab of Eſlate, & a veluet Mantell of the same colour, and going in the middle betwixt the erle of Suffex on his right hand, and the erle of Huntingdon on his left, both of them in their Roabs was conducted from the Queens Chappell vnto the Queens presence. Next before him went the earle of Leicester, carrying a Cap of Eſlate, and a Coronet of Gold: & the earle of Bedford on the left hand, bearing before him a Sword, with the Hilt vpward. Before these also went Garter, the chiefe K. of Armes with the Charter alone, and before him al the rest of the Herald's, by two & two together. When they were now come vnto the Chamber of Presence, after they had thrice made their most lowe obeisance, with some little space betwixt, they drew neare vnto the Queene then sitting in her Chaire of Eſlate, where the aforeſaid Walter kneeled downe, the rest standing by. There the Charter was first deliuered vnto the Queene, who gaue it to William Cicill, Baron of Burghley, who deliuered the same vnto William Cordell Knight, Maister of the Rolles, to reade it aloud. Where at these words (in the Charter) Gladio cinet unanimus, the Queen put about his necke a Sword, hanging overthwart towards his left hand: and at the word's Cappa & Circuli aurei, she also put vpon his head a Cap, with a little Coronet. And afterward reading that which was left, pronounced him the said Walter before vicount Hereford, now created erle of Essex, for him and his heires male, as in the Charter it selfe before set downe more at large appeareth. These things being done, the same Maister of the Rolles (instead of the Secretary, for the helping of whom he had read the charter) deliuered it to the Earle of Oxford, Great Chamberlaine of England: but he deliuered it vnto the Queene, who also gaue the same vnto the Earle of Essex to be kept. But he after great thanks, with greatell humility giuen, withdrew himselfe aside amongst the other Noblemen standing there by, expecting another, comming to be created earle. In like maner, & at the ſame time also, Edward Baron of Clynton and Say, and Admirall of England, was for himselfe and his heires male, created earle of Lincoln.

These things altogether finished, they departed in the same order that they came in, with the Trumpets aloud sounding, whom the Herald's receiued. Garter went before, whom the new Earles followed in the middle, betwixt the Earles of Suffex and Huntingdon. And being so attired in the Ornaments of their creations, were conducted to dinner into a dining Chamber prepared for the same purpose. Where, after they had sit a space, at the comming in of the second course, Garter with the rest of the Herald's entering into the dyning Chamber, crying aloud, Largeſſe; he alone proclaimed the Queens stile, first in Latine, after in French, and thirdly in english: and hauing twice repeated the word Largeſſe, & withdrawing themselves a little farther from the Table, proclaimed the stile of these last created Earles, in french and english in these words.

Edward by the grace of God, King of England & of France, Lord of Ireland, &c. Vnto all Archbishops, Bishops, Abbots, Priors, Dukes, Earles, Barons, Iustices, Sherifffes, Gouernours, Ministers, Balmes, and all his faithfull subiects; greeting. Know you, that forasmuch as our Royall Maiesty, after most great victories obtained ouer our enemies, is by the power of Almighty God promoted vnto the Regall Dignitie, and our Hereditary Royall seate: and lest that so great glorie of our Name, should euen in the verie rising thereof, for want of Children, faile, it came most happily to passe, that we were in lawfull marriage ioyned vnto our best beloued wife, Elizabeth, Queene of England, of whom we haue raised certaine more strong stayes of our future Royall Posterity, that is to say, Edward our eldest Sonne, Prince of Wales, Duke of Cornwall, and Earle of Chester; Richard Duke of Shrewsbury and of Yorke; with a notable encrease of other our Children also: which thing greatly both perswadeth and enforceth vs, euen from our heart, to giue the greatest thanks wee possibly can, vnto the most glorious and high GOD, Defender of our Royall right, and Reuenger of our wrongs; and with gracious fauours to prosecute, and with greater honour and fauour to grace and beautifie her the same our wife, hauing of vs best deserued, and all her Progeny. But to the intent that our first begotten Sonne aforesayd, and the rest of our best beloued Children, compassed about with the faithfull, trusty, and sure strength of their neare and deare friends, as it were with certaine walles, may the more strongly be defended; we will not passe ouer vnrewarded, Thomas Grey their Brother by the Mothers side; whose noble Stocke, exceeding towardliness, worthy valour, but most of all, whose honourable vertues, we with the sincere affection of loue embrace: for

why it seemes a thing most certain, them being brought vp in naturall society, and bound together with that sweete remembrance, them to haue dwell in the same dwelling place before they were borne, to beare a certaine common, and especial loue amongst themselves for euer: and that they who in so strait a degree of consanguinity & loue are ioyned together, if any one of them should bee of so small dignity and reputation, as that for poverty hee should not be able honourably to serue his greater kinsman when he ought so to do: we thinke it not vnbecominge vs to provide therefore, so as shall best seeme vs. And therefore we willing that the sayde Thomas should bee promoted with a greater patrimony, and more notable Titles of honour and dignity, that so he may stand in better stead; and become a greater Ornament vnto vs, our Children, and the Common-weale: of our speciall grace, certaine knowledge, & meere motion, do ordaine, make, and create him the said Thomas, to be Marquesse Dorset; and also by these presents vnto the said Thomas, giue and grant, the stile, honour, state, title and dignity of Marquesse Dorset: and by the Giding vnto him of a Sword, and by the putting on of a Cap of Honour, do inuest him of the stile, title, name and honour of Marquesse of the place aforesaid; together with all the praeminences vnto the same honour and dignity appertaining and belonging. To haue and to hold the said name, stile, honour, state, title, and dignity of Marquesse Dorset, together with all the appurtenances, dignities, and other things whatsoever, vnto the state of a Marquesse of our kingdom of England, as well in our Sessions, Parliaments and Councells, and of our heires, or otherwise howsoever it be vnto the same honour and dignity appertaining and belonging, vnto the aforesayde Thomas and his heyres male issuing out of his body for euer. And also of our more plentifull grace we haue giuen and graunted, and by these presents do giue and graunt vnto the aforesaid Marquesse towards the supportation of the sayde name, stile, honour, state, title and dignity, 35. pounds of lawfull money of England. To be had, leui'd & receiued yearly vnto the sayd Marquesse, and the same his heires aforesaid, (viz.) twenty pounds there-

IN the yeare one thousand siue hundred forty seven, the xvii. of the Moneth of February, and in the first yeare of the Reigo of Edward the sixt of that name, The Nobility being called together and assembled into the Tower of London. Edward Seymour, the aforesaid Earle of Hertford the kings Vnkle, & Protector of the kingdom, with others promoted vnto the diuers degrees of Nobility, was in this wise created D. of Somerset. He himselfe being apparelled in an inner Robe of honour, the Heralds went before him in their Heralds coates, the chiefe of whom, Garter following alone, carried the Charter. The Earles of Shrewsbury and of Oxford, going together, the Earle of Shrewsbury on the right hand, carried a Verge of gold, & the earle of Oxford on the left, carried the Dukes Cap, with a Coronet of gold. Next vnto whom followed the Earle of Arundell, carrying a Sword with the hilts vpward. At length the earle of Hertford himselfe was conducted in the midst, betwixt the Duke of Suffolke, and the Marquesse of Dorchester: When they in this manner, attired in their Robes of honour, were come into the Chamber of Salutation (which they commonly call The refectory Chamber) they after thrice obeysance made, went vnto the king, sitting in his chayre of Estate: where forth-with the earle kneeled downe, all the rest standing about him, Garter king of Heralds, deliuered the Charter vnto Baron Paget, the Kings Secretary, who gaue the same vnto the King, and he deliuered it vnto him againe to be read aloud. Out of the excellency of Royall preheminance, like as beams from the Sun, so do inferior honours proceed: neyther doth the integrity of the royall luster and brightnesse, by the naturall disposition of the light, affoording light fro light, feele any losse or detriment by such borrowed light: yea, the Royall Scepter is also much the more extolled, and the Regall Throne exalted, by how much the more Nobles, Preheminences, and Honours are vnder the power and command thereof.

And this worthy consideration allureth and induceth vs, which desire the encrease of the Name and Honour of our first begotten and best beloved Sonne, Edward, in whom we behold and see our selues to bee honoured, and our royall house also, and our people subiect vnto vs; hoping by the grace of God (by coniecture taken of his gracious future proceeding to be the more honorably strengthened, that wee may with honour preuent, and with abundant grace prosecute him, who in reputation of vs, is deemed the same person with vs. VVherefore, by the Councell and consent of the Prelats, Dukes, Earles, Vicounts, and Barons of our kingdom, being in our present Parliament, we haue made and created, and by these presents make and create him the said Edward, Prince of Wales, and Earle of Chester. CHAP. XVII.

Of the Crowning of the King.

Concerning Charters & Writs of Summons vnto Parliament, whereby the Kinges of England, onely upon their good liking, & mere motion (as they use to say) are wont to conferre Named Nobility, we haue already spoken: and now at length we are come vnto the rites and Ceremonies of the Coronation of the Kinges themselves, as they are after our manner with vs Crowned. Concerning which, a few things are now to be said.

Nothing assuredly is more excellent then the Royall dignity, if we shall respect the Maiesty of the name of a King, either among the nations or in holie Scriptures. The Romanes in ancient time, appointed three Degrees of their greatest Dignities, of all which, the Regall power was the cheefest and highest. Next after the dignity of a King was the Dictatorship, in the third place, followed the power which the Generall of their Armies had, whom they called Imperator. Hee that great Julius Caesar, when after the victory of Pharsalia, had beene oftentimes by his army saluted Imperator, yet for all that, vsed he not the name of Imperator, but Dictator. For why, the name of a King, after the time of Tarquinius, was for a great while growne into hatred, and become odious in the Citie. Howbeit, at such time as he was about to make an expedition against the Parthians, hee affected to bee called a King: affirming it to be contained in the Books of the Sybls, the Parthians not possible to bee conquered and subdued but by a King.

The Dictator's most high power, was in all things like vnto the power of a King: and such as a man may say to haue bin equall vnto the power of a King. This was (as Varro witnesseth) chaunged into a great Magistrate, whom they called Magistrum Ciuum (or Maister of the Citizens) which manner of Gouvernour of a Citie, the Germanes vied to call, Burgue Meistre.

The name of Imperator or Emperors, was at first but an Office in an Army, and a bare Title; which yet at length became a dignity of greater State and Maiesty; then any of the rest; and yet at length so fell, as that the Maiesty and magnificence of the Christian world, is maintained onely by the power of Kings. Vnto foure of whom onely, it is written to haue bene proper in ancient time to bee annointed, viz. vnto the Kings of Ierusalem, of England, of France, and of Sicily.

The French writers report, the French Kinges within the bounds of their owne kingdom, to be styled Imperatores or Emperors. Chassaneus also affirmeth, the king of England, to bee in England, a Monarke. And if the name of Christianissimi, or the most Christian king, bee glorious vnto the French Kinges, and the name of Catholici or Catholique vnto the kings of Spain; the Kinges of England haue also a style whereof to reioyce, as (viz:) not in Title, onely to be styled Fidei Christiana & Catholica Defensores, or Defenders of the Christian and Catholique Faith, but euen with vndaunted Maiesty, to be of both acknowledged the great Champions and Protectors of the same. But concerning attributes or additions of Stiles and Titles, I list not for to stricke. But, seeing that the kings of God for their royall dignity, giue God the thanks onely; and that it is onely by the grace of God (as they vse to say) by hereditary succession, by them obtained: they hold it vnto them confirmed by the suffrages of the people, with the requisite forme and ceremonies of Coronation, Consecration, and Inunction. Which being of ancient time (the king; dome sore shaken with Danish wars) ofte kept at Kingston vpon Thames, is now vsually holden and made at Westminster, a city ioyning vnto the city of London, in forme following.

Edward Seymour, erle of Hertford, King Edward his Vncle, accompanied with most of the Nobilitie of the whole Kingdome, forthwith went to Enfield (in the Countie of Middlesex) vnto Edward, now at length (by right of succession vnto his Father Henry) King of England, France and Ireland. Whom the Munday following (viz.) the last of January, he with the great applause of the Citie, and of the people by the way as hee went, was brought from thence vnto the Tower of London.

The same day the Heralds from an high Stage set vp in the midst of Westminster hall (with a great found of Trumpets) out of a Royall Charter, sealed with the great Seale of the kingdome, proclaimed the death of the aforesaid King Henry the eight, and the Inauguration of K. Edward the sixt to come. Which Charter was dated the 31 day of Ianuarie, and the first yeare of King Edward.

Vpon Friday following (viz.) the 4. of February, it was through the most famous places of the City of London, by the Heralds proclaimed and notified, that whosoever they were which by right of Fee, were bound at the Coronations of Kings, to performe their Offices or Seruices, should vnto the Kings Commissioners therefore appoynted, in the White hall, hall, the vij. of February exhibite their petitions: who according to the ancient custome of the kingdome, should determine vnto euery man their rights and seruices, against the twentieth of the same moneth, the day appointed for the Coronation of the King.

Vpon Thursday (which was the first day of February) the Nobility and States of the Kingdome assembled into the Chamber of Prefence (as they call it) euery one of them in order one by one, did their reuerence and duty vnto the King, sitting in his Royall Seate, kissing his hand, and saying; Long liue the Kings Majestie.

After that the Chancellour declared vnto him the Will of his dead Father, and the Names of his Executors: and that for lacke of yeares, he was not yet himselfe able to gouerne his Kingdome (for now hee was but going vpon the tenth yeare of his age) he told them, that the Earle of Hertford his Vncle, was by common suffrages chosen Tutor of his person, and Protector of his Kingdome. VVhich when the King had approued, and that the erle refused not that charge, they altogether, and oftentimes doubled and redoubled; Long liue our King Edward: and God saue our King.

The Earle of Rutland offered vnto him a paire of golden Spurres.

The Duke of Suffolke gaue vnto him the golden Globe.

The Earle of Oxford deliuered him the other Royalties.

Hee in this manner attired with all Royall Ornaments (viz.) apparelled with a royall Roabe, and crowned with a Crowne vpon his head, carrying in his right hand a Scepter, and a golden Globe in his left, beeing brought vnto the Throne, hee sat downe in the Chaire of S^t. Edward the King. Where first the Duke of Sommer set Protector of England, vpon his knees in formall words did his due homage and fealty vnto the King and his heires, the kings of England: whom the Archbishoppe of Canterbury followed and kissed the Kings knee. The same againe did all the rest of the Nobility, which could so doe. But such as stood about (and with the shortnesse of the time excluded, could not come nie) the Protectour vpon his knees pronouncing their homage, holding vp their hands, cryed out with loude voyces together, Long liue EDWARD the sixt our King.

Diuine seruice at length being done by the Archbishop and two Bishops, the King at the offering time came downe vnto the Altar, where in the patten of S^t. Edwards Chalice, he offered an hallowed little Crust or Cruet of Wine, and a pound of gold: and then having bowed downe his head, the Archbishop sayde certaine Prayers, and blessed the King, and so returning vnto his Throne, there kissed the Pax being offered him.

Last of all, hee being brought vnto the Altar, the Archbishop taking the Crowne Crowne from off his head, layde it vpon the Altar. From thence the King going into the Trauers, deliuered his royall Ornaments vnto the Deane of Westminster to be layde vpon the Altar: and in his inner purple Gowne (commonly called a Surcoat) furred with Ermins, with a Crowne vpon his head, returning vnto Westminster Hall in the same order wee before saide; staued a while in that chamber (which we call the Court of Wardes) vntill the Tables were royally furnished. The stately furniture of the Hall at that time, the multitude of Tables, the varietie of dishes and sauces, and the delicate magnificence of the feast, I willingly passe ouer.

Yet this it is worthy to remember, that the Earles of Oxford & Huntingdon held water vnto the King, which the Earle of Huntingdon before tasted.

The Earle of Rutland held the Towell.

The Marquesse of Northampton was the Caruer, & before tasted the Dishes.

The Earle of Suffex was Sewer of the first course, and placed it vpon the Table.

Before the coming in of the first course, the Marquesse Darset at that time. Constable of England, with a little silver Staffe (the signe of his office) and the Earle of Arundel with the rod of the Marshalls ship, mounted vpon trapped horses, al in cloth of gold came riding into the Hall.

Four swords were all the dinner time carried before the King.

The Ambassadors of forraigne Princes, the Bishops and Noble-men, the Maior of the City of London, the Barons of the five Ports, &c. were in their order set at Tables in the same Hall.

After the second course, the kings champion (surnamed Dimock) a knight in complete Armour, mounted vpon a great Horse, couered with a Caparison of cloth of gold, and attended vpon with an Herald in his Coat of Armes, came into the Hall: who even at the first, with a proud gaue went vnto the King, and with great reuerence made to him his lowe obedience. Afterward prauncing his carrying Horse, by a trumpet sounding foure times in the Hall, challenged to combate him who foueer he were, that should deny Edward the sixt of that name, to be the true, vndoubted, and lawfull King of England, France, and Ireland. And so often he call downe his Gandel vnto the ground, as a pledge of his challenge so made: which when no man would take vp, the Herald deliuered it vnto him againe: which done, the King did drinke vnto him in a Cup of gold, which he thankfully accepted, and challenging the Cup due vnto him as his Fee, so departed.

Last of all, Garth king of Armes, with the rest of the heralds, having made thrice obeysance before the King, all aloud, in formall words proclaimed the kings stile, in Latine, French, and English, in this sort: Largeſſe of the most Soueraigne, and most invincible Prince and King, Edward the sixt, by the grace of God of England, France, and Ireland King, Defender of the Faith: and of the Church of England and Ireland, next vnder Christ in Earth supreme head: chiefe of the most Noble order and Knight-hood of the Garter. Which same stile, when he had in Latine and French, and so in three other places of the Hall beside repeated, they oftentimes altogether crying out aloud, Largeſſe, so departed.

A little before the ende of the Feast, the Maior of London (as the manner is) in a Cup of gold, gaue a Cuppe of spiced Wine (which we commonly call Troster) vnto the King to drinke; which after hee had tasted of, hee gaue the Cup vnto the Maior, as due vnto him for his fee.

The rest of the time was spent in creating of Knights of the Bath, and of other Knights: and in appointing of Iustings & Tiltings: All which, as not appertaining to my purpose, I omit; as also the variety of mulique, the diuers kindes of shewes, & other things in number infinite, which wonderfully graced & set forth the magnificence of this coronation: of all which things, let them say more at large, which saw either the fame, or the pompe of the Coronation of the most Soueraigne Queene Elizabeth, with the wonderfull happineſſe of her Reigne, and the applause and ioyfullnesse of the people on euerie side.

REGIA MAIESTAS

Hitherto I haue described what manner of men the named Noble-men haue bene with vs. The forme of their Charters and Rescripts I haue set downe, with what Rites and Ceremonies they are after our manner and fashion created: and the Maiestie of the Coronation of the Kings themselves, we haue declared. Here now a great field is opened vnto me to speake of the right of the precedence of the Nobilitie, and of their Priuiledges, but forasmuch as they rest rather vpon Custom then vpon positive Lawes, I haue of a set purpose omitted many things, proceeding but by inference as the Statutes of the Kingdome may be my warrant and safety.

CHAP. XX.

A Statute and Act of Parliament, made in the one and thirti yere of Henry the eight, concerning placing of the Lords in the Parliament chamber, and other assemblies and conferences of Councell.

Esomuch, as in all great Councells and Congregations of men, hauing Degrees and Offices in the commonwealth, it is very requisite and conuenient, that an order should be had and taken for the placing and sitting of such persons as are bound to resort to the same, to the intent that they knowing their places, may vse the same without displeasure or let of the Councell: therefore the Kings most royall Maiestie, although it appertaineth vnto his prerogative Royall, to giue such honour, reputation, and placing to his Counsellors, and other his Subiects, as shall be seeming to his most excellent wisedome, is neuertheless pleased and contented for an order to be had and taken in this his most high Court of Parliament, that it shall be enacted by the authoritie of the same in manner and forme as heereafter foloweth.

First, it is enacted by the authoritie aforesaid, that no person or persons of what estate, degree, or condition foucer he or they be of (except only the Kings children) shall at any time hereafter attempt or presume, to sit or haue place at any side of the cloth of Estate in the Parliament Chamber, neither on the one hand of the Kings highnes, nor on the other, whether the Kings Maiestie be there personally present, or absent. And forasmuch as the Kings Maiestie is iustly and lawfully Supreme Head in earth vnder God, of the Church of England, and for the good exercise of the said most royall dignitie and office, hath made Thomas Lord Cromwell, and Lord Priuie-Seale his Vicegerent, for good and due administration of Iustice, to be had in all causes and cases, touching the Ecclesiasticall Iurisdiction, and for the goodly information and redresse of all Errours, Heresies, and abuses in the said Church. It is therefore also enacted by authoritie aforesaid, that he the said Lord Cromwell, hauing the said Office of Vicegerent, and all other persons which heereafter shall haue the said Office of the graint of the Kings highnes, his heires or successours, shall sit and be placed, aswell in this present Parliament, as in all Parliaments to be holden heereafter, on the right side of the Parliament Chamber; and vpon the same forme that the Archbishop of Canterbury sitteth on, and aboute the same Archbishop and his successours, and shall haue voice in euery Parliament to assent or dissent, as other the Lords of the Parliament haue.

And it is also enacted, that next vnto the sayd Vicegerent, shall sit the Archbishoppe of Canterbury, and then next vnto him on the same Forme and side, shall sit the Archbishoppe of Yorke; and next vnto him on the same side, the Bishop of London; and next to him on the same side and Forme, the Bishop of Durham; and next vnto him on the same side and Forme the Bishop of Winchester; and then all the other Bishops of both Prouinces of Canterbury and Yorke, shall sit and be placed on the same side after their ancients, as it hath bene accustomed.

And

And forasmuch as such other Personages, which now haue, and heereafter shall happen to haue other great Offices of the Realme; that is to say, the Offices of the Lord Chancellor, the Lord Treasurer, the Lord President of the Kings most honourable Councell, the Lord priuie Seale, the great Chamberlaine of England, the Marshall of England, the Lord Admirall, the Grand-Master or Lord Steward of the Kings most honourable household, the Kings Chamberlaine and the Kings Secretary, haue not heerebefore bene appointed and ordered for the placing and sitting in the Kings most high Court of Parliament, by reason of their Offices. It is therefore now ordayne and enacted by the Authority aforesaid, that the Lord Chancellor, the Lord Treasurer, the Lord President of the Kings Councell, and the Lord Priuie Seale, being of the degree of Barons of the Parliament, or aboute, shall sit and be placed aswell in this present Parliament, as in all other Parliaments hereafter to be holden, on the left side of the Parliament Chamber, on the hither part of the forme of the same side, aboute all Dukes, except only such as shall happen to be the Kings Sonne, the Kings Brother, the Kings Vnkle, the Kings Nephew, or the Kings Brothers or Sisters sonnes.

And it is also ordained and enacted by authority aforesaid, that the great Chamberlaine, the Constable, the Marshall, the Lord Admirall, the great Master, or Lord Steward, and the Kings Chamberlaine, shall sit and be placed after the Lord priuie Seale, in manner following: that is to say, euery one of them shall sit and be placed aboute all other Personages being of the same estates or degrees, that they shall happen to be of; that is to say, the great Chamberlaine first; the Constable next; the Marshall third; the Lord Admirall the fourth; the Grand-Master or Lord Steward the fift; and the Kings Chamberlaine the sixt.

And it is also enacted by authority aforesaid, that the Kings cheefe Secretary being of the degree of a Baron of the Parliament, shall sit and be placed afore and aboute all Barons, not hauing any of the Offices before mentioned. And if he be a Bishop, that then he shall sit and be placed aboute all other Bishops, not hauing any of the Offices aboute remembred.

And it is also ordayne and enacted by Authority aforesaid, that all Dukes not afore mentioned, Marquesses, Earles, Viscounts, and Barons, not hauing any of the Offices aforesaid, shall sit and be placed after their Anciency, as it hath bene accustomed.

And it is further enacted, that if any person or persons, which at any time here after shall happen to haue any of the said Offices of Lord Chancellor, Lord Treasurer, Lord President of the Kings Councell, Lord Priuie Seale, or cheefe Secretary, shall be vnder the degree of a Baron of the Parliament, by reason whereof, they can haue no interest to giue any assent or dissent in the said house, that then in euery such case, such of them as shall happen to be vnder the degree of a Baron, shall sit and be placed at the vppermost part of the sakes, in the midst of the said Parliament, either there to sit vpon one Forme, or vpon the vppermost sacle, the one of them aboute the other, in order as is aboute rehearsed.

Be it also enacted by Authority aforesaid, that in all trials of treasons by Peers of this Realme, if any of the Peeres that shall be called heereafter to bee tryers of such treasons, shall happen to haue any of the Offices aforesaid, that then they hauing such Offices, shall sit and be placed according to their Offices, aboute all the other Peeres that shall be called to such trials, in manner and forme as is aboute mentioned and rehearsed.

And it is also enacted by Authority aforesaid, that as well in all Parliaments, as in the Starre-Chamber, and in all other Assemblies and Conferences of Councell, the Lord Chancellor, the Lord Treasurer, the Lord President, the Lord priuie Seale, the great Chamberlaine, the Constable, the Marshall, the Lord Admirall, the Grand-master, or Lord Steward, the Kings Chamberlaine, and the Kings Secretary shall sit and be placed in such order and fashion, as is aboute rehearsed, and not in any other place, by authority of this present Acte.

CHAP.

The Parliamentary Pompe.

CHAP. XXIII.

(Viz.) The forme and manner of the going of the States vnto the Parliament, seriously collected out of diuers examples. Wherein I thought good, especially to propound that most stately going of Queene Elizabeth, in the xxxij. yeare of her reigne.

On Sunday (the xxij. day of Nouember) in the Chamber of Prefence (as they doe tearme it) it was proclaimed that the Noble-men and States, and so all others which were bound to attend vpon the Queenes Maiestie, the next day to be holden at Westminster, should bee ready at nine of the clocke before noone, to giue their attendance, the Queene then lying in her royal house called Saint James, neare vnto Westminster. The next day at the appointed houre, the Noblemen put on their Parliament Robes in the Counsell chamber, and the Bishops theirs likewise, in another chamber next vnto the chapel: from thence they, by the Garden going into the Parke, mounted on horse-backe, attended the coming forth of the Queene. About eleuen of the clocke the most gracious Queene, attired also in a Parliament Roabe, at the going out of the Garden, mounted in a Chaire of Estate, like vnto a Chariot or Horfletter, carried betwixt two white Horses. This Chaire was on euery side open, but that behind a couering hanging forth aboue, semicircle-wise, was with two little pillars of Siluer supported: vpon the top whereof, stood on high a Crowne of golde: and vpon two other pillars at her feete, stood a Lyon and a Dragon glistring with golde, made with wonderful cunning, supporting the Queenes Armes. This Chaire (which I might rather call a Throane) being altogether cunningly garnished and gilt, was most magnificently bedeckt with cloth of Siluer (as they call it) and with Cushions of the same. Wherein, after that the Queene had placed herselfe: the rest by two and two in this order set forward.

An Herald or King of Armes.

William Marquesse of Winchester: Hee in another place carried the Cap royall.

Heere were places fit for Dukes: all whose parliament robes (a thing worth the noting) differed nothing from the Barons, but that they wore the guardes vpon their shoulders, three or foure fold. For although all Dukes, Marquesses, and Earles, in their creations are attired with garments of Silke and Veluet, which are called Roabes or garments of Honour: yet in Parliaments they vse the same that Barons doe, made of Skarlet, with certayne differences of white Furze, set as fringes or edgings on their shoulders: for that there they al sit by reason of their Baronies, and according to their dignitie take their places.

Thomas Bramley Knight Chancellour of England; with William Cicill Baron of Burghley ridde together. But the great Seale of England, was by one footman carried before the Chancellour: but hee himselfe was attired in a Gowne of black Veluet lined with Sables.

Two Sergeants at Armes with siluer scepters, which we call Maces, gilt.

Garter chiefe King at Armes, in his Heralds coate, hauing the chiefe gentleman Vher on his right hand.

The Marques of Winchester did beare the Cap royall, vpon whose left hand the Earle of Worcester carried the Rod of the Marshallship of England, in steed of George Earle of Shrewsbury, then earle Marshall, who was then in the Parliament Chamber, although he was not heere present, for that he was sicke of the Gout.

The Earle of Kent after them carried the sword, on whose right hand went the earle of Oxford, then great Chamberlaine of England, and on his left hand the Earle of Leicester, Sensschall, or Steward of the queenes house.

The queenes Maiesty carried in a chaire as we haue before said. She her selfe decked vp in a purple Robe, furred with Ermens. But her inner Garment was of purple veluet also, more straighter vnto her body, turned vp at the hand, with the same furze.

Foure Quieres of the Stable (whom in French they call Esquires) and the Footmen in their rich Coates were attendant about the queene: and without them all along in a ranke, waited the Gentlemen Pensioners with their Partisans.

After them followed the Earle of Darbie, Master of the Horse (instead of the Earle of Leicester, who at this time supplied the place of the Steward) leading a spare horse of state: by whom on the left hand rode Charles Howard, Baron of Effingham, Chamberlaine of the queenes house, both of them attired in their Parliament Robes.

After these followed also Christopher Hatton, Knight Vice Chamberlaine, with many Noble women, Ladies, and other Noble Courtiers.

In this order and Royall pompe, the queene came vnto the South gate of S. Peters Church at Westminster, where the Bishop of Sarisbury, the Kings Almoner, and Doctor Goodman Deane of that Church, with the Prebendaries, and all the quier receiued Her in their Coapes. Without the Porch was set a Forme, furnished with Carpets and Cushions, at which the queene vpon her knees, receiued of the Deane the golden Scepter of S. Edward, which she layde vpon the Cushion before her: and hauing receiued a litle Booke of the Deane, vnto her selfe softly prayed. Afterward she came into the Church, vnder a stately Canopy of Cloth of Siluer, which sixe Knights supported.

The Marchionesse of Northampton, and the countesse of Oxford bare vp the train: Baron Howard of Effingham being Chamberlaine supporting her: Christopher Hatton Vice-Chamberlaine going on the other side, but not supporting her. But forasmuch forasmuch as the Queenes robes made of rich silke and Ermens, were too weighty and chargeable for her well to beare, the Earle of Arundell on the right hand, and the Earle of Pembroke on the left, held them vp from her shoulders.

Before the Lord Chancellour and the Lord Treasurier, went the singing men and Quiristers, singing of Psalmes, and when the Queene was now come vnto the royall withdrawing or retiring place (commonly called the Traverse) prepared for them vpon the right hand of the Quier, neare vnto the Communion Table: the Noble-men tooke their places vpon Formes, beneath the Traverse, but the Bishops sat themselves downe beneath the Pulpit on the north side of the Quier.

The Archbishop of Cantebury, after a psalme sung, made a sermon, the sword and cap of Honour beeing in the meane time borne before him.

The sermon with a psalme ended, the Queene on foote vnder a Canopy, went vnto the south gate of the Church, carrying in her hand the Scepter, dedicated to King Edward the Confessor: in which place, she restored it vnto the Deane of Westminster, of whom shee had before receiued it, to be againe layd vp.

It is worthy note, that whilst the Queenes Maiesty was hearing diuine seruice in the Church, the Earle of Leicester (for that time Steward of the Queenes house) went vnto the Lower Parliament house, to be there present at the answer of the Rescripts, (which our Lawyers call the Returne of the Writtes) before sent forth for the summoning of the knights of the shires, and for the Burgessees of the townes thither, and met the Queene coming vnto the vpper Parliament house.

The Queene being come thither, first retired her selfe into her owne priue Chamber, where resting her selfe a litle, the Noble-men in the meane while, had in due order placed themselves in the vpper house: and at length the Queene her selfe came forth, the Sword, the Cappe, and the Rod of the Marshallship of England being borne before her, and the other Officers going before her, shee went vp into the Royall Throne, the Nobilitie of the Kingdome sitting downe about her.

In the midst of the vpper house: lie great Sackes of cloth filled with wooll: vpon the vppermost whereof stretch the Chancellour; and vpon those which lie towards the sides of the house, sit the Maister of the Rolles, the Queenes Secretary, the Judges, the Barrons of the Exchequer, and certayne Lawyers, aswell Ciuitilians as Common Lawyers. Vpon the lowest of all, sitteth the Clarke of the Parliament house, with the Clarke of the Crowne, behinde whom the other Clarks write, resting vpon their knees.

When the Queene was set, and that they of the newel house (widehest) the Knights of the shires; and the Burgessees of the Cities were set in, the commaunded the Lord Chancellour, standing on the right hand by her, to make his Oracion: who turning himselfe vnto the Nobilitie, and therest there present, declared vnto them, in her Maiesties name; that this assembly of Parliament to be for three causes called (viz.) For the glorie of Almighty God; and the furthering of true Religion: For the health and preservation of her royall Maieesty, and the welfare of the Common-weale. Whith after that, hee had aloude and most eloquently at large declared, turning his speech vnto the Knights and Burgessees, standing on an heape together below: he willed them to make choyse of their Prolocutor, and to giue notice of him to be chosen, to the Lords of the Priuy Counsell, from whom they should expect what the Queens pleasure and answer was concerning him so chosen, to be afterward presented.

When the Chancellour had ended his speech, the Clarke of the Parliament rising vp, in French, and with a lowd voice proclaimed the names of them, which as Delegates had the power within certain dayes to vnderstand of the affaires aswell of the Kingdomes of England, France, Scotland, and Ireland, as of the Dukedoms of Normandie and Aquitaine, and to heare and examine the requests and petitions of them of the Ilands and parties beyond the Seas.

Which things being done, the Chancellour protogued the Parliament; the Queene disceding from her Throne, and retiring into her Priue Chamber, there put off her parliament robes; which when when the Barons had in like manner also done, they in order (with the Sword, the Cappe of Honour, and the Rod of the Marshallship carried before her) attended her vnto her Barge, wherein shee from thence was downe the River carried backe vnto her Pallace (called White Hall;) through which she passed into the Parke, where she mounting vpon a most couragious Horse; the Nobility, States, and most honourable men and women attending her, shee happily returned vnto her Pallace of S. James; from whence she before came.

Vpon Thursday following, the day appointed for the presenting of the Prolocutor, the Queene about three of the clocke in the after noone, by the Parke came from her royall house of S. James, vnto her pallace of White Hall; and when she had in her Chamber put on her Parliament robes, she went to her Throne, the Sword, the Cappe, and the Rodde of the Marshallship, being after the wonted manner carried before her: The Lord Chamberlaine going on the right hand of the Sword, and the Lord Steward on the left, with the Lord Treasurer, Garter, the visers, & the Sergeants at Armes going before them. At length, when the Noble men were set downe, the Chancellour on the right hand, and the high Treasurer of England on the left hand, stood beside the Queene without the barres.

Then at length, the Knights of the Shires, and the Burgesses of the Cities being admitted in, brought in their most learned Lawyer (viz.) John Puckering, who standing at the barre, and hauing thrice made most lowe obeisance, sayd what he might, to shew himselfe vsuto vnder-take so great a burthen, requesting most earnestly, that they would make choice of another Prolocutor, vnto whom the Queene by the Chancellour made answer, That shee liked exceeding well of the choice of him already made, and that she ratified the same.

Which done, the Prolocutor framed himselfe to another manner of speech, wherein hee particularly rehearsed what great benefits were redounded vnto the Commonweale, by the most wise gouernement of her royall Maiestie: he declared her singular vertues, her very naturall and sootherly care ouer her Subjects: But especially in that she had then called together the Estates of the Kingdome, there to consult and consider of the most weightiest affaires of the Common-weale, earnestly admonishing the Bishops to prouide for the Ecclesiasticall and Church matters: the Nobilitie and the rest to bee carefull of the profite and welfare of the Common-weale. In the conclusion of his speech, he most humbly requested, that the auncient Rights and Priuiledges of the Lower house of the Burgesses, (viz.) of freely deliuering of their speech and minds, and of being free from Arrests, as well themselves as their Seruants, during the time of the parliament, might be kept whole and vtouched. And if that in any thing not well by them vnderstoode, they should happen to offend, he requested leave aswell for himselfe as for the rest, to haue access vnto her royall Maiestie.

His Oration at length ended, the Chancellor, by the Queene commanded, and in some poynts, by her instructed, highly commended the Prolocutors Oration, and in the Queenes name graunted the leave he had requested.

Which things being so on both sides dispatched; the Queene rose and retired herselfe into her priuate Chamber, put off her Parliament robes, and so attended vpon with the Nobilitie, came downe: and at the West side of the Parliament house, mounted into her chaire of Estate; a very royall one; and from thence with a great traine of Noblemen and honorable Ladies attending her (the Earle of Kent carrying the Sword before her) shee by Torch-light through the Parke, returned vnto her Pallace of Saint James, from whence she before came.

The manner of sitting in the Upper house of Parliament, is in this Platforme following in the next Page, most truly and lively described.

CHAP. XXII.

The manner of restoring of renewed Nobilitie before lost.

HE maners and formes of creating of Noblemen, with their Rites and Ceremonies, by Charters and Rescripts, or Writs of summons, we haue before described. Now heere at length I haue thought it good, to ioyne heereunto the manner of restoring of dignities & honours before lost. Such as haue by their owne or others fault, lost their honorable stiles and titles, are wont to bee vnto the same by petitions, exhibited vnto the Kings in full Parliament restored: which I would say, to be a confirmation of renewed or restored Nobility. Whereof the request of Margret, daughter to George Duke of Clarence, in Parliament, in the first yeare of King Henry the eight, (to omit others) may serue for an example. Whereby she is restored vnto the Soule, State, Name, Title, Honour, and Dignity of the Countesse of Sarisbury, frō which Edward her Brother Earle thereof, had by his guilt fallen. The Petition it selfe is longer then is necessary to be heere inserted. It is in English extant in the Records, & is shut vp with these words.

Which petition being read, and to the full vnderstanding, and consented vnto by our said Lord the King, by the aduice and assent of the Lords spirituall and temporall, and of the Comynalty in the aforesaide Parliament being: and also by the Authority of the same Parliament, it was vnto the same Petition thus answered.

*Soit fait come il est desire.
Beit done according as it is requested.*

CHAP. XXIII.

Customes.

Haue said Politically Nobility, still subiect vnto the dispositions of Princes, and change of time; to rest alwayes vpon the customes of Nations.

For first of all, it is manifest, dignities which were but the bare names of personal Offices, to haue at length become hereditary and successory: and yet with diuers Lawes circumscribed.

For although women in Germany born of Dukes, Earles, or Barons, are according to the manner of the Empire styled and called Dutchesse, Countesses, and Baronesses; yet by the Law of the Imperiall grant, the Principalities themselves, with the Fees thereto belonging, descend vnto the Males onely, who sayling, they reuert vnto the Emperor. Which thing, the most great Dukedome Carinthia, proeueth to be so. For Ericus the last Duke beeing dead without heires male, the dukedome by the Lawes returned againe vnto the Empire: which Lewes the Emperour afterward bestowed vpon Albert Duke of Austria.

Sigismund the Emperor also, the right line of the dukes of Saxony being extinct, gaue the dukedome in the yeare 1423. vnto the Marquesse of Austria; and the Marquisat of Brandenburg, vnto the Burgraues of Noriburge: whose successors euen now at this day enioy the same.

The same we reade to haue been done in Italy: For Wenceslaw the Emperour in the yeare 1490. graced the Vice-county of Millaine with the Title of a Dukedome: but so as that for want of heires male, it should together with that Dignitie, bee made a part of the Imperiall patrimony. And in the remembrance of our Grandfathers, we reade of certayne (as well at Naples as else-where,) to haue bene by the Emperour Charles the fifth created; but yet alwayes with that common Lawe of Reuerfion, that so soone as the last last of the male descent should dye, they should be made Imperiall dignities. Yet heere by the way we must remember, that the Emperours did not at all times doe all things according to the vttermost of the greatnesse of their power; but sometime by a new beneficiary or bountifull covenant, being requested so to doe, suffered those titles of honours to descend vnto the daughters (no heires male remaining) mitigating the extremity of the law, by wise mens interpretations thereof, regard being still had, eyther of the Commonweale, or of some former agreement, or of the time present.

In France, Rematus Choppinus, disputing of the Royall Demaine, maketh a distinction of dignities. For he affirmeth all Military and masculine dignities, by the Law Salique to be annexed vnto the Fees Royall, neyther by any meanes, by meere Law, to come vnto the Women, although that the heyres male faile; except by speciall and expresse words it bee before otherwise provided: which hee saith, himselfe to haue scene and read. Yet in the meane time he affirmeth, priuile Principality not to be denied to women: which hee manifesteth by the example of the County of Arminack, by a womans right deuolued vnto the King of Nauarre, as by many others also.

And to mee, now writing and running ouer some few things concerning our owne affaires, it fortun'd a certaine most ancient writing to come vnto my hands, taken out of the ancient Saxon Lawes, and lent me by William Lambert, a great admirer of reuerend antiquity, and a most earnest restorer thereof. Which writing, although that both in tongue and character it meereley found Saxon like, yet seemeth it in some things, to fauour of the Danish matters, as also of the ancient lawes eyther of the Britons themselves, or of the Saxons, shaken and rent in funder, vnder the rule and government of the Latines.

But the writing it selfe written in the Saxon tongue, translated into English, word for word, & into Latine, according vnto the true sense and meaning thereof, here following is contained.

Theſe

Theſe ruines or rubbidge of antiquity, make ſhew of a perpetuity of Nobility, euen from the beginning of this Iſland, but times are changed, and we in them alſo. For King Edward the Confeſſor, laſt of the Saxon blood, coming out of Normandy, bringing then in the Title of a Baron, the Thaynes from that time began to grow out of vſe; ſo that at this day men remember not ſo much as the names of them. And at length, that name of Baronage began to be both in dignity and power ſo magnificent about the reſt, as that in the name of the Baronage of England, all the Nobility of the Land ſeemed to be comprehended. As for Dukes, they were (as it were) ſet from long exile, and againe renewed by King Edward the third. And Marqueſſes & Vicounts, were altogether newly brought in by King Richard the ſecond, and King Henry the fixt.

But our Kings deſcended of the Norman blood, together with the Crowne of the Kingdome, granted an hereditary & ſucceſſory perpetuity vnto honourable titles, ſuch I meane as are the Titles of Earldomes and Baronies) without any difference of ſex at all. Which thing I thought good to make manifeſt, by the examples of the more ancient times. In the reckoning vp whereof, that I may the better acquit and diſcharge my ſelfe; in the very entrance of my ſpeech, there be 3 things, whereof I would haue the Reader by the way, to be eſpecially forewarned. Firſt, concerning the diſpoſition and inclination of our Kings, in the creating of the nobility. Secondly, of the cuſtome of transferring of honours and dignities by Families. And thirdly, of the force of time, & the change and alteration of things. For why, our Kings (who only and alone, doe in their kingdome beare the abſolute rule and ſway) are with vs efficient cauſes of all Political Nobility. The Titles of Named Nobility, by our cuſtome, haue this naturall and common together with the Crowne it ſelfe, that the heyres male ſayling they deuolue vnto the Women, except in the firſt Charters it be by expreſſe words otherwiſe provided; and yet ſo, as that regard is alwayes to be had of the time, which is euery where wont to beare ſway in the formality of things.

having obtained the Soueraignty, according to his pleaſure beſtowed dignities & honors vpon his companions and others, (viz.) ſome of them ſo annexed and conioyned vnto the Fees themſelves, as that euen yet at this day, the poſſeſſors thereof, may ſeeme to be ennobled, euen with the poſſeſſion of the places onely. As our Biſhopps at this day, as alſo certaine eccleſiaſticall Abbots and Priors; who by reaſon of the Baronies ioyned vnto their Biſhoppricks, enjoy the titles and preheminent of Barons in the higheſt aſſemblies of the kingdome in Parliament. Other ſome of the dignities and honors, he gaue and granted alſo, together with the lands and fees themſelves. As he gaue to Hugh Lupus his kinsman and a Norman, the earldome of Cheſter. Ad Conquendum & tenendum ſibi & heredibus, adeo liberè per gladium ſicut ipſe Rex tenuit Angliam per Coronam. To conquer and hold it to him and his heyres, as freely by the Sword, as the King himſelfe helde England by the Crowne. With the Earldome of Richmond hee graced Alanus Ruſus, his Nephew, and then Earle of Britaine in France and his heyres: ita liberè & honorifice ut eundem Edwinus Comes antea tenerat: ſo freely and honorably as Earle Edwin had before holden the ſame. And the Earldome of Arundel, which Harold poſſeſſed, he granted with a fee vnto Roger of Montgomery. The firſt two of which honors (the heyres male ſayling) by women eſtfoones paſſed into other Families, but the latter Earldome, Robert the Sonne of Roger being attainted of treaſon, returned vnto King Henry the firſt, who gaue the ſame in dowry vnto Queene Adeliza his Wiſſe.

The ſucceeding Kings more ſparingly, beſtowed ſuch dignities to bee holden of them in Fee, granting only for the better and more honourable maintenance of their ſtock and honour, the third part of the Pleas of the County (as they terme it) which they in their Charters called Tertium Denarium, or the third penny. So that hee which receiued the third penny of any Province, he the ſame man by the ſame ancient Law of ſucceſſion, was called Earle of the ſame Province: and ſo by cuſtome the women, the heyres male ſayling.

And

The name of a Baron from whence and when it came into England.

Memoir.
Three things that be which beare rule in all things viz. the Law, Cuſtome, and Necessity.

And if any Earle or Baron dying without Sonnes, had many women his heires, howsoever order was, either by couenant, or by way of partition taken, concerning the Lands and possessions, according to the common Lawes of the kingdome, yet the dignity and honour, a thing of it selfe indiuisable, was still left to be disposed of, according to the Kings pleasure. Who in bestowing thereof, for the most part respected the prerogative of birth.

By which right, King Henry the third, after the death of John the Scot, dead with out issue (other lands and reuenues being by agreement giuen vnto his three Sisters) vniued the Earldome of Chester, with the honor thereof vnto the Crown. This is also manifest in the Earldome of Arundell: which (after Robert of Bellisme, Sonne to the aforesaid Roger of Montgomery, diuen out by Henry the first) King Henry the second bestowed vpon William of Albine, Queene Adeliza his Mothers Husband, and by a new Charter, confirmed it in Fee, together with the inheritance to him and his heires, with the third penny of the Pleas of Suffex, whereof he created him Earle. But Hugh the great, Nephew of this William the first, being dead without issue, all the inheritance of the Earldome was diuided among his foure Sisters. Whose dignity and honour for all that, together with the Castle of Arundell, was by Edward the first, at length giuen to Richard Fitz-Alan (viz.) the Nephewes Sonne to John Fitz-Alan and Isabel, the second of the aforesaid Sisters.

Now let vs passe from Henry the third, vnto Edward the first his Sonne. When as for a time a great dissention was betwixt him and certaine of his Nobility (viz.) Gilbert of Clare Earle of Hereford and of Gloucester: Humfrey of Bohun, earle of Hereford and Suffex, and Constable of England, and Roger Bigod Earle of Norfolk, Marshall of the kingdome, and that all those Noble-men, at length had lost their Earldomes and Offices, they being reconciled vnto the King, afterward by new Charters received the same againe in this manner.

The first of them, received the same vnto himselfe & Ioane the same kings daughter his second wife, for tearme of both their liues, and to the Children to bee by them two begotten (his two Daughters by his first wife being excluded.) This Ioane (called Ioane of Acon) bare vnto her husband Gilbert, a Sonne called also Gilbert; but shee the second time, secretly married vnto one Radulph, of Mount Hermeri (without the King her Fathers knowledge) in her owne right, made also the same Radulph Earle so long as shee liued. But she at length being dead, Gilbert her sonne, by the aforesaid Gilbert, succeeded againe into the Earldome, Radulph his father in Law being yet aliue. In the very same manner he reitorred the Earldomes and Office of Constableship vnto the aforesaid Humfrey of Bohun, vnto whom also he gaue in marriage Elizabeth, another of his Daughters, widdow to John Earle of Holland: and vnto the third, he restored the Earldome of Norfolk, and the office of the Marescall, with a yearly increase of a thousand Markes; yet vpon condition, that the heires male of his body to be begotten, sayling, both of them should returne againe vnto the King. At length, this Roger dyed without issue, in the xxxv. yeare of him the said Edward the first viz. in the last yeare of his reigne: and King Edward his Son, the second of that name, both by a new Creation & Charter, gaue the Earldome and the Marshallship vnto Thomas of Brotherton his Brother, and his heires male.

These things wee haue thus propounded, thereby to shew, how according to the diuers dispositions of Princes, & changes of times, it hath by little and little varied in the first bestowing of dignities and honours. Of which thing (that new Law) and to them of ancient time vnknewe, made by King Edward the first himselfe, seemeth afterward to haue bene of no small weight and moment, whereby, hee fauouring certaine priuate men, more carefull of their owne surname, then of their posterity, it was thought vnto him good, & so decreed, to make Fees to belong to men only. That law I say, which I would in Latine call Gentilitium Municipale; & which the Lawyers commonly call ius Talliatus, and Talliable: or the Law of cutting off: for that it cutteth off successions before general, and restraineth them vnto the particular heires of Families: which seemeth also to haue giuen an occasion of change in the giuing and bestowing of dignities and honors.

For euer since that time, in the creating of any new Earle, it is begonne to be altogether by expresse words in all Charters provided, that it shall bee but for terme of life onely, or descend vnto the heires males alone, the Women being quite excluded. And this I need not by examples to prouue; for why, the thing it selfe prouoeth the same. But the force and efficacie of this Lawe of Entaile, (or of cutting off) I haue thought good thus in few words to declare.

The Lands and Fees of the earldome of Oxford (Robert Earle of Oxford and Duke of Ireland, being condemned of treason) by that Law came to Albericus Pere vncle to Robert, who therefore in Parliament, requested of the King, the Title of the Earldome also, and obtained the same. This is also most manifest, by the example of the Earldomes of Arundell and of Surrey, ioyned together in the family of Fitz-Alan. For Edmund Fitz-Alan Earle of Arundell, married the onely sister and heire of Earle Richard, and of her begot Richard, happy with his twice marriage. Vnto this Richard, the Sonne of Edmund, and his heires male by Aenor of Lancaster (his second wife) begotten, and to be begotten, the Castle, Honour, and Lordship of Arundell were entailed in the one and twentieth yeare of Edward the third. And afterward (viz.) the same yere, Earle John his brother being dead without issue, enriched also with the increase of the Earldome of Surrey, he was called Earle of Arundell and Surrey. Of Aenor Richard begot a sonne, called Richard, at length Earle of Arundell and Surrey also: and John Fitz-Alan his second sonne, in the right of his wife, called Baron Maltreuers. This Richard had Thomas his onely Sonne, dead without issue; and foure Daughters his Coheires (viz.) Elizabeth, Ioane, Margaret, and Alice, who diuided the Earldome of Surrey amongst them. Howbeit the dignity therof was granted to John Mowbray duke of Suffolke, begotten of Elizabeth the eldest sister; who by the ancient custome of Succession challenged vnto himselfe the Earldome of Arundell also. But John Baron of Maltreuers, Nephew to the first John Fitz-Alan, and Baron of Maltreuers, by his sonne John opposed himselfe against this man, and withstood him, challenging vnto himselfe the possession of that cattle and demaine of Arundell, as fallen vnto him by the good right of the Law of Entaile.

For Thomas the last Earle being dead without issue (as is afore-said, he alleged the demaine of the Castle nor to belong vnto the Sisters, but to descend vnto his heires male and kinsmen, of whom hee himselfe was nearest of kinne vnto the said Earle Thomas: of which Fee, seeing by Law he held the possession, he affirmed the Title of honour and dignitie more fully to agree vnto himselfe then to lie in vaine, and to no purpose hidden in the Duke himselfe. Which thing, although hee could not obtayne, yet John his sonne, a most famous warrior, after the death of his Father, with the applause and good liking of all men, obtained by Acte of parliament, in the eleuenth yeare of King Henry the sixth. Of whom also, for his great deserts and most noble vertues, he was, the yere after, rewarded with the dukedome of Thuranis in France. And this John, both Earle and Duke, being dead, Humfrey his son, in short time after dead without issue (notwithstanding his sister) left the earldome of Arundell entailed vnto William his vncle, in whom afterward it took such root, as that we haue seene it in the male line, to haue brought forth most famous and renowned Earles, euen vnto this our age.

And what wee haue sayd concerning Earles, the same be it said also of Barons created by Charters. But in Barons created by Rescripts or Writs of Summons yet resting vpon most auncient custome, not so.

For in them (one onely excepted, sent forth to Henry Bromflet, wherein it was provided him, that same Henry and his heires male of his body lawfully begotten, only to be Barons of West) women, the heires male failing, were not in ancient time forbidden or embarrased, but that they might be accounted, and by name stiled honourable, with the preeminence of the dignity and calling of Barons. And after they had borne a Childe, according to the auncient fauour of our Lawes, and the reuerend custome of the Kingdome, graced their husbands also with the same honour; & with the same by inheritance ennobled ennobled their children; yea, euen without the possession of those places, from whence the names of such dignities and honours may seeme first to haue risen. For Fees and locall possessions, circumscribed by the Lawe, are translated and carried from one family to another, and vsually enrich their Lords and owners the possessours thereof: but yet of themselves, neyther bring nor take away Nobilitie, either Dative or Natiue. By Examples to manifest these things were but needelesse; for why, all the most auncient Baronies, and the more auncient sort of the Barons at this day, are in this poynt on my side, and giue voices with me. Now, if any man studious of these things, by chance meeting with some things of other nature, shall more curiously dispute against these matters, vnto him I would oppose, eyther the force of time, or the carelesnesse and lacke of looking vnto. But, Customes are still like themselves, neyther are we to detract from the authoritie of Kings, who although they haue such supereminence, and vnderminate prerogative, as that they may seeme sometimes to haue of fauour granted, some things beside the Lawes; yet shall it not appeare them requested, to haue done, or yet suffered any thing to bee done, contrarie vnto the Customes of Stockes and Families. So they sometime not regarding the solemnities of Ceremonies and Charters, haue onely by their beekes (that I may so say) suffered dignities and honours to bee transferred, as in Ranulph Blundewill, Earle of Chester, and of Lincolne to bee scene. For the Earldome of Chester, he permitted after his manner, to descend to John the Scot his Nephew, by Maud the eldest of his Sisters. But the Earldome of Lincolne, (the King thereunto consenting) hee yet aliue deliuered vnto Hawisa another of his Sisters, now married to Robert Quincy, by his deede, in the seuenteenth yeare of the reigne of King Henrie the third, in these words following.

Ranulphus Earle of Lincolne, vnto all men present, and to come, which shall see this present Writing, greeting, I would haue it to come vnto the generall knowledge of you all, mee to haue giuen and graunted, and by this my present writing, to haue confirmed to the Lady Hawisa of Quincy, my most deare Sister, the Earldome of Lincolne, (viz.) as farre forth as it vnto mee belonged, so that she may thereof be Countesse. To haue and to hold the same of my Lord the King of England, and his heires, vnto the said Hawisa and her heires, freely, quietly, fully, peaceably, and wholly by right of inheritance, with all the appuriances, and liberties vnto the aforesaid Earldome belonging. And that this present Writing may stand in force for euer, I haue thought it good to firme and strengthen the same, by the setting to of my Seale. These being witnesses.

Hawisa with this her brothers writing in this manner endowed, was forthwith Countesse of Lincolne, who yet liuing, presently gaue the same to John Lucie her sonne in lawe. So also I may not passe ouer Hugh Courtney the first of that family and name, in the time of King Edward the third: for he, when hee had for many yeares after the death of Isabell de Fortibus (whose sole heire hee was) quietly possessed the lands and Fees of the earldome of Denbire, without cyther the Title or Inuerture of an Earle, and that at length contention arose betwixt him and the Kings officers of the Exchequer, for the repayment of the third penny, for that hee as yet vsed not the Stile of an Earle, hee hauing written Letters supplicatorie vnto the King, then busied in the warres in Scotland, receiued answer, That taking vnto himselfe the Name and Dignitie of an Earle, hee should cause himselfe, from that time forward, to be named and called Earle of Denbire, in these words.

The King to his welbeloued and faithful, Hugh of Courtney the Elder, &c. Greeting, &c. Whereas you, as appeareth by your Petition exhibited before vs and our Councell, haue of long beene sued for the repayment of eighteene pounds, sixe shillings and eight pence, of the yearly Fee of the Earldome of Denbire, which Isabell de Fortibus, late Countesse of Denbire, whose heire you are, and the heires of her the said Countesse, and yours, Earles of Denbire, yearly yearly receiued by the hands of the Sherifes of that Countie that were for the time being, and which you likewise after the death of the aforesaid Countesse, as her heire for a certaine time receiued: And for that they haue bene from you detained, because you haue in no wise named and stiled your selfe an Earle: as by the Certificate of the Treasurer, and of the Barons of our Exchequer, by our commandement made into our Chancery, more at large doth appeare. Wee, for that the inheritance which was the aforesaid Countesse, and the inheritance of her Predecessours, and yours, the Earles of Denbire, vnto you descended by hereditary right, and that you at this present hold the same inheritance; willing in this part to prouide, as well for our owne Dignitie, and the requite of your Kingdome, as for your honour: will and commaund you, in requesting you, that in taking vnto you the name and honour of an Earle, you from henceforth cause your selfe to be called Earle of Denbire, knowing that wee will make the aforesaid Fee to bee yearly payed vnto you, as it hath bene wont to bee payed vnto the Earles of Denbire your Predecessours. Witnesse the King at New-castle vpon Tine, the two and twentieth day of February, & in the ninth yeare of our reigne.

Last of all, we haue scene this same not long since, in Phillip Howard confirmed. For hee, after the most auncient right of the Earldome of Arundell, tooke vnto himselfe the Title of Arundell, the Queene onely consenting thereunto, and approving the same; no forme of Charter repeated, or of any forme of his Creation being thereunto ioyned.

Hitherto it seemeth also to appertaine, that our most auncient Earles were of auncient time wont (according to the diuersitie of the places) where they for the most part chose to dwell, to to bee called by diuerse Titles of Dignities. For Reynold who was Earle of Cornwall, for his continuall dwelling at Bristol, was oftentimes called Earle of Bristol.

Robert of Ferrars the younger, Earle of Ferrars in Normandie, and of Derbie in England, sometime wrote himselfe Earle of Tisbury, a Castle (videlicet) in the Borders of Stafford-shire built by his Progenitours. Baldwine and Richard of Riuers, were sometime called Earles of Exeter, and sometimes Lords of the Ile of Wight, for their continuall dwelling in the same places; when as yet in the meane time, they were both Earles of Denbire. William also of Albiniac, Earle of Arundell and Suffex, the first of that name, in the Letters of agreement betwixt King Stephen and King Henrie the second, set himselfe thereto a Witnes, by the name of William Earle of Cicester, for that he there oftentimes dwelt. Adde hereunto also if you please, the Earle of Penbrooke to haue bene called the Earle of Strigulia, of the Castle of Strigulia, built by William Fitz-Osborne Earle of Hereford, and the Seate of the Earles of Penbrooke.

These things (I say) were of olde and in auncient time, but now at this day, not so. For such is the force of time, and change in altering of the forms of things, as that it eating out of the olde, bringeth still in new. So vnto Earles, whom we said in auncient time to haue bene rewarded with the third penny of the Prouince whereof they were earles, to maintaine their Honour and Dignitie, a certaine summe of money is at this day yearly payed them out of the Exchequer, and they enioy the Titles of such places, as wherein they haue not any iurisdiction, administration, or profit at all. Barons also, who as the Fathers and Senators in auncient time among the Romans, were chosen by their Seueritas; were in like manner wont to bee esteemed and valued by Knights Fees (for why, hee which had and possessed thirteene Knights fees, and a little more, was then to bee accounted among the Barons) are now, more sildome times chosen for their vertue, their great wealth, and large possessions.

Neither is there any let, but that a man may hold and still retaine, the name and Title of a Barony, the head of which Barony (as they tearme it) he hath afterward sold or alienated to some other common person.

In briefe, our kings royall maiesty is alwayes like it selfe, constant, and the same; which hauing regard to the vertue, stock, wealth,

CHAP. XXIII.

Noblemen of the lesser sort.

He named Noble men which our Country of England beareth, and in honour excell- ing, I haue with as much breuitie as I could, declar-red, and in painting of it forth, propo- sed it vnto the eye: with what Lawes allof they are created, and with whar orders of successions they after our manner liue, I haue in few wordes briefly shewed. Now if I had vnto these also ioyned the Fellowes of the Order of the Garter, I might well seeme to haue ended this Treatise, beeing about to haue written nothing at all, of those whom we call Noble-men of the lesser sort, or Vnnamed: but the earnest and continual calling vp- pon of certaine of my friends, ouercame mee. Wherefore, seeing that it is ney- ther altogether strange from our pur- pose, and may be done without strain- ing of the Methode of that I haue taken in hand, both the place, and the requests of my friends haue inuited mee by the way to ioyne heereunto these few things heereafter following:

The Noblemen therefore of the les- ser sort, are in three fortis or ranks diu- dely comprehended.

The first ranke or order, is of Knights: The second is of Esquires: The third, of them we call onely by the name of Gen- tlemen.

Those whom the Frenchmen simplie call Gentilshommes, and wee in English Gentlemen, wee thus distinguish into three fortis:

First, hee which deriueth his Stocke with Armes from his Aunccestors, is by bloud a Gentleman.

Secondly, hee which beareth Armes onely, although he be not yet by Stocke a Gentleman, is yet called a Gentleman, and giueth Gentry vnto his sonnes.

Third-

wealth, and substance of any man (where- by hee may with his Councellor seruice, profit the Common-weale) may in euery place freely giue and bestow Dignities and Honours, sometime chusing moe Barons then one, out of one & the same family, the custome of the succession of the former and more auncient Baron, beeing still kept whole, and not in anie hurt: as wee see, Edward the sixt wisely to haue done in the familie of the Wilt- loughbies; which family (that for breui- tie sake I should not reckon vp moe) be- side the most auncient Barony of the Wilt- loughbies of Eresby, brought forth ano- ther Barony also of Parham. Wherefore wee acknowledge our Kings to bee the Fountaines of Politicall Nobilitie, and vnto whom we may with thanks, referre all the degrees of Honours and Digni- ties; wherefore I may not, without cause, seeme to reioyce on the behalfe of our Nobilitie of Britaine, which hath alwaies so had Kings themselves, Authours, Pa- trons, Gouvernours, and Defendours thereof, that when Lands, Fees, and Pol- sessions, subiect to Couenants or agree- ments, are still tossed and tymoyled with the stormes of the Iudicall Courts, and of the Common Lawe; it is onely vnto the Kings themselves beholden, and resteth vpon heroicall orders and institu- tions, proper and familiar vnto it selfe. So that

Per titulos numerentur aui, semp̄q; renata Nobilitate viris, & prolem fatā sequantur: Continuum propriā seruantia lege tenorem.

By Titles great, mens Aunccestors were knowne still as they came, And so their owne posteritie, do still enjoy the same; And flourish long without decay, with euerlasting fame.

For the Noble-men, for deciding of suites concerning their Honours, and for the giuing vnto euery man that which of right belongeth vnto his Farme and Digni- tie, haue their Tribunall or proper Marriall Court, which they are wont to call, The Court of Chaultry: whereof, when wee shall come vnto the Order of Knight-hood, wee shall say somewhat more.

The Court of Chaultrie.

Thirdly, hee which is of reputation onely for his learning, or for some Of- fice or function which hee beareth, hee onely for himselfe, is in common esti- mation accounted a Gentleman; al- though he had a common person for his Father, and leaue his Sonnes common persons also.

Esquires.

An Esquire, who sometime is also cal- led Scutifer, or a Shield-bearer, and in an- cient time Homo ad Arma (or a Man at Armes) in French Esquire, and in En- glish a Squire, or an Esquire, is next vnto a Knight: as hee who in ancient time following a Knight, by his side bare his Armes, as a most faithfull fellow-soul- dier with him, From whence perhaps, they whom wee at this day in our Kings houles, account Squires for the bodie, seeme to haue taken their beginning. But that which at first was by institution a militarie Office, is now become a de- gree of dignitie: whereof, Antiquitie it selfe, and the custome of our Kingdome hath brought forth vnto vs foure kinds.

The first doth comprehend all the younger sonnes of Barons, and of other Noble-men, and their first begotten Sonnes also; who together with their being first borne, make the dignitie of Esquireship successorie, so long as their issue male faileth not.

Another kinde (and that most aunc- ient) is of them, which are borne the eldest Sonnes of Knights, and their el- dest Sonnes also.

The third is of them, which of aunc- ient time graced with Armes belonging vnto their Stocke and Family, are the first begotten and chiefe of their house and stocke. And these by a certayne pre- rogatiue of being the eldest or first born, goe before all the rest of the Gentlemen of the same Family aside descended, and are accounted Esquires.

The fourth kind respecteth the com- mon-weale, and the Kings house. For they which beare publique Offices in the Common-weale, are of Gentlemen in reputation made Esquires. Such as are the Iudges, the Kings Attorney, and Prolocutor: the Sergeants at Law, and other Officers of like sort belonging vnto the Exchequer.

Vnto these also wee may especially ioyne, if not preferre, such as proceede

Doctors of Diuinitie, or otherwise in other professions in the Vniuersities. For Doctorship is a Title of Dignitie more noble, then they which are Gentlemen but by their stocke onely: vnto whom al- so after our manner, in the Kings Com- missions concerning the publike affaires, so much preeminence is giuen, as that they may well seeme in dignitie, to bee compared with Knights.

In the Kings house also, the Appari- tors, commonly called Sergeants at Armes, Heralds, and all seruing in the Kings Court, whom for the praemi- nence of their Offices, we also call Ser- geants, are made Esquires with chaines, (viz.) with a Collar made of Silver and blacke S S put about their neckes by the Kings themselves.

Knights (in French called Cheualiers) are with vs called either Knights Ban- ners, Knights of the Bath, or Knights Batchellors.

Other there be of the Garter also, but of another sort, then that they are to be comprehended in a kind, to be compared with these as in due place is to be shewed.

■ Banneret is a degree of Honour, esteemed the last amongst the greatest (I meane Nobilitati maiorum) or the first with those of the second ranke. Three formes of creations I haue obserued, as sometimes vnder the Royall Standard displayed: the person hauing the lower end of his Pennon cut off into a square (such as Barons vse) receiue that Ho- nour: Or as Edward the third enioyned William de la Poole by Patten, Per statum & honorem teneret & continueret Banne- retis, To him and to his heires: Or as Nicholas de Grey was declared, by Writ of King Edward the second, to be, De familia Regis tanquam Banneretius; thereby meaning, both Precedencie and Salary accordingly.

The two other Knight-hoods Batchel- lors, and of the Bath, admit this difference betweene them, that to the one from ec- lectiue grace of the Soueraigne (to at- tend himselfe or Quene in their inaugu- rations, or his Childrens creations) here is annexed a Ministeriall duetie to their knightly dignities; the other, nothing be- ing left but their bare Stile and proper Merite; and therefore they are eyther in the Record, mentioned by none other name then Milites simplici, yet had in former ages (as well as other degrees of honour) many worthy and religious ceremonies, as also peculiar robes at their Creations (as appeareth copiously both in story and record.) But they by injury of times, and promiscuous admissions (which somewhat declined their reputation) had become fully lost, had not the other preferred the memory and use of such venerable order.

As for right of precedency between these two; or whether such temporal service enlarged to the one more than the other, inueth a perpetuall priority or no, I leave it to the discussion of those, to whom in due of place, and depth of Judgement, it properly belongeth.

No man is borne a Knight, but men vpon their knees receive that Dignity (which is not but together with life lost, or taken away) of the King, or his Lieutenant generally, having regard cyther to his stocke, his vertue, or his fortune, or his actes done at home or abroad; lightly striking him that is to be created, vpon the shoulder with a drawne Sword. The Prince speaking these words in French; Soyez bon Cheualier d'oresenauant au nom de Dieu: (Bee from hence-forth a good Knight, in the name of God.) And they which are so made Knights, having kissed the Sword, and this word (Sir) being added vnto their names, for tearme of their lues, are euery where (after the French manner in calling of their Kings) distinguished from other men; Sir John Norris, Sir Francis Drake. A dignity indeede of it selfe so found, apparant, & full of honor, as that it euery where becometh most great Dukes and Earles: and which euery Kings theslues haue not disdained kindly to thanke one another for. For so we reade our King Henry the second of that name, to haue made Malcolm King of the Scots, Knight at Turwin in France, for his good seruice at Thalouise, in the year 1159. And Alexander, the Sonne of William King of the Scots, being not 14 years old, so haue received the order of knighthood in England, in the year 1212. Hugh Perre restored vnto the Earldome of Oxford, was by the King made Knight. Henry of Lary also in the right of his Wife, and by the resignation of his Mother in law, promoted to be Earle of Lincolne, recei-ued the third penny of his Earldome from the time he was made knight, about ten years more or lesse before hee was created Earle. Beside that, the ancient Register of the Church of Abingdon thus reporteth.

Richard Earle of Chester, with his mother Ermentrude, lodged in the Towne of Abingdon; Farritus the Abbot, and the Countesse his Mother, earnestly calling vpon him, confirmed for wel done, whatsoever was done concerning the Land of Wimondisleye, and with his writing strengthened the same. Which writing, he appointed to bee sealed with his Mothers Seale, for he being not yet knighted, all the Letters by him any whether directed, were closed with his Mothers Seale. And for this cause it is, that it is noted, the writing to be signed rather with the seale of the Countesse, then of the Earle himselfe. Of which writing, this is the forme; Richardus Comes Cestræ, & Ermentrudis Comitissa Mater eius, Nigillo de Oylly, &c. Richard Earle of Chester, and Ermentrudis the Countesse, his Mother, to Nigill of Oylly, &c.

This same thing doe also the ancient formes of the Parliament writs testify. For it is manifest, Kings haue bene wont to summon the Nobility of the kingdom vnto their Parliaments. Ioanni Marchioni de Montecuto Cheualier (vnto John Marquesse of Montacute Knight: And Henrico vi. Henrico Vicecomiti Bourchier Militi (Henry the vi. vnto Henry Vicecount Bourchier Knight.) 1. Edward 4. &c. Which manner of calling, although it hath begun of long to grow out of use in others of the Nobility, yet eyther in calling out of new Barons, or in summoning of the olde, it is still right seriously obserued: as Gulielmo Brooke de Cobham Cheualier (vnto William Brooke of Cobham knight.) And Gulielmo Cecil de Burghley Militi (to William Cecil of Burghley knight) when as they both were commonly knowne and called Barons or Lords of Cobham, & of Burghley: so that a man would almost say, the order of knights to bee the Seminary of the Baronage of England.

I let passe in the meane time, with how great solemnity of the kingdom, and charges of the Subiects, Kings in ancient time were wont to conferre and bestow this Military honour and dignity vpon their their eldest Sonnes, (viz.) the Princes of Wales, and with what luster and magnificence, Emperours and Kings ioyned in league together, (by a certaine mutuall and as it were natural power of monarchs among themselues, in bestowing Nobility according to the Lawe of Nations) haue dismissed one anothers Subiects & Ambassadors, graced with this Dignitie. I list only heereunto to ioine an auncient forme, with the Rites and Ceremonies thereof, out of an old Chronicle of a certaine namelesse writer; Anno (saith he) 1316. Dominus Richardus de Rodney factus fuit Miles apud Keynsham die translationis Sancti Thomæ Martyris in præsentia domini Almarici Comitis de Penbroke, qui cinxit eum gladio, & Dominus Mauricius de Barkley super pedem dextrum posuit unum calcem: & Dominus Bartholomæus de Badelismere (Baro uterque) supposuit aliud super pedem sinistrum in Aula, & hoc facto, recessit cum honore. In the year 1316. Lord Richard of Rodney, was made Knight at Keynsham, vpon the day of the translation of Saint Thomas the Martyr, in the presence of Almaricus Earle of Penbrooke, who girt him with the Sword: and the Lord Maurice of Barkley put one Spurre on his right foot, and the Lord Bartholomew of Badelismere (both of them Barons) put the other Spurre vpon his left foot in the Hall; and this done, he with honour departed. But now according to the manner of the time, we liue after another fashion; and in this, as in other things, the change and alteration of things hath taught vs, what an alteration of things the long continuance of time is able to make. So in thinking of the beginning of Knights, and as well of the antiquitie of the Order of Knighthood, as of the preheminance thereof above other dignities and honours, I can scarce resolue my selfe, but that this name of olde should seeme to make shew vnto me of some (I wot not what) magnificent and maiestick things contayned in the same, and more excellent then Nobility it selfe: and mounting (as it were) into the royall Throanes, sitteth as it were a Iudge in the Iudgement seate, and the Protectour of all ciuill Nobility. For the deciding of suites concerning honours, and for the preservation vnto euery man the right of his fame or dignity, the natural tribunall Seate or Court for the Nobilitie, is euery where called Militaris; that is to say, the Martiall or Militarie Court, and commonly, the Court of Chivalrie: the forme whereof with vs is this. The appointed place for the holding thereof, is the Kings Hall: wherein the Constable of the Kingdome, and the Marshall of England sit as Iudges, where any Plaintife, either in case of dignities or of Armes, or of any other sute or controuersie concerning Nobility and Honour, may sue the Defendant. But the forme wherein the Constable of England was wont to call the Nobility and Gentry vnto his Court or Iudgement seate, was on this sort:

Iehan filz du Roy Constable d'Angleterre, &c.

John the Kings Sonne, Constable of England, and Warden of the East-marches toward Scotland, to our welbeloued Cozin, Sir Rafe Newile, Earle of Weimerland, and Marshall of England, greeting. We command and charge you, that you cause to come and appeare before vs at Westminster, the ninth day of May next coming, before Monsieur Edward Hastings, to answer to Monsieur Reynold Lord of Grey, and of Ruthyn, concerning that which he shall then charge him with in our court of Cheualry, concerning the full using and bearing of his Armes, and to that the Lord Grey saith, and as it shall be more fully declared at the same day; and further to doe and receive that which the Lawe and the custome of our said Court shall in this part require. Returning before vs at the aforesaid day with this our Precept, al that you shall therein haue done. Given at Westminster vnder the Seale of our Office, the first day of May, in the reigne of my most dread Lord and Father King Henry the fourth, after the Conquest, the eight.

Iehan filz, frere, e Vncle au Roys, Duc de Bedford, &c.

John, Sonne, Brother, and Vncle to Kings, Duke of Bedford and Aniow, Earle of Richmond, and of Kendall, and Constable of England, vnto our welbeloued Cozin, John duke of Northfolke, Marshall of England, greeting. We command and charge you, that you cause to be arrested, and to come before vs or our Lieutenant at Westminster, vpon the 15. of S. Hillarie next comming, Williams Clopton of the Countie of Suffolke Esquire, then to answer before vs or our Lieutenant in the Court of Chivalrie, to Robert Eland of the Countie of Lincolne Esquire, to that which he the said Robert shal then charge him with by the way of Arms, as hauing set and put to the Seale of his Armes to a false and forged writing, done to the hurt and danger of him the said Robert an hundred pounds, and more then that, as he saith. Returning before vs at the sayd day, with this our Mandate, all that which you shall haue therein done. Given vnder the Seale of our Office, the 23. day of November, in the sixteenth yeare of the reigne of our Lord the King, & since the Conquest of England, the hundred.

The forme of the prosecuting of the action, is on both sides tryed, by the looking into of Letters Patents, auncient Charters, and of Euidences (as they tearme them) and by Witnesses. All things are (for the most part) acted by their Aduocates, in Writings, in Latine or in French. At length the definitive Sentence, according vnto equitie and right, and our owne heroycall custome, and not after any strange maner, sealed with the publike Seale of the Office is openly read, and afterward is deliuered to the Earle Marshall, to be put into execution. If any thing chance to be vnprouidedly done, or vnaduisedly in the sute ouer-slipped on eyther part, it is lawfull for them to appeale vnto the king, who is wont to referre the whole matter vnto the Bishops, and other Ecclesiasticall persons, vnto the learned Lawyers, and others of most vpright life, to be diligently againe examined & expounded. And euen in this very manner it was argued, adjudged, and appealed, betwixt Reynold Baron Gray of Ruthen, and Edward Hastings Knight, concerning the Armes of the Hastings, in the reigne of King Henry the third. Likewise, betwixt the Barons of Louell and Morley, for the Armes of the familie of Burnell. And Richard Scroope Plaintiffe, against Robert Grosvenour Defendant, in an Action of Armes in the ninth yeare of the reigne

But this I leaue to the iudicious labor of that noble person and excellent iudgement, who now can onely repaire the lamented ruines of that Iurisdiction, hauing bequeathed vnto him the Genius of those his renowned Aunccestours, that so many yeares lued vp with famous memory, the Iudgement Seate of this Royall Court, referring the eye of further search, eyther to the Kings Records, or to those Registers of Armes and Honor whome it concerneth most to seeke out such Monuments with the Genealogies of Families, and the Armes of Stockes and Kindreds to distinguish the same, to write things done, and to register them vp in Bookes, for the perpetuall remembrance thereof. And who themselves acknowledging the high Constable, and the Earle Marshall of England for their Patrons, receiue yearly pensions from the Kings, and are by them with notable priuiledges rewarded.

Heere at length I might haue a large occasion to speake of the solemne Ceremonies of the Heralds; of their institution, immunities (both in time of peace and warre) and of the auncient reputation had of them amongst all Nations: if it were lawfull for mee to roame at large beyond the breuitie I haue vnto my selfe propounded, and whom therefore I had purposed in silence to haue passed ouer. But, lest I writing of so many degrees of out Noblemen, and so great things concerning Politicall Nobility, (in leauing to be spokesmen for themselves) I might seeme to haue spoken vnaduisedly, and not indifferently, I thought it good briefly, and by the way, to touch these things concerning Heralds. They were in auncient time Feriales, or as Messengers of the publike faith and credit. But since the time Princes and Monarks, for dispatch of their affaires, first began to haue their Ambassadors resident one of them with another, the reputation of Heralds is so impaired, as that they euerie where liue as men neglected, & quite ouerthrowne. Yet what our Heraldes be, and in what houses, and vnder what Lawes they (by the fauour of our Kings) together with vs in safety dwell, I will heere, as it were, in a short Inuentorie, propound vnto the eye of the Reader.

Garret King of Armes, for the supereminent Dignity of the Garter, is of the the cheefe; whose peculiar Office it is, with all dutifull seruice to attend vpon the Knights of that order. To aduertise them which are chosen of their new election, to call them to bee enstalled at Windsor, and to cause their Armes to be hangd vp vpon their seats. At their burials, to haue a care of their Funerall Rites & Ceremonies. Wherefore, (beside the yearly wages given him by the Knights) he is by the King himselfe rewarded with a Salary double to the rest. In euery new Emperour, King, Prince, Duke, Marquess, Earle, Vicount, Baron, or Knight, to be into this order enstalled, hee challengeth of him the vppermost Garment, which he on that day weareth. He also sheweth vnto euery new Baron, called vnto the Parliament, the place wherein he is to sit among his Peeres, and ordereth other things concerning their order.

Clarentius, who is King of Armes of al the East, West, & South Provinces of England, on this side of the Riuer of Trent.

Marrey, who is also acknowledged for king of Arms through the north part of the kingdom, beyond the Riuer of Trent.

These two haue by charter power to visit the Noblemen's Families, to set downe their Pedegrees, to distinguish their armes, & in the open Market-place, to reprove such as falsely take vpon the Nobility or Gentry. And to order euery Mans Exequies & Funerals, according to their Dignity, & to appoint vnto them their Armes or Ensignes, &c. And in all things gouern the Heralds as well as Garter.

Heralds and Pursuivants

Who in all things endeavour themselves for the defence of their society, or to their own lawfull profite in private, and willingly depend of the commandments of the kings

And these onely are the Kings Heralds, with vs so called, for that they receiue wages of the kings, and with publike seruice, serue all the Nobility of the kingdom.

Howbeit, Noble-men and Peeres of this Land, in ancient time had their Heralds peculiar vnto themselves. For Chester the Herald, and Falco the Pursuiuant, liued at the command of the Prince of Wales, and serued him. Humfrey, Duke of Glocester, and Earle of Penbrooke, had the Herald Penbrooke his household Seruant.

Richard also, Duke of Glocester, hauing now obtayned the kingdom, would needs haue his Herald Glocester, to bee called King of Armes for all Wales. Charles Brandon

Brandon Duke of Suffolke, retained Suffolke Herald, and Marleon the Pursuiuant, his Seruants. The Marquess of Dorchester, kept Groby the Herald. The Earle of Northumberland kept Northumberland the Herald, and Eperance the Pursuiuant. Arthur Plantagenet Viscount L'Isle, took vnto himselfe L'Isle the Pursuiuant: and Baron Hastings, Hastings the Pursuiuant. These it pleased me to haue out of many others rehearsed, who serued Noblemen in their peculiar and domestically seruices. But the condition of the Seruant is made better, by the dignity of his Lord and Master, so these forenamed Heralds liued nor with like authority or priuiledges as with the Kings.

So I breuely touch all things, for the beautifying and setting forth of Politicall Nobility: Now at length (by the Heralds leave) let it bee lawfull for mee to ioyn hereunto and insert some few things concerning Armes, whereby Noblemen are wont to be knowne from the vulgar sort, and to be among themselves by families diuided, being wont in ancient time to be more sparingly bestowed, then in this our age, and onely vpon such, as had with their good seruice deserued them.

But such kinde of Armes seeme not to haue taken beginning, but of such military rewards, as were wont to be given vnto well deseruing men, in the Roman Common-weale. For the Romans, alwayes most strived for the obtayning of honor and glory, for the nourishing whereof, they with ornaments and rewards, laboured to stirre vp mens mindes, for the performance of noble actions, both at home and abroad. In warres flourished Military gifts, Trophies, Triumphall Arches, Letters Laureat, &c. In time of peace, at home were shewed honourable Titles, Images, Statues, and such like. Things indeed wisely at first deuised, and afterward so together with the Empire encreased, that how many, and what manner of Crowns, Bracelets, Chaines, and Crests, euery man had deserued; what manner of trappings, Spears, Darts, or Belts, they had gotten: these they were wont in their expeditions in the wars, to beate in their Targets and Bucklers, or set vpon their Helms; and againe, returning home, in time of peace, euery good Seruator did hang them vp in their houses; and those Ornaments they

by the name of Armes, were wont by long order of succession, to deliuer ouer vnto their posterity: and hereof those armes of Families, heere and there distinguished by the Nobility, vsed in diuers kingdomes, were (if it please you to thinke) of the Germanes called Wappen, in our language Armes, and in Latine Arma, for that with them the enemies were repulsed.

These things the ancient Roman Coyne declare, and the credible ancient Romaine Writers; the vse whereof so at length preuailed in kingdomes, that as names distinguished men from men, euen so Armes diuided Nations from Nations, and Families from Families: first granted by Kings themselves, but afterward by the Heralds (Kings of Armes) by a Royall transmissiue power granted vnto them, they euery where especially seruing the Politicall Nobility, vnto whom I willingly leaue these things. And therefore the name and office of the Heralds was euery where notable, and well becoming an honest man; whom they of ancient time wer wont to call the Fosterers of Politicall Nobility, the Arbiters of Equity, the Protectors of Verity, the Ambassadors of Princes, and the Writers of mens noble actes.

But woe is me, that I carried with a certaine winde of this Method, haue thus euen against my will landed vpon our Heralds, whom (I know not by what destiny) euery man figheth and mourneth to see them working their owne destruction. Although indeed it be not so much to be maruailed at, seeing that the cause is right manifest (for lawfull bee it for mee to say the truth, which the thing it selfe spekech) (viz.) the want of the Martiall Court, or Court of Chindry, whereof I but now spake. For why, Nobility it selfe beeing oftentimes hurt or impaired, the Heralds themselves therewith languish also.

And yet for all that, heroycall truth waiteth another Patroness, euen amongst the most Noble and reuerend Antiquity, although as it were banished, and almost a stranger in her owne house, hath together with the Muses, her most louing, kinde and earnest Patroness, and who were not euen vnto my selfe also wanting in the perfecting of these my endeours & purposes.

These are the Orders and Degrees, of both our sorts of Nobility, Named and Unnamed. Now into what ranks they are among themselves divided, and what honour they owe one of them vnto another (by a certaine right of precedence) receiue heere in briebe.

The Sonnes of Knights, which are of the Kings priuy Councell, for the time, hold the places which their Fathers being knighted, were knowne to hold, beneath the Barons Sonnes. But the antiquity of the creation of euery Knight is to be regarded: by which reasons, the Sonnes of the elder Knights, goe before the Sonnes of them that were more later created. Amongst Esquires, the antiquity of their Families, their wealth, and publike offices are considered; whereby it commeth to passe, that the wiues of them of the chee-fer Families, or of such as beare great Offices take their places before others.

Howbeit, wee see no certainty to be here set downe concerning the places of Esquires or their Wiues, neyther concerning the places of yonger Brothers wiues forasmuch as many such things oftentimes chance, as cannot in any certaine rules be comprehended: like as it vseth to happen in Named Nobility (viz.) in Princes, Dukes, Marquesses, Earles, Vicounts, and Barons.

Knights of the Order of the Garter.*

E said in the beginning, in the diuiding and reckoning vp of our Nobility, it not to be beside our purpose, if I should vnto them also ioyn the fellowship of the order of the Garter, of others (by farre) the most honourable. For that it maketh Knights, and sometime them of the lesser Nobility also, being met for their vertue and valour, both in peace and warre about others famous, not only equall vnto Noblemen at home, but almost euen vnto Kings themselves & Emperors. An order verily of all the orders of the Christian world (if it be to be compared with any other) most ancient and most famous, wherein the most true Nobility it selfe, together with Religion and vertue, attended vpon with five and twenty most famous Knights, is sene that (I may so say) with vndeified Maiesty to sit in the Royall Throne. Wherefore, seeing that it is an order of so great dignity, and more famous then any other Nobility; & greater, then that it can in ranke with the other orders be included, as which includeth all the other degrees of Nobility, I haue purposed as briefly as I could, here to set it downe alone, and there-withall to conclude this Treatise.

CHAP.

CHAP. XXV.

The Order of the Knights of the Garter, when, and by whom it was ordained.

Edward the third, the most inuincible King of England and of France, a Prince principally endowed with a manner of piety, magnanimitie, and wisdom, in the xxiiij. yeare of his reigne, after he had oftentimes ouer the Frenchmen and Scots triumphed, vnto the honour of Almighty God, whereunto he (as becomed a deuout King referred al things) in his Castle at Windsor, ordained the Military Ornaments and Ceremonies of the Knights of the Garter: whereunto he gaue the name of the Blew Garter (but commonly called the Garter). and wherein hee appoynted the Kings of England as chiefe, and five and twentie Knights or Fellowes and Companions together. Who being men both for their martial prowesse and birth, most famous, and most chosen Chieftaines solemnely sworne, and binding themselves together with a bond of mutuall and perpetual friendship, for the defence of the honour and dignity of their Colledge and Fellowship, refuse not to vndergoe any danger, no not death it selfe. And therefore they are called Fellowes of the Garter, for that they haue the Calfe of their Leg bound about with a little Girdle, set with precious stones, which we call a Garter: the speciall Cognifance of the order, whereon it is in French, in golden Letters thus writte: Hony Soit. Qui. Mal. T. Pense. All these Knights once yearly attired in the Robes and Ornaments of their Order, meete together vpon the 23. day of April, a day dedicated to Saint George. The Rites and ceremonies, where-with they for the most great preheminance of their Order, are with most great solemnity chosen and enstalet at Windsor, and the Statutes vnder which these Fellowes and Companions liue, seeing they can in iust Volumes be scarce contained, cannot here in few words be expressed. Wherefore I list onely to rehearse the names of them, which from the beginning, or together with king Edward himselfe, were the Founders thereof, or else haue by our Kings from time to time, for some their vertue about others, bene still chosen to be Fellowes of that most honorable Order, in stead of them that were dead, euen vnto this our age.

THE PERORATION, OR EPILOGVE OF THE WHOLE VVORKE.

Hus haue I at last concluded this Treatise of Nobilitie Politicke, Dative, and Native, as breecely as I could, and the greatnesse & dignitie of the subiect would permit. First, generally; as applyed to the Customes of Countries, whereto the same is tide; then particularly exemplified, by the Rites and Ceremonies in vse among our selues. Wherein, if seeking to adorne the magnificence of so stately a Theame, with eloquence of words, and beauty of style, as it selfe doth deserue, I seeme to haue failed, I must plead for my selfe, as a plaine meaning man, that sometimes through zeale and deuotion to the Church, vnderooke to craue an Image, representing the Deity and greatnesse of his God, out of trembling and feare, was forced to craue ayde of skilfuller workmen, hauing nothing to excuse the weaknesse of his wit, and expiate withall, the horror of his worke, but pious simplicity. Euen such is my case; For I willingly confesse, that being doubtfull of my selfe when I tooke this Taske in hand, yet my hope and comfort was, that howsoeuer I might erre, and heerein bewray my skill, my faults prouing veniall, I might giue occasion, to stir vp riper wits, to further the perfection of this rude and rough-hewd worke, and Whetston like at least, to set and sharpen others.

If now by the sight and view heereof, (such as it is) any like to take the paines from the sheathe, to the blade; from the shape, to the substance; & from the shadow, to the body, to wade any further; the Volume now succeeding, as well of all the Persons, as their atchieuements of honour, marriages, alliances, and descents, that euer this Monarchy hath inuested & ennobled with the titles and degrees of Political Nobility, from the Earles vpward. (Vice-Comes and Barons make a Volume of themselves) digested into Catalogues, will further declare.

A worke, though not so perfect as the time may make it proue, for at the beginning, what thing was euer so? (Without pride be it spoken) of extraordinary study, care, and industry. Wherein, if onely for the publike, I haue thus employed my selfe, and done my best endeavour, To ascribēs one heere to the etai. Let no mā take occasion to taxe me of double diligence, much lesse of affectation, selfe-loue, or flattery, that propounding thus a Pilgrimage pretended to bee generall, I haue spent my whole deuotion on the Saints of Great Brittain. I was to fit my mould to the matter already framed, and therto wholly bending and deuiling with my selfe, I aymed withall, in secret to redeeme so faire a subiect (subsisting euery where on speciall Lawes and Rites) from the wandring Ideas of discoursing Philosophers, and contemplatiue Diuines to her owne proper Station, and peculiar Customes, that others else-where desirous of the like, I might seeme rather to giue, then to stay their good example.

It remains then now, to make good my first diuision into Celestiall, Morall, and Politicall Nobility, that I lay downe

the dignity of each by themselves, that by plaine demonstration and comparing of their Effences mutually together, the world may see, how euen this of Great Brittain (which heere I call Ours) is of it selfe absolutely, the most assured Pat-terne, and best ordered of all others.

By Gods eternall prouidence, it is so fore-ordained, that for ornament and safety of humane life and Nature, wee see and feele daily, some steppes as it were of diuine intelligence, and seeds of Morall vertue, still fostered vp within vs, euen in this lower world.

Est Deus in Nobis agitante calefimus illo.

That (diuine intelligence) by heauenly inspiration, doth teach vs to know God, and moues vs to serue him with all holiness of soule, and religious obseruation.

This (vertuous disposition) by an inbred ingenuity, becomes the Mother of this our Positiue Nobility. For, as these two still ioyned together, first open the way by steps and degrees (though by diuers passages) to come to Kingly Grace, and Soueraigne Endowments, Daintely, so

Ex Ingeniis sunt Eugenia Eugenes, from inbred Ingenuity, men first become Generous, which also leads them on in the selfe-same Nobility Natiuely. For as goodlinesse or piety, by diuine inspiration, and in-bred Ingenuity, by vertues infusion, makes vulgar men exempted, and so honestly respected aboue their fellows, that nothing may disgrace them, but iniquity and heresie, yielding matter and occasion to this kinde of Nobility that subiects obtaine from Soueraigne grace & fauour, Daintely: Euen so, where grace becomes so fixed in the person of any, that nothing can remoue it but Death or high-treason; it begets generosity by descending to posterity, Natiuely. So that, as to be gloriously happy in the world to come, by diuine inspiration from God to man, by the name of piety, proceeds from Christianity imputatiuely. And as to be honourably esteemed before God and man, for inbred ingenuity, by the name of probity, proceeds from ciuility insusiuely, so to be lawfully exempted from the vulgar sort, by the name of Generosity, proceeds from grace, Mediate or Immediate respectiuely al worthily ennobled in their severall kindes and places: whereby the meanest Subiect being thus made happy, becomes aswell Nobilis (which wee call a gentleman, and the French found Gentilhomme) as the Emperor himselfe, saying, Foy de Gentilhomme*. And, Me vray Gentilhomme aussy bien que le Roy. Though in English and in French, the word it selfe seeme straightened. For we call no man Noble, but from the Baron vpward, where Nobilis in Latine, includes the meanest Gentleman, aswell as Lords and others. The names of Kings, Princes, Dukes, Marquesses, Earles, Vice-Counts & Barons, &c. being titles of prehemence, to distinguish the celebrity of each mans place & function, for orderly precedence.

Thus then, though none become Christians by the rules of piety, carnally; and our inbred-ingenuity, proceed not from our Parents by the rules of probity, naturally; yet a Gentleman, one may be both reputed, and so called by the lawes of celerity, alias Cheualry, alias Heraldry, euen for humanity, and honest conuersation ciuilly, and so become ennobled in himselfe and his posterity Politically. For, Est aliquid clarus Magnoris splendor Anoris Illud posteritas amula calcar habet.

And as to be a Christian, is the glory of all Nobility, and to be an honest man, is of it selfe most honourable: so to be advanced by the eye of Soueraigne Majesty, with such Ensignes of Nobility, as demonstrate his celebrity in himselfe and his posterity, is properly most Noble; Armes being in this respect ordayned to limit Families, as proper names do men. Whereby (this) stands distinguished fro the other (two.)

For the first, from religious imputation, being hid fro the world, makes Christians only glorious by faith, with God in heaue.

The second, from vertuous infusion, makes honesty most honorable, & vertue still admired by good works among men.

And this third, from absolute affection in Soueraigne loue and grace, makes subiects rise ennobled respectiuely abroad, but properly at home, for seruices performed in the Church and Common-weale.

Now, all that haue the happinesse to be glorified in heauen, or honoured vpon earth, or ennobled at the least, recieue it first or last from God, & his Lieutenants, whose insusiuue grace and greatnesse, are the grounds of all our credits.

The first, by Diuines, being religiously taught taught, and the second by Philosophers, being morally disputed, like Twins of one birth, or cousin-germans at least, by piety and probity in a heauenly kinde of kindred, makes mortall men immortal, and by fame to liue for euer. But the third, which this Treatise hath begot, or gladly would restore, being mere positiue with Kings, within their kingdomes, and Orphan-like committed to their care and speciall trust, depends vpon their wils, their Rites and Country Customes. From whence it is, we see such Rankes of Nobility, such feuerall names of dignities, and titles of honor, bestowed vpon Subiects for Piety and Probity, conspicuous in the world by Soueraigne grace and fauour. Vho at first, being but meane, and of slender beginnings, become at last extolled to places of renouwe, from the foot-stoole, aduanced to the type and top of honour, & the same like ebbs and floods, with time againe decline.

These kindes of Nobility thus feuerally laide open, and by a three-fold disposition made apt to be diuided, are not (notwithstanding) so at odds within themselves, that their Natures and their Effences admit no reconciliation, or may not be vnited in one Person altogether.

For the first, being celestiall, and meerly diuine, admits no worldly vanity, whose Soueraigne is God, and whose Robes of perfection wee shall then put on vpon vs, when wee come to be presented before Christ our King in Heauen. This is our cheefest glory, our summum bonum, and highest blisse, whereto who strues to rise, and hopes to attaine, must worke it out by faith, and lay his foundation on the true Christian-Catholique and Apostolique-Religion, without which, euen Vertue her selfe, with all her Morall Lessons, auails vs nothing, as pointing onely to this end, ayms at this happinesse, but obtains it neuer.

And they that being heere conuersant with me on earth, haue their mindes so cleare and enlightened from aboue, that fore-seeing this end, they bend themselves thereto, and by a prudent care and constancy, still ayning at Iustice, seeke onely the good of the Church and Common-wealth. These (I say) by their vertues once conspicuous, become for euer famous, and worthily honoured with that kinde of Nobility, which Philosophers so magnifie and extoll vnto the world.

Now, these also at length being noted by their names, and made knowne to Soueraigne Kings (that as Gods with God. Almightie rule heere the earth in common) are by them ennobled; first Daintely, with that Nobility, which descending to posterity, by right of inheritance, is Native of it selfe, and in all places subiect to peculiar Customes. From whence it comes to passe, that seeing Honesty, the height and type of honour, and vertue the way that leads vs thereunto; wee admire more Nobility Daintely, being truly deriued and raised for it selfe, then that which is Native, and descended from other, as whose person first for vertues sake, being for it selfe beloued, becomes with all illustrious, and layes the foundation of happinesse in others. Natus Genuit & Praesens, & Quae non fecimus ipsi: vix ea nostra voco. For though in Nobility Politike and Ciuill, Generosity by antiquity, seeme to be respected: and to be borne a Lord, he more Noble, then so to be created; yet is it not so honourable, though farre more generous. For Vertue of her selfe being euery way magnificent, first honours the Father, then dignifies the Sonne, & magnifies posterity, which by the Grecians is more significantly spoken, and better vnderstood, by their Eugenia and genation applying this to Ingenuity, which belongs vnto the minde, and that vnto Celebrity more proper to the kinde.

This then at the last, is that Celestiall, Morall, and Politick Nobility, that at first I propounded; whereto, when Diuines in their Sermons seeme to speake, and Philosophers by discourses goe about to dispute, they demonstrate nothing but Allegorical idolum; and imaginary shadowes, the substance wherof, wee must hope to finde in Heauen; when as heere euen on earth, for the good & furtherance both of Church and Common-wealth, it is cherished and dignified at the hands of Soueraigne Kings, and as fittest for graue Councellors placed next vnto themselves, wherof this rude Treatise contains the truest patternes; that the world affords; namely, The Nobility of this Athenacy of Great-Brittain. And therein as Insuper Omni Primum and Modell of the rest, the most Honourably-Table Order of knights of the

there being nothing found recorded, for Religion, in them more beleeving a christian; for Vertue more Heroicall; nor for Policy more assured, then this Religiously most Honourable and most Noble Society. For whereas all other of like institution, by growing ouer-vulgar, are become the lesse esteemed; or prouing else but idle, are at all hands neglected: onely This is still so well supplied with the Flower of true Nobility, that euer fresh and springing, by yearly shewes and lusters, it diminisheth the beholders with greater admiration, then the best words of my Pen are able to viter.

For heere, all behold Maiesty her selfe, betweene Greatnesse and Decorum, descend from her Throne, to walke & talke kindly with her owne Nobility: and Nobility it selfe betweene Honour and Reuerence, ascending on the Seate of her own Soueraigne Maiesty.

Heere the Religion of our Church, the Wisedome of our State, and the Nobility of our Court, admiring Kingly Maiesty, meete all in one together.

And heere our King with his Prince, our Prince with his Peeres, and our Peeres with their Worthies, meete and march together in one Bond of Loue, in one Order of Chualty, for mutual defence both of Church and Common-wealth, amazing the beholders with the stately sight and view of one personall Maiesty, in one fellowship of Honour, and one body of vnsustained and true Nobility.

Heere therefore to conclude, as the fittest place to end this weake and slender Treatise. If that which hath bene faide, deserves to be regarded (as Truth sayes it should) why do the Soueraignes and Monarchs of the world, then wrong themselves in their Greatnesse and Authority, giuing way to proud violence, and prophane intrusion, wherby Popes haue put downe Emperors, & Cardinals presume to compare themselves with Kings? For whereas they alone by speciall Commission and Preheminance of place, and Vncommunicable power, and Prerogative of Grace, are made the Moderators of the virtuous endeours, and onely Creators of all Titles of Honour, belonging to their Subiects, they suffer Nobility to be tied, as it were against her owne Nature, to Fees, Houses, Cattles, Cities, and Lands, sencelesse and transitory, that neyther infuse Religion, nor administer Justice, nor encrease cyther in their prophane Possessors, nor make vulgar Tenants more honest, or more noble. For Ornanda potius est Dignitate Domus quam ex Domu Dignitas utitur, querenda, nesci, a Domino Dominus sed a Domino Dominus est ubi honestanda.

And thus hauing ended in the best fort I could, if I were to yeeld a reason of all that I haue done, in a word, it should bee thus: The glory of God, and my Countries honour, to whom all stand indebted in all that we are, or can bee of our felices. Allegiance & Service to my Soueraigne, and his Nobility, and affection by Alliance, to the memory of mine Vnckle and deceased Friend, were the Motiues only moued mee to take this worke in hand.

Hauing therefore now both offered vp, and thus paide all my vowes: mine Enthousiasme compels mee to salute his blessed Genius, that by louing of Nobility, so hartily & so well, thus happily made happy, lines ennobled now in Heauen.

*Quod tua prima fides visis est tentasse, nec ultra

But couldst not bring to passe, the Fates to haide thy hand,

And though the day be past, that hath thy Soule renew'd
From hence, and bodiles mortall shape be parted cleane away,
And thou'rt the like to me, yet that I euer lou'd,
(I mean thy better part) I hope, I shall againe enjoy.

And now as far as British power, by Fame it selfe is rais'd,

The

Mattheo Senarega a man of great account among the Geneways, struing to per-turbation.

There are many to visit as will all agree men, when they are grieved on his oldinate opinion.

The new faction prevailed by generally voice against the old, by the means of Senarega.

All fires and tempests in tumults calmy by overblowing, by the diverse endeavours of Senarega.

infinitely displeasing to Mattheo Senarega, a Citizen of most eminent authority, and who (at that time) was great Chancellor, and chiefe Secretarie of the Common-wealth; also had beene principall of the new side more then once, and both of the publike & priuate Councell; with very singular Eloquence hee intreated them, affirming, that it was not well, that such diuersitie of interests and priuate respects, should haue life in one and the same City: shewing also by liuely reasons, how auailable it was to euery man, and likewise profitable for the State, that all should conuerse and like mutually together.

But the words and euident reasons of Senarega, failing of sufficient efficacie, puffed vp the olde side with greater oblinacie, yet drew a farre better opinion of the new, prouoking so farre to defend them, that oftentimes he was in danger of his life among them. For the old side did greatly enuie, that the authoritie of Senarega should reach to such a height, that in him onely should be reposed, the efficacie of the publike and priuate gouernement. Neuerthelesse, Senarega opposing their pernicious demonstrations with wonderfull wisdom, mooued especially (as the same went) by a generous dislike, wrought in such fort, that the new side assumed the chiefe place in gouernement, excluding (well-neare) all the olde, constraining them to forsake their Countrey, if they attempted any Armes or violence against the new side.

These words would much haue stirred the Common-wealth, if Senarega, foreseeing the weighty perill, and preferring the publike good of all (being most iustly to be affected) before any priuate respect whatsoever, had not bridled the head-strong course of intended hostilitie. Wherefore hee wrought so painfullly with the Geneways themselves, the Emperour, the King of Spaine, and especially with Pope Gregorie the thirteenth, all fauoring him with their helpfull assistance, as the tumults in the City were quered, and after some few depetrate accidents, the furie of Armes was quite blisled, wherein both the faithfullnesse of Senarega, and his admirable wisdom euidently appeared. Hee being appointed (by vniuersall consent) Ambassadour to Rome, with infinite prouidence and care (to the honour of the Common-wealth, and his owne great reputation) discretely qualified both factions, already growne to such a head on either side, both by power and maleuolence; as not onely threatened danger to the Countrey it selfe, but likewise to haue filled all Italy with innumerable calamities and confusions; whereof the Pope (by his Breues) deliuered most honourable testimonie, writing the allos of Senarega to the * Doge, as also to the Procurators of the Common-wealth of Geneway.

The great Councell.

From the whole bodie of the before-recited Families, is congregated a Councell of foure hundred persons verry, who together with the Duke and the Gouernours, haue the charge of the Common-wealth in their power. This Councell maketh election of the Duke, and of the eight Gouernours, (because the Gouernours are the iust number of eight) and haue care of the State for two yeares continuance. They mannage matters of importance, and concerning generall good, as also for the conseruation of the Seignorie: and these Gouernours (with the Duke) are properly called the Signoria. But and if they are at any time to handle some occasions, which are not so important and weightie, but of meaner consideration: The Signoria haue a lesser Councell in readie seruice, consisting of an hundred men of the Nobilitie, elected by the Signoria by lotterie, and out of the maine bodie of the foresayd foure hundred.

The Duke.

The head or chiefe of the Common-wealth is the Duke, because he hath the Title and Honour which appertaine vnto him: and it is an ancient degree in the City, whereto by varietie of times, diuers persons haue attained, but not by any course of Lawe. He continueth for two yeares, and in all that time of his authoritie, thority, he dwelleth in the publike Pallace, hauing five hundred high Germines as his Guard, representing heere in the forme of an absolute Soueraignetie. At the beginning of the assumption of his magistracie, for two dayes hee is clothed in his Ducall ornaments; but afterward, and the whole consistence of his regiment, hee weareth other habites, but yet of Velvet or crimson Sattin, and sometime purple. His authoritie is very important, because hee onely, and not any other, may propound what cause hee wil in Councell and in the Senate, which is forbidden vnto any other Senatour. Whereupon, whosoever would record any Lawe to the Common-wealth, or else propound a motion of some important matter, he must break it to the duke, and passe it by his meanes.

The manner of the Dukes elections is thus: The third day of the month of January, the Senate doth assemble with the lesser Councell, without the person of the passed Duke; because hee hauing ended his Office of two yeares, returneth the first day of January home to his own house as a priuate person, and remaineth a Procurator all his life time. The lesser Councell with the Senate, doe elect among them (by ballott) eight and twenty Noblemen, one for each Familie, who so soone as they are chosen, are called into the Pallace, and there shut vpp in a place by themselves, and there, together with those Senatours, who eyther in regard of age, or by continuance of the Families are not capable of the dukedome: they elect eightene men amongst themselves, one for a Familie; and those eightene, together with the same Senatours, doe elect another eight and twentie, which eight and twentie are called, and being lockt vp with the foresayde Senatours, they proceede by ballotting them that are to bee propounded to the Councell to be Duke. But heere you must know, that they may propound no more to the great Councell, but foure persons onely, and in the election of that number, it is necessarie, that the eight and twentie doe agree in two third parts among themselves, with the part of the foresaid Senatours. This being agreed betwene them, before they come forth of the Consistorie, they elect another eight and twenty, one for each Familie, who returne together with them, from ballotting the foresaid foure. And they rise from their Election with the two thirds, and put in place of him or them (not formerly approued) one, or more, but of the number of the Senate: which being done, the Councell meete together, and they propound the names of the foure men concluded on and elected by the Electors: whereupon, hee of the foure that hath the most ballotts, is named for Duke. And at the time when I wrote this discourse in that honourable degree of Duke, was chosen the most courteous and famous Lord, Paulo Baptista Caluo, sometime a Iudge, a most worthy man, for goodnesse of life, and practise in the worlds occasions.

Of the eight Gouernours.

There sit vpon the Bench (with the Duke) eight Gouernours, as his counsellors, and their Office doth endure for two yeares: and they, with the duke are named the Signoria, and gouerne the Common-wealth. All these together cannot deliberate on any thing, where in the interest of the people is concerned, or of any chiefe important busines; but they call for the ayde of the Great Councell. These Gouernours are elected by two at a time, at fixe and fixe months; and their elections made in this manner.

The lesser Councell and the Duke being assembled together, they elect eight and twenty men, one for euery Familie, who being chosen by the Senate and Duke, doe propound sometimes twelue, sometimes foureteeene men to the great Councell; who (by ballotting) doe make election of one of them at a time. The next day following, they obserue the same order in electing the second, to wit, the lesser Councell doe elect another eight and twenty, and that eight and twenty performe the rest as hath bene said. Every one of the eight Gouernours ending his office, remayneth Procurator or Attorney for two yeares space: so that in the Colledge of the Proctors, there are alwayes eight, that stand for the gouernement of the Common-wealth; and all these come into the Senate with the duke, and with the eight Gouernours, deliberadeliberating together on important matters; and thus with these Gouvernours & the Duke consisteth the whole summe of the State. Two of them haue abiding in the Pallace, the other keepe at their owne houses; and they change by turnes two at a time, at three months, and three months.

Of the Procurators or Proctors.

Concerning these Proctors, some of them liuing, doe come to be in the Office of Duke, and some doe remaine in charge but two yeares, and they are such as haue bene Gouvernours. They haue care for procuring all publike occasions, collecting the rents and reuenues, and other such like businesse; being men of chiefe reputation, and of no meane importance.

Of the Potestate or Proctor.

Al the forenamed Magistrats, do attend vpon the gouernement of the Common-wealth. Next now, concerning matters of Iustice and Iudgement (speaking first of criminall causes) they are guided and ordered in common by a Potestate, who is a doctor, and they graunt him an honourable stipend. He hath his residence in a Pallace, which is neare to the Dukes, and he heareth and iudgeth all offences happening; but can assigne no capitall punishment, without consent of the Senate. Two other Doctors, being strangers also, doe assist him; whereof the one is called the Iudge of Malefactours, and the other Fiscalitor Atturney generall; and by the ayde of these two Iudges, all proccesse and suites are formed against guilty persons, dealing also in cases of like nature. Beside these afore-named, the Potestate hath his Vicar, who attendeth vpon Civile causes, onely executiue.

Of the extraordinarie Office.

There is an Office of seauen men, called Extraordinarie, and these do represent (as it were) the Princes person, because he is busied in administration of the Common wealth. Their care consisteth, in reforming and proroung of variances, and granting tutors to Schollers. And because contention is forbidden betweene Parents and Parents, and betweene poore and rich by ordination: these men doe appoynt what magistrate they meete, to heare offending parent and kindred, as also the strifes betweene poore and rich. Their Office continueth the space of fixe months, and is of much dignitie.

Of the five supreme Sindicators.

There is also a Magistracie, wherein are five men, called supreme Sindicators; They haue authority to arraigne, not onely the Duke, but the Gouvernours also, after the expiration of their charge; and they haue the like power ouer all other magistrats of the Common-wealth, to punish both the Duke and Gouvernours, finding them to bee delinquent.

And when the Duke is out of his Office, and that the Gouvernours haue fulfilled their magistracie; a Proclamation is published by these Supreme Sindicators. That if any man haue ought to charge the Duke withall, or the Gouvernours, let them appeare in their presence, and Iustice shall be done them. In which respect, the Duke and Gouvernours haue eight dayes assigned them for this scindication; which beeing past, and they found in error, they are punished: but being innocent, they haue a Pattennt assigned them of their innocence, whereby they are after called to be Proctors; because they cannot enter as Proctors, except they haue the Pattennt from those Supreme men, to allow their expedition. Finally, the greatnesse of this Office is such, that the Common-wealth is elected for one of these Supreme Sindicators, the Prince Andrea Doria, the deliuerer of his Countrey. They are elected by the lesser Councell, with the Senate, and sit in the Pallace next to the Senate, for their respect.

Of the Rota.

Because wee haue formerly spoken of Criminall occasions, now let vs say somewhat concerning ciuile causes. Wherein ye are to know, that the Common-wealth doe make choice of five doctours, tors, forraignes or strangers, at euery 2. yeares, which bodie of authoritie is called Rota. These men attend vpon Ciuile causes onely, and dwell in the Dukes pallace: All such matters as they censure on, are guided by ordinarie course of the Imperiall Lawes, forming their Proccesse and suite, according to the iudiciarie order appointed for the Cittie, which is after the auncient maner.

Of the Censors.

Now, as concerning Arts, Trades and Mysteries, Censors are appoynted to that charge. These men do provide, that buyers, sellers, and all such as trafficke in handi-crafts, shall haue measures, weights, and all things else to them belonging, iust, and according to the auncient Lawes. And here we are to obserue, that euery Art hath chiefe or head men, who are called Confulles, which make election of Artists amongst them. These Confulles haue authoritie in the matters of their Artes, and amongst these Confulles, such as deale in silks, may command much ouer their men: so that their power extendeth, to put them to the halter, to banish them, and perforce fend them to the Gallies, or to giue other cōligations to delinquents.

Of forty Capitaines.

In the Cittie of Geneway there are forty Capitaines, of the number and bodie of the Nobilitie, and they are changed euery yeare. These men haue vnder them an hundred men (for one) of the people, so that they make (in all) foure thousand persons, and the Common-wealth is serued by them at all occasions. For they make a garde in time of the least suspicion; and when the signoria is abroad, these fortie Capitaines (bearing them company) are all clothed in Veluet, goodly and honourable ornaments, meete to attend on so great Lords. Moreover, all men in the Cittie, and the whole Burrough, that are apt to carrie Armes, are registered downe, from the age of twentie, to threescor, and are reduced vnder the gouernment of those Capitains, who (with them) stand alwayes obliged to be readly armed with weapons in hand, according to the auncient custome ordained.

Of the Generall.

The Common-wealth hath continually a Generall, who is appoynted for Armes, to serue in all occurrences, and in times of warre. At this instant it enioyeth (well deseruing such a degree, and to the satisfaction of all the Nobilitie, much pleasing to the whole hoast of Souldiers, and vniuersall liking of the people) the Lord Agustino Spinola, a most honourable and valiant Gentleman of that Cittie, full of incomparable bountie and knowledge, not onely in the occasions of Armes, but for all managements of the world beside.

Of the Office of Saint George.

The Office and Magistracie of Saint George, most noble among all the rest in the Cittie, was ordained in the yeare, 1407. It is now (by length of time) the conseruation of that Common-wealth, which, in those younger dayes had not any naturall riches or wealth, fitting the qualite of such a Countrey: yet notwithstanding, it wanted not men of quicke and apprehensiu iudgement, to find out the way, and forme some means for procuring of moneys, that might arise to common vse: whereupon, they that liued in those auncient yeares, and gouerned the publike occasions, tooke vp moneys of particular persons, some by constraint, others with much willingness. And true it is, that in this money matter, such private persons as disbursed any summes, the publike vse payed them, tenne, nine, eight and seauen in the hundred, according to the varietie of times, to the end, that they might not suffer any endammaging, by such seruice as they did for publike benefit.

Proceeding in this course, it made men willing, ready and cautious, in seeking security for their moneys, dayly put into the publike Banque, by selling to some (as for example) the power and in risktion of toll for meates, to others, the imposts of wines, and to others the taxations layd on corne. And these contracts made both in publike and particular, was learned among them Bargaining and Buying, as when particular men bought any thing of the common fort, or in generall.

And it was ordained, that whosoever disbursed an hundred pounds, hee was said to hold one place among the buyers: he that disbursed two hundred, had two places; and hee for three hundred, three, and so it passed from hand to hand. So that this kinde of commerce and vñance multiplied greatly, and had names of diuers ordinations; as of the Capitoll, of Saint Pauls, and others of their profession, by dealing in Sale, and diuers other beside, whose Titles and Names grew by their trading, and helde correspondencie particularly among the best Citizens, hauing care for iust payments, and the dues of the profitees, with consideration of the Banquer, who alwayes ordered the contracts made publicly or priuately. Heereupon, the number of dealers daily encreasing, both by forraigne Nations and home-bred friends, which required diuersitie of Gouvernours and Quer-seers, and which else would grow to great confusion: it was therefore ordered by the Signoria, that all the Banquers should bee reduced and vñited into one absolute Societie, and named the Company of Saint George.

ctors or Quer-
seers of the

Being thus ordained, they were also appointed to bee governed by eight Citizens from yeare to yeare, who provided and gaue order, how the Banquers should let out their monies, and receive in their interests and allowances, whereby they held the eminencie in the Office of Saint George. And in regard they perceived, that this Office governed these matters with wisdom and iustice, businesse daily encreasing, and the number of places supplied by new persons: alienation of profits grew among the Commons, and the charge of the Office euery way to be greater, by reason of lands and communities interested with them, so that the Office attained to many priuiledges: first, by the Signoria of Geneway, and afterward of many Popes, Emperors and great Lordes, which came to dominion in the City: So that the Office of Saint George, although it depended on the common people, as also the Signoria of Geneway: yet all that came to the gouernement or Seignourie of the Citie, were bound to conferre the Priuiledges of the Magistracie of Saint George, and to maintaine it. And because (naturally) things take original of weake beginnings, and so in processe of time attayne to perfection: euen so did this magistreriall Office, being much better ruled now, then it could be at the beginning.

First, in answering the profitees to all Banquers, they are not to determinate nor certayne, as at the original: but yet according to the proportion of former allowances, lesse or more, and according vnto expences for the conseruation of things of especiall care, and according to the fruitfulnessse of tolles and taxations, beside diuers other benefices, assigned by the Commons to the Banquers: they are farre more secure, and more neatly qualified, concerning mens consciences.

Moresouer, this place hath obtrayned Seignoury and dominion by many good and sufficient allowances, which it could not haue at the beginning. Beside, euery way are made new rules and orders, whereby there is farre better expedition of Causes, for the punishing of delinquents, and submission of the people to gouernement.

And whosoever doeth consider the high account of this Magistracie, shall finde the body of the Citie; thereby to containe in it selfe two communities, the one great, the other lesse. The great is governed by the Pallace, and comprehendeth all the City; the lesse is gouerned by Saint George onely, as concerning the occasions before remembered, and comprehendeth all the Banquers and changers.

The first Communitie, or the greater, is subiect to variation, and is many times vnder regiment, rather to bee rearm'd Tyrannicall then otherwise: but the lesse is alwayes free, firme, and vnder the Citizens. And certainly, which is a matter admirable, and rarely found, eyther by Philosophers or others, that haue discoursed on causes concerning Common-weales, to obserue: that within the circuite of one and the same wall, and all at a time, there should be tyrannie and liberty, life ciuile and corrupt, iustice and licence.

The manner of electing the tors of Saint George.

Concerning this Office of S. George, there are eight men appoynted to gouerne it, who are called Protectours. They continue for a yeare, and are elected euery six months foure times, by the whole number of the Banquers, or Creditors for lands, & Creditors for letting forth certain sums, after this manner. Among the whole number of City Creditors, by lot are chosen 80. men, who meeting together soone after their election, they make a surmey among al those foure score, and select out of them foure and twenty by balloting, who being that vp in a roome by themselves: they may not sinder or depart, till they haue ballotted for the eight Protectors, and in this ballotterie, fixteene ballots doe confirme the election.

In the yeare 1444. an other Office was made of Saint George, consisting of men, which was then called the Office of foure and fortie, in regard of a thousand, out of which number they were created. The occasion of creating these eight men, was, that being the space of thirty seven yeres, the Office so encreased and augmented, that the eight Protectors could not (in a whole yeare) terminate nor restrain the busie occasions happening, whereby the emoluments and interells of some creditors arose to great, and other monies in diuerse manners: it was thought fit (for setting downe good order to such Remaines, which were (in effect) the riches and substance of the office) that a necessary participation of the guines should be digested, for the creation of such as should helpe in this prouident care, for generall vñitie of the Office of Saint George, and yet to be carried in secret manner, for taking away all occasion of tyranny. And so eight Citizens were chosen: of which two are changed yearly: and they take charge of collecting and gouerning such over-plusses as do arise yearly, by the managements of the eight Protectors.

CHAP. II.

An excellent Relation, concerning the estate of Religion and Common wealth, which was obserued among the Iewes.

It is not to bee doubted; but by the singular counsell of our eternall God, the Father of our Lord Iesus Christ, who created mankind, whereby a Church might bee assembled and congregated: a perpetual historie concerning the creation of things, was given to men.

And although that the Philosopher Democritus, and others like to him, dreamed of an eternitie of a former world, or else of innumerable worlds, and made a mockerie at the beginning of things, and thought such a recital to be but fabulous: yet notwithstanding wee holde them to be most true, considering, that Almighty GOD approoued the Writings of Moses by apparant testimonies, as by the raising vp of the dead and others.

Democritus
dreaming of a former world,
not innumerable worlds

Now, albeit wee receive the ancient Historie of the Church, and singularly allow it for the Diuine authorities: yet there are many more Euidences of truth besides; for, the ancient names of people, doe agree with the succession of the Fathers that related them, and the order of Empires hath bene such, as they were foretold to be, and so should be in their succeeding times.

The ancient authorie of the Church.

The Propheticall Historie then is the truest, and the most ancient of all other; and the reason of that continued Historie, was, not onely to let vs know the beginning of mankind: but much more to nothie vnto vs, the Promises of the Sonne of God, and to giue vs certainty of the first, and no way to be corrupted doctrine of God, and of the reifications to oftentimes rendered to other by that doctrine, what the gouernement of the Church hath bene; for it was preferred in the diuersitie of tumults amongst Empires, like to a Shippe floating vpon raging and tempestuous billows, what the battailes of the Church haue bene, and the exercises of Faith.

Now, it was a great blessing of God, that hee gaue a certaine seating vnto his Church, euen as an Academie, for more then sixteene hundred yeares in a commodious place, betwene two most potent Kingdomes of Egypt and Babylon, to the end, that throughout them both the voyce of his doctrine might be heard. There the Promises were repeated, and the Miracles adiuſed, which are witness of the presence of God: whose will was to haue those things set downe in writing, to the end that Posteritie might be informed by true doctrine, in the conflicts of the Church, and her manifold recoueries.

And although nothing is found in writing by publike authority, touching the last times yet notwithstanding, our Lord was careful to haue the latter Historie knowne, which hath bene declared partly by Isephus, and partly by Philo, whereof I haue made a collection, because the more studious might enioy a continuall Historie of the Iewish people, euen to the destruction of Ierusalem. And it pleased God, that a continued successe of histories should remaine to men: for seeing that Propheticall histories reached so farre as the reigne of the Persians, or to King Cyrus; the Greeke and Latine histories afterward, reported the great mutations of the following Empires, which also was seconded after by the Apostles writings, concerning the Sonne of God, borne of the Virgine Marye, crucified and raised againe; and after the Apostles, Enselmus, Epiphanius, and Nicephorus pursued in the Ecclesiasticall History. Wherein I make no doubt, but all such as are well aduised, will confesse, that the knowledge of the order of Times is necessarie, to vnderstand when the Doctrine was reuealed, the Sonne of God manifested, the Church congregated in diuers kinds, sometimes agitated by tempestuous stormes; and yet (after all) graciously deliuered. Wherefore, let vs giue thanks to God, for bestowing on men the continuall Historie of his Sonne; and let vs keepe such Writings religiously: wherein hauing taken some paines, I hope it will proue pleasing to all Christian Readers.

The beginning of the Catalogue is the continuation of foueraigne Sacrificers, or high-Priests that gouerned the Iewish people, after their returne from Babylon, with the princes issued of the race Royall.

CHAP. III.

A Catalogue of the High-Priests; or foueraigne Sacrificers, beginning with Seraia and his sonne Iosedech.

BOth these were led captiue into Babylon, by Nabuchodonosor King of the Chaldeans, and dyed in exile.

Iosuah or Iesus, the sonne of Iosedech, came backe into Iudea with the Prince Zorobabell, six hundred and thirtie yeares before the Natiuitie of Christ. He liued vnder the Kings of Persia, Cyrus, Cambyses, Darius the sonne of Hystaspes, Xerxes, euen to the twentieth yeare of Artaxerxes, Long-hand, and presided (as chiefe Priest) first sixe and thirty yeares. Afterward, in regarde that the building of the Temple was hindered, he went into Babylon to Darius, the sonne of Hystaspes, whom the Holy Historie nameth Assuerus, and was absent the space of eight yeares. After his returne hee was twenty yeares more in the high-Priesthood. Philo is of opinion, that he wrote the Historie of Iudub, which others (newerthelesse) holde to be more ancient.

The sonne of Iesus was Iosachim.

Iosachim helde the Priest-hood eight yeeres, in the absence of his brother, and eight and fortie yeeres after his death. Hee liued vnder Long-hand, and Darius the Ballard, vntill the twelfth yeare of Artaxerxes Assuerus, who was also named Atanaxer; hee did set downe in writing the Historie of Hister, and the memorie of Pharim was by him instituted, as Philo writeth.

Eliashib was his sonne, who was in Office of the Soueraigne Priest-hood one and twentie yeares, vntill the foure and thirtieth yeere of the reigne of Artaxerxes Atanaxer.

Iudas or Iosida sonne to him, was high-Priest foure and twenty yeares; vntill the third yeare of the reigne of Darius, who succeeded next to Atanaxer.

Iohn and Iesus were his sonnes, the latter whereof beeing fiered with ambition, insinuated himselfe (by the power of gifts) into the fauour of Vageses, Satrape of Persia, to take (by his helpe) the chiefe Priest-hood from his Brother: But immediately hee payed the penaltie due vnto his wicked presumption; for in a debate and blowes being moued in the temple, he was slaine by his brother. Heere was the beginning of the enuils in Iudea, about an hundred, sixtie and seauen yeares, after the returne from Babylon.

Iohn hauing murdered his brother Iesus in the Temple, was the cause of bringing the people into a miserable seruitude. For, the Satrape Vageses being aduertised of the death of his friend Iesus, entred with a mightie Armie into Ierusalem, prophaned and pillled the Temple, saying, That he might aswell doe so, as the high-Priest to foyle it with the blood of his owne Brother: he collected the tribute money rigorously for the space of seauen yeares together, proceeding therein to lare, as forcing the Iewes to pay an hundred crownes of the Sonne, for every beast that they sacrificed. Iohn held the high-Priest hood foure and twenty yeares, euen vnto the death of Ochus, and the beginning of the reigne of Artanes.

His Sonnes were Iaddus and Atanassies.

Manasses following the example of Ieremias, to strengthen himselfe against his brother, made alliance with Sannabulat the Chutean, sent Satrape by the last Darius into Samaria, and tooke to wife his daughter Nicoſsa. But in regard of this vnlawfull marriage, hee was repulſed from the Sacerdotal Office, with diuerſe others for the same cause. Beeing bereft of the Priest-hood, hee made his recourse to his Father in lawe in Samaria, who after he had obayne leaue of Alexander the Great, builded a new Temple vpon an high mountaine in Samaria called Garizim, shaping it after the forme and magnificence of that at Ierusalem, and there hee caused his sonne Manasses to reside.

This diuision of High-Priests, was afterwards the cause of great tumults in Iudea; for, as all they which were expelled from Ierusalem, for transgressing the Ceremonies of Moses Lawe, as also for some other offences, betooke themselves to this new Temple: in a short time after, they grew to such an head and strength, that inciting those Sacrificers, Apostates and Samaritans against the Iewes: it likewise gaue occasion to many riotous courtes and theueries on either side.

Nothing was found by posteritie of this Manasses: but two hundred yeares after, the Temple on this Mount of Garizim was destroyed from the toppe to the bottome, by Iohn Hircanus, sonne vnto Simon the Asmonean, and Successor to him.

Iaddus administered the high-Priesthood for seauen and twentie yeares, vnder Artanes, and the latter Darius, euen to the time of Alexander the Great. Hee deſerued his brother Manasses (and the rest) of the right of Priesthood, because contrary to the Law of Almighty God they had married with strange women. Vnder Alexander the Great beleagued the Citie of Tyre, hee demanded aide and tribute of this Iaddus, such as the Iewes had formerly payed to the Persians. Vnto what he returned answer, That in the life time of Darius (to whom hee tooke his oath)

he neuer acknowledged any other Lord, because that the Iewish Nation had been tributarie to the Kings of Persia, almost euer since their returne from Babylon. Alexander growing angry at such an answer; after the taking in of Tyre and Gaza, mounted vp to Ierusalem with his Armies, intending to subiugate the Iewes by strength of Armes.

But Iadus being thereof admonished in a drea^m, tooke his Priestlike garments, and went to mee^t him in great humilitie, accompanied with all the Sacrificers and Citizens. Alexander beholding the Soueraigne high Priest, alighted on his feete, and gaue vnto him reuerend adoration. Being demanded what should moue him to reuerence an enemy, that came with submissiue entreatie vnto him: hee replied: As the time of my abiding in Macedon, and thinking on the Empire of Asia, a man was presented to mee in my sleepe, in the same or like habit as the High Priest weares, who perswaded mee to undertake the expedition of Asia, and gaue mee good hope of prosperous success.

When hee was entred the Cittie, he was so farre from offering the least talke of an enemy, that, after hee had sacrificed, he adorned the Temple with magnificent giftes, and at his departing hee gaue them libertie to vse the Lawe of their Fore-fathers, and the immunities of the seauenth yeare, wherein the fields were not sowne.

and Manasses.*

Concerning Manasses, we read not any thing, but that hee succeeded next to his Nephew Iezabaz, and was a friend to Seleucus Galliticus, and that vnder his gouernement, the Samaritanes being displeased at the Iewes in despite of the Temple, and seruices there performed, they put to fire and sword the whole territory of Ierusalem. Some are of opinion, that this man was not the brother to Onias, but rather the brother vnto his wife, and make thereabout some controvertic.

called the Ancient.*

IN this mans time, Ptolomie, the sonne of Lagus, desiring to make the people of the Iewes become tributarie; as hee entred vpon a Sabaoth day into the Citie of Ierusalem, to offer Sacrifice (the Iewes not daring to take Arms, for feare of doing contrary to the Law) vsed great cruelty against the Inhabitants, of whom he led away into Egypt some thousand, as captiues and hostages.

The Sonnes of Onias were Simon and Eleazar.

Simon was named Iustus, for pietie and benignitie towards his Nation. The Jewes enjoyed peace vnder him, all the while as the Succelours of Alexander the great, Antigon, Demetrius, Seleucus and the rest, fought in Asia and Greece for the Monarchie.

Eleazar succeeded after his brother Simon, as Tutor to Onias the second, being as yet a child. In his time, Ptolomie Philadelphus enfranchised above an hundred thousand Jewish slaves, led into Egypt, partly by the Kings of Persia, partly by his father Ptolomie the sonne of Lagus.

Moreover, he sent Ambassadors with magnificent Presents to Eleazar the high Priest, requesting to have three score and twelve Lewes, that could translate the Writings of Moses and the Prophets, out of the Hebrew language into the Greeke. When being done, hee sent them backe againe with great giftes, and a Table of golde dedicated to the Temple, and other Presents of especiall value. His vnckle Manassés succeeded after his death; vnckle by the mother only, according to some: for the Greeke word signifieth vnckle both by father and mother.

Simon had three sonnes; Toloth, whom Philo and Saint Luke in his third chapter calleth Matthias; Ioseph, that pacified Ptolomie. And Annas Ithyranus, the last Prince of the Iewish people, of the Lineage of Iuda, and house of Dauid: who slew himselfe, for feare of Antiochus the Noble.

Priest, was married to Tobias, of the house of David.

Onias being left a child by his Father, at last, in his age succeeded to Mannasses in the High-Priest-hood. By his avarice he offended Ptolemy, King of Egypt, and raised him in rage against the Jews, because he refused to pay the ordinary tribute. For the High-Priests were wont to pay their revenues yearly to the Kings of Egypt, for their Citizens, amounting to twenty Talents, that is, twelve thousand crowns of the Sunne. But Joseph afterward appeased Ptolemy, who was Nephew to Onias by the Sisters side, a Prince of the posterity of David.

Onias succeeded his sonne Simon.

Philo faith, that he was surnamed Iustus. Under him, Iesus the Sonne of Syrach wrote his Book called Ecclesiasticus. And that Simon had three sonnes also, who (each after other) obtaigned the Priesthood, which Iosephus telltlieth apparently. The Sonnes of Simon were.

Onias. Iesus, otherwise called Iason. Onias, also called Menelaus.

The great Onias is commended in the second Booke of the Macchabees, for his piety and iustice, and is said, that hee was a friend to Selenechus, Brother to Antiochus the Noble; who sometimes furnished all necessary affaires in the Temple, with the reuenues of the Realme of Syria. But afterward, another man, called Sinnus, who had the charge of keeping the Temple, hauing conceyued malice against Onias, the high-Priest; reported to King Selenechus, that there was an infinite maffe of gold hidden in the Temple, which the Priests applied to their own private vses. And this was the cause, that the king would no longer furnish the Temple with the wonted monyes; but also sent Heliadorus, to make seizure on the wealth, and commit it to the Kings Treasury. But as hee would haue audaciously haue entered (with his followers) into the secret place of the Temple, hee was smitten downe, & very neere dead; yet recovered againe by diuine mercy, and by the prayers of Onias.

Afterward, the discord to increased between the Prince of the high-Priests, and the Taitor Simon, that many murders were committed by the friends of Simon: which made Omas to retire himselfe towards the King Seleucus, and gave way to the fury of his enemies. But before Omas could get thither, Seleucus was dead, and Isafon, Brother to Omas, had obtained by bribes and gifts to Antiochus the Noble (succeeding the deceased King) the administration of the high-Priests office. Whereupon, Omas doubting King Antiochus as much as his Brother; durst not go to him, but went to a free place, neere to Daphne, a city of Syria, & being drawne thither by deceitfull means, was also slain by Andronicus, Lieutenant to the King, and at the request of Menelaus who Isafon having expulſed, poſſeſſed himſelfe of the high Priests Office, as hereafter ſhall be declared.

*The Sonne of this Onias the Great,
was Onias.*

Onias being left young at his Fathers death, and afterward growing to more ripeness of years; standing in care of Alcinus the high-Priest, he fled into Egypt to Ptolomy Philometor, accompanied with some of his fellow-citizens. There Ptolomy gave him permission, to build a Towne and a Temple, in the Territory of Heliopolis, in reſemblance of that at Jerusalem; which was called Onion, five great miles from Memphis, now called the great Cayra. For in regard that Ptolomy waged warre with Antiochus the Noble, and stood in need of his neighbours succours, he was persuaded by Onias to build a Temple, as if by that means, all the people of the Iewes would league with the Kings of Egypt, & take their part. About 30. yeares after this Temple was built, at the same time as the City and Temple of Jerusalem were ruined it was also despoyled of all her Jewels, and flut vp by Ediel from Tyrus into the Emperour.

But after that Ptolomy had recollected his forces, and passing into Egipt through Iudea, Helchus putting him to flight with his Army, died in Syria of a sharpe disease. For the rest, we reade nothing of the posterity of the high-Priests of Egipt.

Iefus, named Iafon also, second Sonne to Simon, after the death of Seleuchus, bought of Antiochus, brother and successor to Seleuchus, the high-Priesthood, for five hundred Talents, that is to say, three Tunnes of gold, as wee speake vulgarly; promising him beside as an over-plus, forty eight thousand crownes of the Sun, as an annual tribute. And to gaine himselfe more grace with this wicked King, he builded places in Ierusalem, for the exercising of young people, in such pastimes as he had instituted; and these were to bee performed, at such times as the people vied to meete in the Temple. He received and magnificently entertained Antiochus Epiphines with his Army, with Lamps and flaming fires, & songs composed in praise of the King; and this was at such time as the King departing thence, planted Garrisons of strength in the Fortresses of Ierusalem, and this was but a beginning to the intolerable seruitude which afterward followed.

Iafon hauing enjoyed the high-Priesthood three yeares, sent his Brother Menelaus with gold and great charge to Antiochus; but now hee prouided to be payed with coyne of the same stampe, as before he had done to his brother Omius; for by the same crafty contriuing, Menelaus fed him quite beside the Priesthood. And Iafon standing now in feare of Menelaus, with-drew into the land of the Ammonites, where he closely concealed himselfe, vntill a false rumour ran abroad, that Antiochus entering Egipt, dyed. These newes so cheered vp his drooping spirits, that being accompanied with a thousand men in arms, he intruded vpon the City, where being fauoured by the inhabitants, for therapies and cruelties committed by Menelaus, he slew many of Antiochus his Citizens, and compelled Menelaus to saue himselfe in the Syrians Garrisons kept in the Ports.

But hearing the returne of Antiochus from the Land of Egipt, and losing all hope of the Priesthood, againe he retired to comp the Ammonites, of whom he could not now be receiued, standing in feare of Antiochus, who was neere at hand with his army. Expulsed also (for the same reason) by Aretas, King of Arabia, out of his marches, and hauing no access into Egipt, & lastly, forsaken of all; he passed by Sea to the Lacedemonians, among whom hee was concerned in kindred: and yet, as a iust punishment for his ambition, he dyed very poorly in banishment.

Omius, named Menelaus also, the third Sonne of Simon, according to Iosephus (albeit in the second Booke of the Macchabees, he is not said to be the Sonne of Simon, the High-Priest, but brother to one Simon, of the Tribe of Beniamin, who had charge of the Temple, as we haide before in speaking of Omius) being sent to King Antiochus the Noble, by Iafon, Prince of the sacrificing Priests, with money and commission about important affaires, did so cunningly insinuate himselfe, into the good grace of the King and his Courtiers, that by promising three hundred Talents (which is an hundred and fourscore thousand crownes of the Sun) more then all that which Iafon payed, and accusing him of diuers crimes beside: he preuailed so farre, that the Soueraigne Priesthood was taken from Iafon, and conferred on him in his stead.

This dignity thus obtayned, he pursued the same impieties as Iafon did, in the customes and manners of the Pagans, & farre exceeding him in rapines and cruelties. For at the entering into his gouernment, to make himselfe the furer of so ill-gotten honour, he slew Omius, eldest Son to Simon his brother, as Iosephus affirmes, who being exiled, kept close in a franchised place neere Daphné, a Towne in Syria; there hee caused him to be murdered by Andronicus (Gouernour of Caelosyria) by fraud and treason, and for which offence, Andronicus was sentenced with death by the King.

Afterward, being vnable to furnish the great payment of money hee had promised to the King; he sold many vessels of gold, which he had covertly stolne out of the Temple: which sacriledge comming to be knowne, great mutines were moued among the people. At length, Menelaus was accused and condemned by three Ambassadors, sent from Ierusalem to Tyre. But by the means of a Countrey, named

Ptolomy (soundly corrupted with money) hee was absolved and the King pacified, preuailling withall so farre, that his accusers were executed for calumniators; and he returning backe to Ierusalem, began againe to tyrannize ouer the Cittizens.

Much about this time, for the space of forty dayes, there appeared in the Heauens, hoasts or bands of men, fighting both on horsebacke and foote: which prodigious signes, prognosticated the horrible calamities which soone after were to follow. For as Antiochus was leading his Army (the second time) into Egipt, purposing to vsurpe the Countrey by open warre, seeing he could not do it vnder colour of Guardianship, because Ptolomy Philometor (his Nephew) was yet but young; Iafon rushed into the City with his Army, againe to repulse his brother from the Priesthood, ouer-comming a great number of the Inhabitants, thatooke part with Antiochus and Menelaus. Who finding his strength too feeble, fled to the Fortresses and Garrisons of the Syrians, dispatching messengers vnto Antiochus for better ayde.

And now Antiochus being vrged thereto by the rigorous command of the Romans, and deliuered by Popilius, left Egipt, comming thence in a raging madnes, fearing a further revolt of the Iewith Nation. Hauing brought his Army before the City, hee found the Gates fast shut, and the inhabitants ready to defend themselves. Whereat being vexed, he forced into the City without any great difficulty: because Menelaus with his faction, and the Syrian Garrisons ran vp and downe in the City, and put to the Sword many Cittizens, and giuing entrance to the enemy at the Gates. Being entred, Antiochus charged his people to kill all that they met with in Armes, and not to spare eyther age or sexe: so that within three dayes space, fourscore thousand men (or thereabout) were slaine in Ierusalem, beside diuers thousands ledde away captiues, and sold for slaues.

The King, conducted by Menelaus, entred into the most holy part of the Temple, touching with his polluted hands the sacred Vessels, which hee caused to be carried thence into Syria, with a thousand, eight hundred talents of treasure, as much to say, as eleuen Tunns of gold of our mo-nie: which treasure had bin partly giuen to the Temple, and partly was put there in trust for the benefite of widowes and orphans, as into the onely surest place both for reuerence and sanctity. So, after Antiochus had restored Menelaus to the high-Priesthood againe, and had plantd strong Garrisons in the City (whereof Philp of Phrygia was Captaine, a man very bloody and cruell) hee returned backe to Antioche again with his great booty. Two yeares after, fearing a revolt of the Iewes, he sent the Colonell Appolennus to Ierusalem, with two and twenty thousand men, who expressed no countenance of an enemy, but encamped without the City, attending for the Sabbath day, and then giuing the determined signal, hee flew & massacred the vnarmed multitude, that came forth to behold the Campe of the Syrians. Then entring violently into the City, hee put all to the edge of the sword that withstood him, robbing, spoyling, & burning it in many places, throwing downe the walles and fortifications: yet rampaging the Walles and Bulwarks, in that part called, The City of David, and planting there a potent Garrison.

This was a prepetrative, to attaine (in time) to the Kings full ayme, who purposing to turne (perforce) the Iewes from the Law of their fore-fathers (a thing which he knew they would withstand to their vttermost power) first of all he gaue order, to dispossesse them of Armes and Weapons, leaving them naked of all munitions, succour and resistance. This disposition made by Appolennus in Ierusalem, soone after the King fedtether Athenes, another of his Colonels, with an especial Edict, whereby he commanded all Nations that were in subiection to him, to vse (in every kingdome) the same Religion which the Greekes did: prohibiting expressly to the Iewes, the vse of circumcision, & other ordinances commanded them by God. He likewise plantd Garrisons atwell in Ierusalem, as in other Cities and Townes of Iudea, to insell cruell punishment on al them, that did not obtemperate the Kings Edict. Beside, the Temple was prophaned by the Kings Command, and the Image of Iupiter Olympus worshippd in the Sanctuary, even in the Sanctum Sanctorum, and many pillarizes and whoredomes committed with within the circuite of the Temple. Moreover, by the same Edict Royall, the holy Bookes were forbidden ingenerall, and that man iudged worthy of death, with whom the Booke of the Law should bee found; yea, and seuerie inquisition made for it euery Moneth.

The Citizens of Ierusalem durst make no opposition in their owne defence.

As thus the Citizens of Ierusalem were disarmed, oppressed, & very strong Garisons planted ouer them: euen so were they destitute of any Captain, nor daring to vse force or opposition, against the wicked commands and excesse tyrannies of Antiochus: considering also, that Menelaus the soueraigne High-Priest, had formerly instituted the behaviours vsed among Pagans in Ierusalem, to keepe himselfe in his dignity, & in the Kings fauour, approving and assisting all his enterprises; in which respect, many that made vertuous profession of the Law giuen by God, were most inhumanely murdered by the Soldiers of Antiochus, and their goods confiscated. Others (in great number) forsaking the City, and leaving all their goods behinde them, went to hide themselves in Caves and desert places, as Mattathias the Asmonea withdrew (accompanied with his children) into the little Village of Modin.

The horrible punishment inflicted vpon two women.

In the second Booke of the Macchabees is described the horrible punishing of two women, who were accused to the Lieutenant of Antiochus, that they had circumcised their children, contrary to the Kings Edict. Whereupon, they were condemned, and (for a terror to other) they were led naked through the streets of the City, their infants strangled, hanging at their breasts, and afterward throwne downe from the top of the City wall. There is also set downe, the seuen Brethren & their Mother, tormented with most exquisite tortures; and yet they held fast the profession of the Law. By which horrible cruelties, judgement may be made, as well of the extreme rigour of Antiochus, as also of the miserable estate of Gods people: of whom, some reliques were yet reuered, by means of the Asmoneans, raised vp by God, to repress the rage of Antiochus, & to maintaine the Law of God by Armes, as hereafter shall be declared.

The Asmoneans raised by God to repress Antiochus.

In the meane time Menelaus, Author, beholder and promoter of these afflictions vpon the people; retayned still the tri-de of Soueraigne high Sacrificer, euen then when Judas Macchabeus tooke (by power) the City and the Temple: he being then hid in the Fortresse, vnder the protection of the Syrians, vntill that after the death of Antiochus the Noble, his Son Antiochus Eupator, hauing seized on Ierusalem, concluded peace with Judas Macchabeus, and by the perswasion of Lysias, brought him captiue into Syria, as the first brand of all the warre, and of the overthrowing of the Syrian Armies by the Asmoneans; and there he was also slaine, after he had held the high-Priesthood twelue yeares. This was the last Sacrificer of the posterity of Aaron, to whom the diuine right appertained, for administration of the Soueraigne Priesthood. For Antiochus Eupator appointed in the place of Menelaus, a certaine man named Alcimus, who might bee of Aarons posterity; but not of the Family of that Iesus, who with Zorobabel had returned from Babylon into Judea. This Alcimus presided foure yeares, and then dyed of a sudden sickness, two yeares after the death of Judas Macchabeus.

The last High Priest of the Temple.

Alcimus succeeded in the high Priesthood.

Alcimus being dead, the Temple and the people was leauen yeares without a Soueraigne high-Priest, vntill such time as the power of Ionathas encreased, who was the Brother of Judas: when the dignity of the Priesthood was transferred (by consent of the people) into the Family of the Asmoneans; where it remained so long, as to the beginning of the Reigne of Herod, about 116 yeares.

The High Priesthood translated to the Family of the Asmoneans.

of Modin, did first oppose himselfe against Antiochus the Noble; who, by horrible torments constrained the Iewes to transgresse their Law, and to deale in those behaviours vsed among the Pagans; in the hundred, forty and five yeares of the kingdom of Syria, a hundred fifty and nine yeares after the death of Alexander, and an hundred sixty and five yeares before the birth of Christ. For Mattathias seeing a certaine Iew, who (to please the King) sacrificed a forbidden beast vpon a Pagan Altar, it being prohibited by the diuine Law: enflamed with a iust and holy zeale (in the presence of the Citizens of his owne Nation, suffering such a wicked acte to be done, as also of the Kings Lieutenant) slew the offender, and then beating downe the Altar, deliuered arms to all them, who (making more account of the word giuen by God, then the threatenings of a Pagan King) had forsaken their goods and liued in the Deserts, from whence many returning daily; hee leuiued a great Army, by whose helpe he deliuered worthily the neighbouring Townes, from the Idolatries of Antiochus, and replanted the fence and ordinances commanded by the Law diuine.

Zealotries of Iewes for transgressing a forbidden Law on a Pagan Altar.

Mattathias slew the offender, and then beating downe the Altar, deliuered arms to all them.

The death of Antiochus the Noble.

But this valiant man, deeply slept in age, after hee had (for a yeares space) led this banished wandring troope, and after hee had exhorted his Sonnes to the study of piety, as also the valiant defending of the Law giuen by God, against the wicked Edicts and torments of Antiochus, reconciling them all to concord and mutual reuerence, dyed peaceably, in the year 146. of the Kingdom of Syria; 160. after the death of Alexander; and 164. before Christ was borne.

Mattathias had five Sonnes. Judas, Ionathas, Simon, Iohn, and Eleazar.

Eleazar the son of Antiochus.

Eleazar, otherwise called Amran or Amran, a very hardy young man, after hee had performed many valiant deeds; in the fift yeare after his Fathers death, going to finde out Antiochus Eupator, Sonne to Antiochus the Noble, with his brother Judas; hee saw (among other) a goodly Elephant, exceeding in greatnesse & rich furniture. Whereby, hee imagining that the King should be vpon him, ran towards him boldly, and slaying many Soldiours euery where about him, got vnder the Elephant, and giuing a deadly stabbe in his belly, the Elephant fell downe vpon him, and thereby was the death of Eleazar.

Eleazar slain vnder an Elephant, giuing death vpon him.

Iohn, surnamed Gabias, after the death of his brother Judas, was sent by Ionathas and Simon his other brethren into Arathia, with the Iewes & precious things which they had conquered in warre, to place them in the custody and guard of the Arabians: but the Amorites layed ambushes by the way for him, and hauing slaine him,ooke also the spoiles away from him and his traine.

The name of Arathia, and the death of John.

Judas was surnamed also Macchabeus, which diction in Hebrew is written Macabab, whereof each letter signifieth a word, taken from the Song of Moses in Exodus. In these expresse words: ME CASHO CHA BAILEM IEHOVA? That is to say: Who is like vnto thee (O Lord) among the Gods? Judas vsing this sentence for his Motto or device, and making generall phrase of the first Letters of the foure words, caused himselfe to bee surnamed Macchabeus. His father being neere his death, appointed him the chiefe guide & Leader of the poore and miserable multitude: who had rather endure all afflictions whatsoeuer, then renounce the doctrine giuen them by God. Soone after the death of his Father, hee ouercame the Army of Apollonius, and made vse of his Sword in all the battailes hee fought afterward with a small band of men; hee vanquished the Army of Saren, Governour of Syria, who was slaine in the field, and with him 8000. men. These victories obtained the first yeares, made Judas Macchabeus highly renowned. The yeare following, which was the 147. of the Greekes reigne, Antiochus went into Persia with his Army, and left in the kingdom of Syria Lysias as Regent and Governour to his Son Antiochus Eupator, giuing him expresse charge to destroy the Iewes. For the execution of which command, Lysias sent into Palestine, forty thousand foote, and seuen thousand horse, vnder the conduct of Ptolemy, Acanor and Georgis his Colonels, who entred hostily with their Armies into Judea, and encamped before the Village of Yotam, Judas perceiving perill, led his Army into Magasa, a place (long agoe) built before the Temple of Ierusalem, and very famous for Religion.

There

The small Army of men that Iudas had with him.

The wonderfull successe of Iudas against Gods enemies.

Lysias continually with a small Army against the Maccabees.

Iudas encountereth the great Army of Lysias.

Antiochus repulled at his defeat, and Persepolis.

There he publickly commanded a fast, praying charge, that by earnest and hearty prayer they should craue of God, that to small a handful of men (for hee had but three thousand apt for warre with him) might valiantly defend themselves against so great a power of enemies. Which being done, he remoued his Campe, and went directly to confront the hoast of his aduersaries, and setting vpon them in the night season, droue them to flight, & slew three thousand with the Sword. Vpon the successe of this exploit, hee went to seeke the other part of the Army, which was guided by Gorgias, who intended to steale vpon the Jewes in the dead time of night. But Gorgias hearing the former defeat, and perceiuing the smoke of lighted fires in the Campe of the Jewes, fled away in haste with his forces. So Iudas, with so silly a power of people, enforced the huge hoasts of his enemies vnto flight, and got very great booties from them.

Lysias having intelligence of his mens ill successe, being mad with anger, leuied a farre greater power, to make fresh warre vpon the Maccabees. And the yeare following, which was the 148. of the Greekes reigne, himselfe in person (for hee grew distrustfull of his Captaines) accompanied with three score thousand foote, all of them pickt and chosen men, & five thousand horse, invaded Iudea, by passing thorow Idumea. And as he was encamped in Bethsura, on the Frontiers of Iudea, Iudas Macchabeus came to meete him with ten thousand men (so much was the number encreased, of them that deresst Ethnick Idolatry) and after hee had inuoked publickly the ayde of God, hee fought with the enemy.

Lysias perceiuing how courageously the Jewes fought, as men that meereley despised death, breaking furiously through his ranks, his men beginning to turne their backs, & five thousand of them heuen in peeces; rallied together his scattered troopes, and led them backe to Antioche, hoping to speede better at another time with a new expedition. Where in he was prevented, by the death of Antiochus the Noble, who being repulled from besiedging Persepolis, as hee led backe his Army in all order by Babylon, and being informed (by the way) what bad successe his Armies had sustained in Iudea: he fell first into a greenous vexation of spirit, & afterward of body, so that his intestines were smitten with horrible diseases. Yet being nothing the milder by this visitation, but rather more vehemently provoked against the Jewes: after his returne, he purposed a speedy journey to Iudea; there to race their Cities, especially Ierusalem, and vnto it to extirpate the Iewish Nation. But as he proceeded on in this violent resolution, and making too much haste on the way; the Chariot (wherein he lay sicke) was ouerturned, and his body so bruised against the ground, also the extremity of his impatience so violent; that his blood four-boyled, his entrailes putrified, and his flesh outwardly rotted, yielding forth a most loathsome and intolerable stinke, so that in wonderfull torments, he gaue vp the ghost, acknowledging the diuine vengeance of Heauen. Thus died this most cruell Tyrant, in the 148. yeare of the Greekes reigne; of his owne the 12. and the fourth, after those many robberies, as well of the Temple, as the City of Ierusalem.

Iudas Macchabeus, much encouraged by this so notable a victory, conducted his Army to Ierusalem; where hee cleansed the Temple, formerly defiled and profaned by the seruice of Idols, and offered sacrifices according to the Law, in the yeare of the Greekes, 148. before Christs Natiuitie, 162. the 25. day of the Moneth of Chiffen, that is to say, November; the very same day, that (three yeares before) it had bene robbed & profaned by Antiochus, placing therein Images and Idols. He builded also Sion, and strongly munited Bethsura, that it might serue as a Fortresse against the Iudumans.

Having done this, he kept his Armour daily on his backe, because he was still assailed by the Iudumans, Ammonites, and other, who laboured to ouerthrow the power of the Iewish Nation, which began to exalt it selfe in some good measure. But the brethren of the Maccabees, repelled those insulting Nations worthily, diuiding their Armies, & fighting fortunately in many places at a time, yet vsing their victories rudely enough. In the 150. yeare of the Greekes, Iudas laide siege before the Forts of Ierusalem, which from the Garrisons made many courses; killing

But Antiochus Eupator, being urged by Mene-laum, to send him aide, for reliefe of them that were besiedged in the forts; sent an army into Iudea by Lysias, consisting of 10000. foote, and 20000. horse, and besiedged Bethsura a long time. In the meane while, Iudas being aduertised of the Kings coming in person thither, raised his siege from before the forts, and went to meet the enemy with his Souldiers, of whom hee made some slaughters in diuers skirmishes. Yet finding himselfe to be oppressed by so ouer-great a multitude, retired into Ierusalem, where being enclosed within the munitions of the Temple; he endured a long and difficult siege, enforced (vpon the coming thither of Antiochus, who followed after Lysias) to play vpon advantages.

So long lasted this sharpe besiedging, vntill the King, being certified of Philips coming, who, vnder colour of reducing the Persians vnder the awe of Epiphanes, fought to possesse himselfe (as the time went) of the Kingdomes both of Asia and Syria: offered peace to them that were besiedged in the Temple, with libertie of liuing according to the laws of their forefathers. But after that Iudas had brought his garrison out of the Temple, the King being amazed at the fortifications, beat downe their walls, contrary to the accord made at the Temple, and led Menelaus the Soueraigne Sacrificer captiue away with him (according as we haue saide already) instituting Alcimus in his stead, who also was named Isachim, and so took his way home againe to Syria.

CHAP. V.

Antiochus and Lysias are put to death by Demetrius; the wicked behaviour of Alcimus the high Priest; the death of Iudas, and the succession of his brother Jonathan.

In the 151. yeare of the Greekes, Demetrius flying from Rome, where hee had bin detained in hostage, made seizure on the kingdom of Syria: putting to death the sonne of Epiphanes, named Antiochus

Eupator, and his Gouverneur Lysias. Now Alcimus, conseruing to retaine full the dignitie of the High Priesthood, conterred vpon him by Eupator and Lysias: went to Demetrius, and there accused all his nation (especially the Asmoneans) as Authors of the tumults, and perturbers of the peace of Iudea; & that they had throwne him out in banishment. Heereupon, the King sent Bacchides with a maine army, to reseat Alcimus in his office. Being entred Ierusalem with his power, by fraude hee slew many innocent Citizens, & leaving strong forces with Alcimus to safe protect him, returned backe into Syria. While thus Alcimus abused the power and fauor of the King, for putting many to death that were contrary to him: Iudas finding these courses to be intollerable, & taking to heart so great cruelty in the soueraigne Sacrificer; vndertoo: the defence of innocents, putting all them to death that took part with Alcimus. Whereupon, Alcimus fearing the vertue and power of Iudas, fled the second time to Demetrius at Antioche, and there formed a criminal accusation against Iudas.

Nicanor then was sent with a puissant Army, who thought craftily to surprize Iudas vnder a colour of kind conference, and so leade him along to the King. But this compact being discovered, hee entred into open armes; and being fought with all by Iudas in plaine battell, was constrained to retire to the fort of Sion. Afterward, issuing forth of Ierusalem in great anger, all his forces assembled together; hee threatned all the sacrificing Priests with death and vtter destruction of their Temple, if they did not deliuer Iudas a liue to his hands. But Iudas having reinforced his Armie, encountered againe with Nicanor at Bethsura, in which battail he slew the captaine Nicanor, & discomfited the whole army, being about 9000. men. This hapned the 13. day of the month Adar, which is February; and that day was afterward solemnely obserued, in regard of such a notable victory.

After these successefull adventures, Iudas perswading himselfe, that Demetrius would seek reuenge on the Jewes for this his great ouerthrow, desired to strengthe his power by the assistance of strangers. Heereupon, hee sent Ambassadors to the Romans, to capitulate vpon confederacy with them, requesting (among other particulars) that the Senate would forbid Demetrius, hereafter to molest and afflict the Jewes. But (as humane succors are deceitful) so the alliance of the Romanes was more discommodious to the Jewes, then if they had giuen them no ayde at all: because it made them more sleepey and negligent, and also was more offensive to the enemy. Whereupon it hapned, that the year following, being the 152. of the Greekes, Demetrius sent Bacchides and Alcimus with a potent army into Iudaea. There Judas met them with two thousand men onely, and although the most part of the slip away, and forooke his company, eyther thorow wearinesse of so long a war, or fearing the enemies power, or by the praistiles of Alcimus: yet notwithstanding, he vented on the Army of Bacchides, with eight hundred braue Soldiers, and fighting valiantly, there he dyed with this al, in the fixt year after his fathers death, good old Mattathias, and before the Natiuity of Christ, 158. yeares.

The year following, which was the 153. of the Grecians Reigne, Alcimus caused the walles of the inner house of the Temple to be destroyed, which the ancient facificing Priests had builded: to the ende, that not any munition should remaine, which might serue to retreat the aduersaries to the Kings of Syria. And hardly had they begun to beate it downe, but he was smitten suddenly with a Palsey, and therein surrendered vp his soule: but he had continued dumbe some long time before; and this was in the fourth year of his Priesthood.

Ionathas the second Sonne of Mattathias. Ionathas, or Ionathan, succeeded in the principality to his brother Judas, and by this occasion. After the death of Macchabeus, while the Jewes (which had embraced the manners and religion of the Pagans) grew to be more emboldened, and fought for all those well disposed people, that had followed Judas & his Brethren, sending them to Bacchides to bee cruelly murdered; adding also the famine, which greatly encreased, because, during the continuall warres, the fields had bene left without any tillage, so that the best persons, and which had most vnderstanding in religion, were extremely anguished: they made their recourse to Ionathas, entreating him to vndertake the defence of the poore afflicted, and to imitate therein the vertue and piety of his brother. Ionathas consenting to this, soone after made head mainly against Bacchides, and hardly escaping, retired his Soldiers into the desert, where Bacchides made no account to pursue them; but fortified some Townes, and planted strong Garisons in them, daily to torment the Jewes by sallies & courtes. Which being done, he retreated back his Army into Syria, after the death of Alcimus. By which meanes, the Jewes had some relaxation from warre, for about the space of two yeares, to wit, the 154. and 155. of the Grecians reigne.

In the yeare, 156. Bacchides was againe incited by the apostate Jewes, to surprize (by some sudden aduantage) the two brethren of Judas: but the ambushes being reuealed, hee came and openly assaulted them in the Towne of Bethesen. Neuerthelesse, perceiving the Towne to be well munited, and the Jewes furnished with all fitting matters, as fully resolved to defend themselves valiantly: he made peace with Ionathas, and the captiues beeing surrendered on cyther side, tooke his way backe to Syria, which was the cause that Iudaea had sometime of repose and quietnesse.

The yeare 160. Alexander the Noble, who sought to possesse himselfe of the kingdome of Syria, which was then vnder by Demetrius, Brother to Antiochus the Noble, and vnderstanding the power of Ionathas; sent Ambassadors to him with worthy presents, to practise with him for to ioyne in his intention, offering him (moreouer) the Soueraigne Priesthood, on condition, that he would ayde him against Demetrius. Beside, he solemnly invited him to the marriage, which hee had purposed in the City of Ptolomais, with Cleopatra, daughter to Ptolomy Philometor. Ionathas being allured by these offers, vnder hope of enjoying (by this meanes) two neighbouring Kings to bee his friends; went to be present at the royall wedding, and carryed gifts of great value with him. He was entertained by the two kings, so honorably as possible might be, and afterward sent backe againe, with confirmation in the high Priesthood, as also the principality of Iudaea, for the people (after the decess of Alcimus) had remained 7. yeares without a Soueraigne Sacrificer.

By this meanes, came the dignity first of High Priesthood to the Asmoneans, the ninth year of the principality of Ionathas; of the Greekes 160. as hath bene said; and before the birth of Christ, 150. But 5. yeares after, as Ptolomy had caught the kingdome of Syria, with his daughter Cleopatra; so he gaue them both to Demetrius Nicanor, Sonne to Demetrius, & then Ionathas had work enough to do, to enter into the good grace & fauour of the new King. Neuerthelesse, by gifts and offerings he prevailed so well at last, as vpon the auouching of his grace towards him, hee recovered a great part of Iudaea, & wonne among his own people, no meane power and credite. In the latter dayes of his principality, he fortified the Temple of Ierusalem, and renewed alliance with the Romanes, contracting kinde friendship also with the Lacedemonians. Soone after, he was surprized in Ptolomais, by the fraud & treason of Triphon, who, although he had promised to release him, if he might haue his two Sonnes sent him as hostages, and an hundred Talents (whereof his brother Simon made satisfaction, sending both the money & the children) neuerthelesse, the most cruell Tyrant murdered both the Father and his sonnes. Having done this abominable deed, and thinking no way to be resisted in his wicked courtes; by treachery he slew Antiochus surnamed Sedetes, Sonne to Alexander the Noble, to whom he was Tutor, & for the restoring of him to his Fathers kingdome, hee had enuied Demetrius Nicanor out of Syria, but got it into his owne possession. In this manner Ionathas held the principality of the Iewish people eightene yeares, and was the first administrator of the Soueraigne Priesthood of the Asmoneans, which hee held ten yeares.

Simon the third Sonne of Mattathias. Simon succeeded his Brother Ionathas, in the yeare of the Greekes, 170. & before the Natiuity of Christ, 140. being elected (by common consent of the people) Duke & Soueraigne Sacrificer: because he had valiantly assisted his Brethren Judas and Ionathas, for maintaining the doctrine giue by God, & the repressing of persecutions. At the beginning of his gouernment, he surprized some Forts from the Grecians, among which was that of Ierusalem, which till that time had bene held by the Syrian Garisons, & had wonderfully tormented the Citizens. He furnished them in such sort, that they were constrained to yeelde themselves, and afterward purified prophaned places, the 23. day of the second Moneth, in the yeare, 171. Vnder him, Iudaea began to respire and breathe a while, which for the space of 25. yeares after Antiochus the Noble, had but terribly shaken and wasted with continuall warres. The fields began again to recouer their former nature; places burnt and destroyed, to be re-builded; and those prophaned with Idols, to be nearely cleanted: In briefe, the voyce of heavenly doctrine began againe to be heard and deliuered in the Temple and Synagogues. In the third yeare of his Priesthood, Simon renewed alliance with the Romanes, by a Decree from their Senate, was confirmed Soueraigne Sacrificer, & to be styled Prince of the people.

Afterward, Antiochus Soter, brother to Demetrius Nicanor, preparing war against Triphon, who vnder the Kingdome of Syria: labored Simon with great promises for alliance, as doubting least hee would giue vnderance to his enterprize. But having conquered the Kingdome of Syria, and Triphon chased thence, in the yeare, 174. hee salified the former alliance, & redemanded diuers Townes and Cities in Iudaea of Simon, as also the Fort of Ierusalem, and a great summe of money besides; or else he would denounce warre against him, if he did not yeeld to what he demanded. Now in regard that Simon refused to grant so vniust a demand, Cendeleus was sent into Iudaea with an Army, whom Iohn Hyrcanus and Judas, Sonne to Simon, discomfited, as he was wasting the champaign Country; and hauing destroyed the Forts built in the Marches of Iudaea by the enemy, they returned backe with great glory.

Three yeares after, to wit, the 177. of the Greekes, and 133. before the birth of Christ, as Simon (growing now ancient) returned, visiting & ordaining the Churches, and the dissipated pollicies in Iudaea; he arriued (with his Wife and two of his Sonnes, Judas and Mattathias) neere to his kinselman Ptolomy, the Sonne of Abubus, whom he had constituted Gouernour of the whole Region about Iericho. But he wickedly murdered him, sitting at the Table of a Banquet, where (most traitorously) he had invited him, onely for that bloody purpose.

(each after other) fighting valiantly three and thirty yeares, in defence of the Law giuen by God, against the persecuters of though they could not so compasse the matter, as to cleanse Iudea wholly of Pagan Idolatries, because many among the people were (openly) Epicures, and many mightily delected, by seeing the woful calamities of the people, and others inueigled by the Gentiles prosperities; did willingly renounce the first received doctrine of their Fathers, and embraced the impieties of the Pagans: yet notwithstanding, they prevailed so well by their power, that the writings of the Prophets were preferred, the seruice ordained by God, nor abolished, nor the Iewish pollicy any way dissipated. All which ensued by the singular goodnesse of God, to the end, that the pollicy and ministry appointed by him (in some good measure still maintained) should continue to the time of Christ, that men might know, when & how the Messias was to be sent. The prin-

(sometime) in the Family of the Asmo-das and Jonathas had not left any issue of theirs.

merly spoken, to giue him the gouvernement of Iericho: they were imprisoned with their Mother, by their Vnckle Ptolomy, who before had slaine their Father at a Banquet. Now, while Hyrcanus, seeking to reuenge so horrible a deed, had besieged a small Towne, whereto Ptolomy had withdrawne himselfe: the Tyrant caused them there to be pitifully dismembred, as also their Mother; vntill such time as Hyrcanus, moued with compassion, & not able to endure the torturing of his brethren and Mother, raised the siege, albeit his captiued Mother, still vrged him earnestly, to maintaine the assault.

Iohn Hyrcanus.

In the life time of his Father, hee discomfited the Army of Antiochus Soter, which was conducted by Cendebeus. Next after the death of his Father, and the raking of his two Brethren, himselfe hardly escaping from the ambushes of the mur-derer Ptolomy: hee came to reuenge his Fathers death, and besieging the Towne whereto Ptolomy was returned, being o-uercome with pity, by seeing the torments which his Mother & Brethren suffered, at every time when hee gaue the assault, considering also, that the seuenth yeare of rest was neere at hand, he retreated his Army. Afterward, Antiochus Soter
made warre vpon him, so that he was shut vp within the City of Ierusalem, which Antiochus besieged in seven places all at one time: being pressed with famine, hee yielded vp the City, vpon condition, that he would beare down the Fortifications of the City, deliuer hostages, & five hundred Talents, that is to say, three Tunnes of Gold.

But as he was in want of money, or accidentally seeking for some by vrgent necessity, or admonished so to doe by a dream: he opened the Sepulcher of Da-uid, wherein he found three thousand Talents of Gold, which amounteth to 18.
Tuns of Gold. Being thus readuanced, he not only made peace with Antiochus, but also entred into amity with him, so that he entertained him into the City with his Army, and being well provided of mony, he was the first (of the Iewes) that had strange Soldiours vnder his pay. With whom he accompanied King Antiochus, valiancy of Hyrcanus, he ouerthrew a part of the Parthians Army, yet soone after,

when Asaces, King of the Parthians, came with a new Army, & he should then haue met and ioyned with him: Religion hindered Hyrcanus and the Iewes from going to the fight, because it was then the Feast of Pentecost. By which means, Antiochus being destitute of the Iewes helpe, was slaine, with a great number of his people.

After the death of Antiochus Soter, Hyrcanus began to make small account of the Kings of Syria: as being men, that (by ci-uill warres) had broken the forces of their kingdomes. Wherefore, bringing back his host from Asie, he tooke many Cities and Townes in the kingdom of Syria, which had in former times appertained to Iudea. He razed also the Temple of Gazium in Samaria, builded by *Sannaba-
l* the Cuthean, (as hath before bin remembered) two hundred yeares after it had bin builded in fauour of Manasses, Brother to Iaddus, in the time of Alexander the great.
He compelled also the Iudeans (after he had giuen them many chastenings) to receiue circumcision, and other ceremonies of the Iewes. And to strengthen himselfe the more against the Kings of Syria, who he thought not fit to make any more surprizing of Cities; hee renewed alliance (by Ambassadors) with the Romans, in the fourteenth yeare of his principality, and the 191. of the kingdom of Syria:
Cneus Domitius Barbo, and Caius Flaminius being Consuls, an hundred and 12. yeares before the Natiuity of Christ.

Afterward, as Demetrius Nicanor had bene restored to his Kingdom by Asa-ces, and as quickly againe repulled from it by Alexander Zebon, when he prepared himselfe to make warre on the Iewes: so Hyrcanus, allyng himselfe with Alexander the victorious, had sustained as little ioy thereof, if an admirable accident had not corrected their error. For Antiochus Gryphus, Sonne to Demetrius, seeking to recouer his Fathers kingdom, slew Alexander in battaile, and (after that victory) pur-posed to invade Hyrcanus, the leagued friend to his enemy. But hearing of another preparation of warre against himselfe, by his brother Antiochus Cyzicus; he was glad to keepe at home still in Syria. So, while the two brethren did well-fauouredly contend with one another (a long time) for the kingdom of Syria; Hyrcanus and Iudas remained in quietnes, during which time, Hyrcanus well fortified himselfe by strong Castles newly builded, re-enforcing at his most commodious munitions, collecting vp great summes of money, & providing other necessary matters, to exploit his warre affaires.

Finally, hee laide siege to the most strong City of Samaria, and left there his two Sonnes Antigenus and Antibulus to continue it, while himselfe attended to the administration of more important Oeconomicall affaires. Heereupon, the Samaritans called to succour them Antiochus Cyzicus; who repulled the Iones to Hyrcanus, and chased them so farre as to * Scythopolis. Again, the two brethren brought their Army before Samaria, and again Antiochus Cyzicus (being requested) entred into Iudea, pillaging and spoyling wheresoeuer he came. But being repulsed, hee gaue the charge of his Army to two of his Captaines; one of them being slaine by the Iewes, and the other corrupted with money, surrendered (by treason) Scythopolis, and the other neighbouring Cities. So the City of Samaria, hauing endured (in great misery) a whole yeares fledge, was at the last forced and quite destroyed. Such was the ending of this most mighty City, which (for a long time) had paragond it selfe equal with Ie-rusalem; but about an hundred yeares after, it was builded againe by Herod, who named it Sebastia, in the honour of Augustus Caesar.

sanctity, and great swarms of deuised traditions, concerning some kindes of bodily exercises: so that (whensoever they pleased) they could cause the common people to mutiny against the Princes and the High-Priest. Hyrcanus had sometime bene a curious fauourer of this Sect; in which regard, the Pharisees did beare him great affection: but at the last, he estranged his kindnesse towards them, finding himselfe offended at the punishment of Elezazar the Pharisee, by some outrage offered him. And this was the reason, that hee tooke part with the Sadducees, who sharply reprobued the traditions of the Pharisees, and in hate and spight to the Pharisees sect, hee abolished (by publike Edicts) many of their traditions; which made him and his Sonnes to be mortally hated, as well of the Pharisees, as of the people. Whereupon ensued great mutinies among the people: which his Sonne Alexander very hardly appeased, but not without great effusion of blood.

Now, because mention is here made of these two Sects, both of the Pharisees and Sadducees, whereof more will be spoken in the following Histories, as likewise in sacred Writ: I thinke it not amisse to make some addition, of matters found in authentical writings, concerning the variance and difference betweene them. For in speaking of their original, we can but follow coniectures onely: except this infallible certainty, that both the one and other Sect were newly forged, by leauing the ancient and pure doctrine of the Prophets. I his firme rule ought euermore to be held in the Church, that there is one sole true doctrine, of the diuine essence & will, made manifest of God by certaine and vnlouebred testimonies, and was giuen to the first Fathers and Prophets: but much more enlightened afterward, by the voice of the Sonne of God, our Lord Iesus Christ, dead, and raysed ypagaine for vs, as also by the voice of the Apostles. And no opinions ought to be embraced, contrary to that first Prophetical doctrine and voyce of Gods owne Sonne: because many sayings of the Prophets doe witness this rule to be true. As I say condemneth those Doctors, which propose (as the doctrine of God) opinions forged in their owne braines, and such as neuer were giuen of God. Being armed then, and well warned by this rule, wee may the better iudge of these Sects.

But in making this recital, I may not forget that most lamentable complaint, which the so mighty infirmity of mankind ought much to bemoane, because euen then, when the Church consisted of so small a number, to wit, in few Tribes of Israel, poorely impayred, and shut vp in that narrow country neighbouring to the Phoenicians, and that then (with so small pollicy) discipline could scarcely maintaine it selfe peaceably, or doctrine bee kept in good concord: such horrible furies being prepared against it, yea, & they embraced by the greater part of the Governours, publishing them wholly, without dissembling any thing, although they were plainly repugnant vnto the Law of God. The Sadducees acquitted themselves of sacrifices, and neuertheless affirmed publicly, that after this present life, there remained no other, nor any iudgement; and that the soule (being separated from the body) should haue no more life, and that men should not rise againe. But the Pharisees were a little more modest, and yet notwithstanding, they had as well corrupted the doctrine giuen by God, as we shall haue better occasion to speake of hereafter.

Neuertheless, God had a true Church all this while, which still re-rayned the light of his doctrine: and yet was it not greatly to be lamented, that in one & the same company, which bare the name of the Church, among a troope that called vpon God in truth; such errors should not onely bee dispersed, but also allowed by the authority of Princes and Doctors? Beside this, the assured and prophaned arrogancy of many (euen in our times) ought greatly to be reprehended, who dreaming of no dispersion of errors in the Church, eyther for satisfaction of their owne ambition, vnder colour of religion seeking after kingdomes, or by heaping superstitions one vpon another, thereby to fit and furnish their owne avarice; doe neuer thinke on (in this case) the ancient and old examples of the Pharisees & Sadducees, who declared sufficiently, the very like euils crept into the Church, euen as apparently then, as those of other times. It is therefore very necessary, to haue one certaine rule, in listening to the voyce Euangelicall, according as Saint Paul said: If any man preach any other Gospell to you, let him be accursed.

Furthermore, consideration is to be had, of the time of that first Doctrine, agreeing with the voyce of the Prophets, the Sonne of GOD, and the Apostles: and next, of such persuasions as haue crept into the Church, some whereof haue bene confirmed by the superstition of men vnlearned, others haue bene voluntarily receiued, as seruing the ambition of the mightie, and for benefite to the kitchen. Acknowledging then, and bewyling the harmes of the Church; let vs seeke after the springs or fountaines of true doctrine, to the end wee may truly call vpon God, who hath alwayes preferred some part of mankind, where his true knowledge might shine, to bee the Temple of God, and afterwards partaker of his glorious company, because mankinde was not created in vaine. But before I discourse on the original of Sects, and Diuisions of the Church, it is needfull first to say somewhat, concerning the first true Church or Schoole, which from the beginning of mankinde, hath bene gardian and keeper of the true doctrine: from whence hath issued many, who (as seditious) haue scattered diuers corruptions among the truth of doctrine.

Mankind was not borne by accidental chance, neither created without cause: but it pleased God, that he should haue a reasonable nature, embellished with a bodie, wherein the knowledge of him might shine, and to whom he might communicate his wisdom and goodnes, & that hee should enjoy his company once and for euer. Now, although God expressed his wisdom and goodnes, by creating the great workmanship of the world: yet notwithstanding, his goodnes made it selfe much more apparent, in that (after the fall of Adam and Eue) he sent from his secret seate, that infinite mercie for their recovery, by giuing them the promised Seede to come. And to make it the better knowne and vnderstood, hee would haue men to heare the sound of that sweete voice: The Seede of the woman shall breake the Serpents head. Such as receiued graciously this consolation, were receiued of God, and made members of the eternall Church of God. Thus first of all, the Church was created, and the Schoole instituted, wherein our first Parents taught the doctrine of God to their children: concerning the creation of all things; concerning their owne fall; the paines and punishments to ensue; the trecheries of the diuell; the causes of death and all humane miseries; the promise of the Seede to come, whereby the great and iust anger of God was to bee appeased. Also, how sinne was to be defaced, eternall life restored, the difference of good and euill works, and that such a difference being imprinted in the soules of men, was truly the Lawe diuine, agreeing with the intelligence and diuine will; so to shine in the spirits of men, that it might bee a testimonie of God to men, that he was one God, and how to bee adored: admonishing likewise, that hee would iudge the actions of men, because conscience would else exercise a burdensome iudgement in vs.

There they were taught the difference betweene this naturall knowledge, and the other of higher quality: the pronounced promise of the secret bosome of the eternall Father, touching the Seede; the future iudgement of all mankind: and that such as (by faith in that Seede) attained to beleue therein, were acceptable to God, and in that faith had recourse to him, struing to order their manners by the rule of the diuine Lawe, should liue eternally in the most sweete company of God. Others, who arrogantly contemned God, & the promised Seede to come, running furiously on the bridle of their wicked desires, were like vnto diuells, enemies to God, and after death should liue in horrible torments, whereof they discerned some resemblance in this life, by the terrours of such, whose bodies were aduaged to terrible punishments.

Those first Fathers declared, how God had clothed them with the skins of beasts, to signifie, that (after death) they should bee defenced of their corrupted bodies, and put vpon them (as the garment or robe of the Lambe) that is to say, the promised Seede, which was to be sacrificed, that all mankind might be saved by him. They taught the will of God to bee such, that by this meanes it should bee sought, knowne and called on, as it was made manifest: and that our mindes leaning vpon his promise, gaue vs to vnderstand, that then wee are in the grace of God, when (by fayth) wee relie vpon his promises, and that hee would haue no other gods to be receiued, or Sacrifices offered by them that forgot or reiected this doctrine giuen by God. They also manifested, that God would haue one sole and certaine assemblie, which should be consenting in doctrine, gathered together by inuocation and sacrifices: in which sole assembly, should be the future heires of eternall life with God.

As an Interpreter to their Sacrifices, this predication was often repeated; This manner of behaviour, and these publique assemblies are instituted, to the end, that this doctrine should be sent to Posteritie. In them the voyce of the diuine Promise, and the doctrine declared by vs, was to be heard: for god would haue his voyce to be heard of all men. In which respect, it was and is requisite, that there should be honest assemblies, and although the Church will be alwayes tormented with great calamities: yet shall she be exalted as a Caffe on a high mountaine. These our Sacrifices which you see, are the chaines and linkes of such assemblies, and no other paintings haue we to admonish vs, then the diuine Promise fo graciously giuen vnto vs.

Having entrusted their children in these great matters, they added, concerning the Seede to come, That that Lord, who should breake the head of the Serpent; was already (and euen then) assisting to his Church, although he was not (as yet) reuested with humane flesh. That he was the Image of the Eternall and only Father, begotten of him, who prayed to his Father for the Church, and defended it, and (with the Father) comforteth the hearts of Beleueers, euen in their greatest feares, by his Promises, and kindly in them the light of the blessed Spirit, for the beginning of eternall life. Which Spirit proceeded from the Father, and from this promised Lord. By this meanes they taught to know the only true God, wise, good, iust, true, chaste and pure, Creator of heaven and earth, of Angels, and of mankind; to the end, that all might vnderstand, there was one only eternall Father, who had created all with this promised Lord, who is his Image, and with the blessed Spirit, so that no other Diuinitie was to be imagined.

Moreouer, in this holy Schoole, the first fathers taught the doctrine concerning the nature of things, giuing to vnderstand; that there were certayne lawes of Celestiall motions, to deliuer testimony, that this world was not made by aduenture, but created by the intelligence of a super-excellent workman. They taught beside, the course of the yearre to be ordained, because God would haue men to know the order of times; thereby also to vnderstand the order of diuine promises, and how they were to be reuealed, as to know what the first giuen doctrine was, thereby to iudge of the newer afterwar.d. And because men might comprehend, that all things were created by the Diuine Councell and Prouidence: they shewed diuerse vses of Plants, to what end they were created, and for the vse of man. Heereupon they expressed, how God assisted the nature of man by those remedies; thereby also instructing, that offences Innocents are holpen of God by admirable meanes, and yet without the ayde of creatures.

That this was the doctrine of the first or Primitive Church, the narration of Moses sufficiently declares, in Genes. And it is not to be doubted, that the wisdom of the golden Age, before the Flood, was much greater then that after the Flood, where nature became more weak & feeble. And though that many, both before and after the Flood, might forget or misprize true doctrine; yet notwithstanding, God would not suffer his true Inuocation to be quenched among men: but euermore reserved som company that kept this doctrine, (from one time to another) renued & dispersed it further off by nouell testimonies. Again, when after the Flood, the multitude of men began once more to encrease, though the light of true doctrine might be extinct in Babylon: yet notwithstanding the studie of Astrology remayned, touching the motions and effects of the Starres, with the knowledge of things growing in the earth.

And in this meane while, the promise of God was still preferred and kept, renewed and illumined in the posteritie of Noah. Afterward, when this pollicie became to be so well ordaind among the people people of Israel: all the Colledge of the Leuites was as an Academie and place of exercise. There, some Sacrificers and Prophets taught againe the auncient and vncorrupted doctrine.

But afterward, when the tenne Tribes were cut off by the Kings of Juda: then great confusions (both in Religion and Doctrine) followed. And yet neuertheless, God raised in the dismembred part of Judaes Kingdome, Eliar, Elsens, and other Prophets, to draw diuers there to the truth of knowledge: which was the reason that the Prophets had great troupes of Auditours, in regarde that Eliar, Elsens, and the rest had deliuered (from hand to hand) their sacred preachings and interpretations. Some did leaue theirs written, as Esay, and they that followed after. This custome did alwayes continue in this people, and especially in the Temple, where the sacrificing Priests gaue the interpretations, or else where among the Doctours, and such as were interpreters of the Writings of Moses and the Prophets.

But in the latter times, after the returne from Babylon, and after the Prophet Zacharie, when the High-Priests beganne to affect familiarity with the kings of Juda, and sought to make themselves great and powerfull, the study of true doctrine became contemned, and after that Juda was spoiled by Antiochus; many places were lost, the companies of Students, and their Masters scattered, and discipline being thus neglected, it is very likely that the studies became to bee wonderfully changed. Howbeit, that alwayes some of the Colledge of the high-Priests, and of the people, kept some sparks of the true doctrine liuing among them: as Simcon, Zacharie, Anne, and other, whose youth neighboured to the warres of Antiochus. Notwithstanding, many audacious Expositions of the Propheticall Bookes, wandred farre off from the auncient doctrine.

It is very likely, that at the beginning, the name of Interpreters was common to some men of the best iudgement, and likewise to other, that transfused the doctrine of the Church into Philosophie. By succession of times, as this new Philosophie was most pleasing, and many earnestly fauouring it: the Schooles began to be so much the more frequented, and a kinde of doctrine was then concluded on. In this manner a profession or Sect (which then was in admiration) was ordained; without changing the name of Pharisee, as much to say as an Expounder, as nowadaies the title of Doctour, is the name of a most honest Office and Profession: for many learned men doe conceiue the Pharisee to be named, rather for Interpretation or Exposition, then by separation or diuision.

Iulphus reporteth some of their opinions, but they are better to bee vnderstood in the Euangelicall Historie, and what their principall errors were. For, although they carried themselves as interpreters of the Prophets: they auouched the Bookes not onely of Moses, but also of the other Prophets, adioyned to the holy Histories by publique authoritie of the Ancients, to remaine in their credite and integrity. Neuertheless, they helde false opinions concerning the vse of the Lawe, and transferred the promises of the Messias Kingdome, to politicall vse. They helde exterior Discipline, for Iustice satisfying to the Lawe, and denied that wicked affections were sinne, or doubting of God, or courage enkindled by hatefull or lustfull desires: provided that they proceeded not to outward offence. These corruptions are expressly reproofed in Saint Matthew, where it is said; Whosoener looketh on a woman, to lust after her, hath already committed adultery with her in his heart. And although that many vlearned men in the Church, read these Sentences as Paradoxes of the Stoicks, who painted the Ideas of the vertues, to the end that men should stricke to come nere to them (which is impossible for any man in this world to do) yet are they propounded to the Church to other ends.

The Sonne of God knew, that in the imbecillitie of this nature, no man can be without bad desires; therefore hee would haue the preaching of repentance to be dayly sounded among men, that acknowledging our corruptions in due manner, wee should confesse our owne guiltinesse, and make our recourse to the Sonne of God. The Philosophie of the Pharisees, obscured this auncient Propheticall tical doctrine, as it had been in all times after Caine and his Posteritie.

In like manner, the other part of heavenly doctrine, to wit, the promised Messias was also obscured. The Pharisees knew and celebrated the magnificent Promises made to Abraham, recited by Isaac, and often repeated by the Prophets: but they maintained, that they spake only of a political kingdom. They dreamed also, that the Messias should come like unto an other Cyrus or Alexander the great, to vse the whole Empire of the world, the people being subiect unto him: and yet notwithstanding, that this Empire should be more iust, milde and peacefull, then any of them before. They affirmed, that the Messias should reigne a thousand yeares; that the Israelites should liue three or foure hundred yeres without feare of warres, seruitude, or famine, or any other great calamities: And that there should bee no other nature in the Messias, but humane.

In these idle imaginations, all the doctrine of the Sonne of God, of anger against sinners; of the sacrifice and death of the Messias was buried. And yet neuertheless, truth was not wholly quenched in the Church, but (as I haue said) some sparkes remayned with Simeon, Zacharie, and many such like, who read the Prophets without corruption.

After that the Pharisee had corrupted the words of the Lawe, and the promises thereto appertaining: they dreamed that sinners were to be pardoned by ceremonies and slaughter of beasts, ordained in the Lawe. This perswasion brought in great gaine, for the people (being thus perswaded) multiplied the more their sacrifices. These so thicke mists of darknesse had some apparence of wisdom and pietie; which neuertheless are oftentimes reprehended of the Prophets.

Ceremonies growing to great augmentation and encrease, many questions (as in the like cases happeneth) were moued, touching the manner of performing them, & other circumstances, which (indeede) required many declarations. And as Monks heaped vp together great summes of money, by the buying and selling of humane traditions, with their annexed circumstances: euen so the Pharisees would locke vp and let loose the ceremonies of Moses, at their pleasure; and adde to them their owne nouell devices, as well for the confirmation of superstition, as their owne gaine. Saint Matthew telleth vs, that the lucrative tradition is reprobued: that it was much better to giue somewhat to the Temple, then to norish and relieue their owne poore parents: euen as now adays it is maintained, that a number of slothfull idle Monks, should rather enioy great reuenewes, then any thing spared for the reliefe of poore Schollers.

The tradition of the Sabbath was also in great vse, as Hierome alledgeth: for Alzila and Hillel, both Rabins, do say, a Sabbath dayes journey is but two halfe miles. Beside in this Sect remained some studies of doctrine, and some care of governing the discipline. They could well conclude, that there was an eternall and intelligent God, true, good; iust, chaste, well-doing, and a reuenger of offences: whereby they confessed all things to be created, the heavens, the earth, Angels, men and other creatures. They affirmed also (by opinion of philosophy) that there was but one person in the diuinitie, boldly reiecting the Primitiue and Prophetical doctrine concerning the Sonne of GOD and the blessed Spirit: although they had apparent testimonies of the Son of God in Daniel, Isay, Micheas and Daniel; and of the Holie-ghost, in many Sermons of the Prophets.

Moreover, they confessed, that God the Creator of all things, was manifested by his Promises, and by publishing his Lawe: surpassing all other in goodnesse, with a most goodly policie, ordayned and warranted by many testimonies of his presence. Wherefore they would not haue any one to call in doubtfull question the prouidence of God, nor to doubt that the posteritie of Abraham (to whom God had giuen this ordayned policie) should bee any other then the people of God, or the Church whereof God had a peculiar care. They taught them that God gouerned the principall mutations which happened in this life, as the encreasing and diminishing of Empires, the ruine and building againe of great Cities; because they knew their euents to agree with the prophesies of empires, which are in Moses, Isay and Daniel; adding ding withall, that they knew that their Citie Ierusalem had beene diuinely builded.

And yet (for all this) they affirmed, that the affaires and liues of all men, were gouerned by humane counceles; and they magnified the libertie of mans will, as also the faculty of Free-will: yea, and in such sort, that they held a man might satisfie the diuine Lawe, and be iust by his diligence, meriting all goodnesse both present and heavenly. And contrariwise, that such as offended the diuine Lawe by exteriour transgressions, should be punished both in this life and the other. For their opinion was (that the soule separated from the bodie) should liue, and that there should bee a resurrection of the dead, wherein God would reward the iust, and send into euermlasting punishments, such as had soiled themselves with execrable vices. And yet they held withall, that he would punish many crimes by present calamities, adding also; that some might be defaced by sacrifices, and the penalties due to them, made more milde or lessened.

Now, although this doctrine was very passable in appearance; yet notwithstanding, they abolished the true vse of the Law, and with the benefites of the Messias, the doctrine of free pardon. Wherefore, cyther they confirmed trust in mens owne iustice, or left their consciences in pittifull doubts: in regarde that mens minds being thus ouertrowne, fled from God, and trembling against him; neyther durst approach neare him, nor call vpon him truly.

For the more sure maintaining these their disciplines, they had instituted many exercises; the most part whereof serued rather for ostentation, then any restraint to their owne bad desires. The manner or forme of their garments was notable; for they wore great long cloakes, with fringes about them, inter-woven with the words of the Lawe. Oftentimes they vsed to wash themselves, hauing at the entering into their houses holy-water, wherewith they sprinkled themselves. They obserued choice of meates in their fasts, muttering long prayers to themselves, which Saint Matthew calleth Barthologie, much babbling.

Their sacrifices and apparance of piety, attracted greatly the familiarity of women, which was the cause that adulteries and diuorces grew to be very frequent among them; and to enioy therein the more liberty, they enlarged the law of diuorces. For the ancient custome of diuorces implied, that they were not to be done, but vpon knowledge of the cause, and the instruments to effect them, was, with the knowledge and consent of the magistrate, and seperation might not be graunted for light causes and distambances; but by good reasons induced to the Iudges, who were knowne to bee graue men, and of great integritie.

But the Pharisees (vicerly disannulling this ancient custome) made diuorces vpon their private authority, either without cause, or for causes of no moment: so that the lawe of diuorce serued onely as a baited hooke, to allure and betray other mens wiues; as among the Pagans, and as at this instant with the Turkes, it is in vse.

By this kind of proceeding, men might reiect their wiues when they thought fitly, without any reasonable cause, and contrary to the nature of marriage, which God himselfe instituted at the beginning, to the end, that it might be the alliance of an inseparable company when he saide: They shall be both one flesh; that is to say, a male and female shal be ioyned together inseparably. In like manner, the Lawe of Moses did not permit diuorce without cause; but rendered a reason whereby seperation might be allowed, to wit, if any wilensse were found in her. And the ancient Atticke custome intended, that no diuorce should be granted, without knowledge of the cause. Since when, by succession of times, the bands of discipline haue been let loose, by the encrease of lewdnes and incontinencie: so that the ancient Atticke custome became quite changed, And since the latter times of the Iewes, all grauity for the maintenance of alliance in marriage, grew greatly extenuated. For these could not be faide to be a true wife, whom the husband might cast off at all times, and whensoever such giddines intoxicated his braine, and without any worthy cause. This vniust custome of the Pharisees was the cause of that question in S. Mathew, where mention is made concerning the alliance of marriage, and the first institution thereof repeated: also by a seuer declaration, light and triuial separations of marriage, vied both among the people of the Iewes, and Pagans likewise, are forbidden and condemned.

It hath beene common to all superstitious natures, in all ages and nations, to peruert the order of precedent actions; yea, & in such sort, that they grow to be very difficult and rigorous exacters, of multitudes of their owne deuised ceremonies: being (in the interim time) very carelesse for the necessary seruices of life, whereof the Decalogue giueth commands, and letting loose the bridle to infinit lewd affections. And many of them appeare merely as Luggers, such as are described in our Satyres, who (by counterfeited grauitie) disguise great vices, whereof is said; That they show themselves to be wise men, and yet live in dissolution.

And although among the Pharisees, some were more modest then others, as Gamaliel; some also vnderstanding the doctrine more purely, renouncing errors, as Nichodemus: yet notwithstanding, the most part of them were of this coyned or flampe. They had execrable errors (concerning the Diuinitie) engrauen in their spirits, and touching the political Empire of the Messias. They vnderstood nothing of the promise for remission of sins, nor of the true Inuocation. They had a false opinion of the Mosaicall ceremonies, and of their owne. Moreover, they added other enorme vices to these; as to esteeme wel of themselves, for they reputed themselves to be wise, iust, princes and pillars of Gods Church; preferring themselves before all modest and religious people indeed, because they affected to haue their carriage more seene and obserued, themselves to be more honoured and feared, then any other. Nevertheless, they were in continuall debates and variances, as well among themselves, as the Citizens, feasting together for pride, ambition, enuy, contempt, hatred, euill speaking and venomous injuries. So that through their private couetousnes, they moued not only many domestical tumults, but ayimed at the yoke of strangers; for they were skillfull in those artes (well knowne among themselves) in seeking to compasse a tyrannicall power.

First of all, they strengthened themselves by the fauours of neighboring kings, of high Courts, mighty men, and planting factions among the people; forgetting to imitate the ancient saying; If the Serpent doe not eate a Serpent, hee will neuer become a Dragon. And either by calumnies, or other like means, they oppressed all such, as (in emulation) were hinderers to their power. About all, they were very spleenatiue against the professors of true doctrine, carefully seeking all occasions whereby to spoile them: as it is said, they slew Zachary the Father to Iohn Baptist.

Now although (as I haue formerly said) that among the Pharisees, some were more modest then other, & some (being there-to admonished) forsooke their errors, and embraced the true doctrine: yet notwithstanding, the following Historie of the Iewish people, and the Euangelicall narrations doe testifie, that the opinions and behaviour of this troupe, and all such as made profession of this Sect, partaking with them in their rites and ceremonies, were none other then as I haue heere set downe.

CHAP. VIII.

Concerning the originall of the other Sect, termed Sadduces, contrary in nature to the Pharisees, and what customes were obserued among them.

Haue beene the larger in discoursing on the Pharisees, in regarde that this Sect dazzled or deceived mens sight, by an apparance of farre greater superstition, then that of the Sadduces, and going beyond them in authoritie. Now I shall (in brieft) say somewhat of the Sadduces, in so much, as this Sect receiued no originall from superstition; but rather from contempt of God, fauouring to be Epicurian.

Forasmuch as the Pharisees charged men with numberlesse ceremonies, that neither their bodies or consciences could bear any more like to some other in these later times, whose lawes and impositions haue growne beyond all measure, that many fired (with tears) to be disburdened: so started vp other profane people, who, without any true iudgement, loosing the bids of all restriction (by an Epicurian audaciousnes) instituted another Sect contrary to that of the Pharisees, naming themselves Sadduces. For, to cary some esteem before the people, they tooke this honorable title, deliuered from Iustice: For Zaddikim signifies Iustnes, & this name was opposite to that of the Pharisees, who were termed Interpreters, and disputed on many things. Now it was a matter more notable and glorious, for men to be styled Iust, and doers of the Law, then Interpreters and Disputers. Others deduce the name from Sedak, a Chaldean word, which signifies to part or diuide. Because they vnderstood the Sadduces to be termed (according as we speake) Schismatikes, diuided from sentence with the rest of the church; but I guesse that their aduersaries forged that Etymology.

It is no great matter, whence the appellation came, let vs rather consider the deed it selfe, & be terrified withall, in thinking on so horrible an example. Wherein plainly appeared the power of the diuell, foraging in this company, which bare the name of the church of God, considering, that (euen then) in people very well conditioned, among whom discipline was easily enterained, because their extendure was so small, & where there were no strangers to intermeddle; many durst (by public authority) propound most execrable errors, and erect; euen in the midst of the Church, a Schoole like that of Epicurus. Let vs consider on this also; that after these Churches were spread abroad farre & wide, many mighty errors were sowne in; & by them, as namely the confusion of the Empire, and the conuersion of Pagans, among whom they liued. Wherefore, let vs not flatter our selves, by a vain assurance of the name of the Church, as if that all had bin, or were without sinne.

And although it is not possible to report all the mad pranks of the Sadduces, without great griefe and anguish; yet notwithstanding, it is necessary the Historie should be written. For, it plainly appeareth, that some profane Iewes brought a monstrous audaciousnes into Iudea, and such wicked opinions as they had learned of Pagans, merely Epicurians, by haunting to them familiarly; for they carried no meane resemblance with them. The Sect of the Sadduces retained the name of God, for feare lest it should appeare, that they would dissipate the pollicie, which was singularly maintained by the bands of Religion. But they endeouored to efface out of mens vnderstanding, the true inuocation vpon God, and the true feare of him.

They maintained, that mens soules being (sundered from their bodies, should neuer rest, and that men should reuiue no more after death: neyther that any other iudgement was to be expected, wherein the iust were to be discerned from the vniust. The names of eternall life, & of hell, were to this Sect as meere fables and terrors to affright young children. And because they would make their intention knowne, that it was to ease the mindes of men, from the burden of Pharisaicall traditions, and to teach liberty: they feigned, to recall men back to the writings of Moses, and therefore alledged his saying, where it is forbidden to adde to the Law. By this meanes they frustrated all the writings of the Pharisees, with all their interpretations and traditions: the release and discharge whereof was pleasing, and affected by many, because that the number of them was well-near infinite.

From thence, and there framing their beginning, they went on further vnder the same colour, & reiected all the Bookes of the Prophets (the bookes of Moses onely excepted) auouching, that he neuer meant or spake, but of this present life onely. To maintain the forme and order of their Commonwealth, they sayd; That the law ought to be obeyed, & sacrifices to be performed, because God punished great offenses in this life. Contrariwise, for good actions and obedience, he gaue peace & abundance of goods: confirming all their fancies by the words of Moses, where hee speaks both of blessings and cursings.

The breuitie of this Doctrine, agreed and contented light headed spirits highly; and prophane persons were not a little delighted with these opinions: which were confirmed by the iudgement of sense onely, because every man thought that an intollerable burthen, and hardly gaue credite to those Articles, which were out of his present sight & comprehension. therefore this Sect (how wicked fouer it were) wanted not store of folowers.

Now although it be true, that God is the gardian of political societie; and that he punisheth vniust murders in this life, lest the companies of men should be confounded, as also to the end, that they may be manifest signes of his diuine Iustice to euery eye: yet notwithstanding, God in meane while (by an admirable counsell best knowne vnto himselfe) suffereth many iust persons to be slaine by the wicked; as Abell, the children of Israel in Egypt, Ionathas, Esay, Jeremy, and innumerable other. These examples doe testifie, that there remaineth another Iudgement, wherein God will declare his iustice, by bringing the iust and vniust into iudgement: and the wicked, being sent into torments, shall shew the iust to be victorious, although it continue some time after death. For, seeing that God declared, that he had a care of Abell, Ionathas, Esay, and Jeremy during their liues: if after death he should haue made no account of them, it had much diffented from his prefciences; yea, and from his iustice also. It is then most euident, that the Sadduces, who denied any other iudgement to remaine after death; did cut off the diuine and iust providence, from a great part of mankind, and especially from such as haue excelled in righteoufnesse.

The sacrificing Priest of the Sadduces, beeing at the Altare, conceived, that the Israelitish Nation was not chosen of God (who onely had the true knowledge of God on earth); because they had been so often oppressed by Kings of the Egyptians, Chaldeans & Syrians; and, euen when their neighbors (being dispersed throughout Iudea) spoiled many thousands of iust persons, compelling them that furnished, to feed on the slaughtered bodies of their fellow-Citizens: in this case, shall there bee no attribution of iustice and providence to God, if instantly hee shewe not himselfe to haue a care of his, and that (therefore) there remaineth no immortality? Thus vnder the shadow of ceremonies, were mens foules abused, by outward and apparant Legier-dumaines, the diuine Providence being exactly taken away, euen as the Epicurians did.

Now, considering there were these debates between the Pharises and Sadduces, in such great matters, let such as reade, conceiue, not onely how great and frequent the tumults and perturbations of this people haue beene; but also, how rudely both the Pharises and Sadduces, and diuers other with them (being manifestly Atheists) vsed the true Church, as Simeon, Zachary and their poore flocke. But as then (among so many wolues and lions) some faithfull guardians of the true doctrine were reserved; so (no doubt) but God will still continue it to all succeeding times; and as hee did to Simeon and the rest, so he will euermore stand in the iust defence of his Spouse the Church, supporting her against all miseries whatsoeuer.

CHAP. IX.

Of a third Sect, contrary to the Pharises and Sadduces, who termed themselves by the name of Essæans: their originall Religion and manner of life.

Ordinarly happeneth, that when seditions haue once gotten themselves into actiue motion: many partialities and diuisions will thrust in after them. As Homer feigned, that the Storehouse or Armory (wherein Aeolus had locked vp the winds) being broken open: the Sea became troubled euery where, the windes flew abroad with such extraordinary violence; euen so in kingdoms & Empires, after that political order commeth to bee once troubled and disioyned; many diuisions must needs follow after. Many Sects exalted themselves, during these debates between the Pharises and Sadduces. For some, detestling the profane doctrine, and Ethnick licence of the Sadduces, and seeing Religion and piety masked by the Pharises, and that, to disguise great and grosse vices, such as were whoredome, ambition, malice, enuy, cruelty, lying, rapine, and the like, they set before mens eyes (as a cloude of dissimulation) dreadfull feueritie, and some seuerer ceremonies; beganne to diuide themselves from both one and other.

And these Separatists & diuided people, formed a name for themselves, called Essæans, workers; by which title, they gaue me to vnderstand, that which they reproued in others, & wherein they would seem more excellent then they: namely, that they fled from the profane libertie of the Sadduces, & allowed not the hypocrisie of the Pharises, disguised in so many kindes: but that they would doe deeds or workes profitable to other, and commaunded by God, hauing alwayes this vsuall sentence in their mouths, Euery word without work, is merely vaine and vnprofitable.

There is no mention made of them in the Ecclesiastical history, either because they had not inuented any new kind of doctrine, but retained the doctrine of Moses & the Sacrificers: or in regard they dwelt at the end of Iudea, toward the lake Asphaltida, as in a retiremēt, & neuer intermeddled with the gouernment of affaires, thunning the contentions of the Pharises and Sadduces. Their manner of life was like to that of the Monkes; for, either they were not married, or if they were, they abstained from their wiues; hauing their goods in comon, doing such businesses as were inioyned the. They fough: not after riches, voluptuous pleasures, or honors; but digged and delued in gardens, as in a life of solitude, seeking carefully for knowledge in the nature of Plants, and their iuyces, stones and animals, learning their remedies, and exercising Physicke faithfully, which serued more then all other Artes for the life of man.

Moreover, they practised many vertues, as beneficence, patience in visiting sicke persons; such as were not able to helpe themselves, they would feed them, carry them, wash and bathe them, neuer shrinking at grosse sauiors, coming either fro wounds, sweats, or other annoyances. Their cunning, faith & diligence was very commendable, in knowing wel how to prepare medicaments; to know the kindes of diseases; what remedies were apt for them; to know also times & seasons, when physicke ought to be ministred. In briefe, the vertues & welldoing of a learned, industrious and faithfull Physitian appeared in the most of them.

And as it is a good thing, that youth should be instructed in learning, the doctrine of good maners, the Art of Physick, and to accustom their tender spirits to discipline, & the vnderstanding of vertue: euen so in the assembly of the Essæans, the very skillfull were chosen by a certaine number, who instructed many throughout Iudea. For all modest men, & such as thunned the managing of affaires in ciuile dissensions, affected rather to haue their children taught by the doctors of this Sect, then any other, which they held in horror, & would haue no acquaintance with them, seeing them so rempless in the Common-wealth, by their owne particular couetous desires, and continually mouing vnecessary contentions.

The Essæans addicted their life and religion principally to two heads or points, to wit: In calling vpon God in a priuate kind of life, and in honest bodily labours, which were the expulsion of vices, and profitable to other men. And for satisfaction both to the one and other, they had partition of times, so that they might attend on busines till the fifth houre of the day, that is to say, to eleuen houres before midday. Their labor ending at that houre, certain numbers of people (round about) met there together, according to the places distributed to euery one. In this assembly, some passage in Moses and the Prophets was read, the Auncients that sate as Presidents, gaue addition of the exposition: which they would not haue to be written, but retained in the minde, and so transferred to the gouernment of manners, admonishing (according to the exigence of time) what they thought profitable for peace and tranquillitie, for they would haue none of their followers to meddle in the Common-wealth.

After this reading & exposition, they inuoked Gods assistance both in publique & particular. They held those times to be most meet for meditation & prayer, when the body was not charged with meats & fumes, & that inuention is most sprightly in them, whose mindes were fasting from worldly cogitations. Two or 3. houres being employed in reading and prayer, euery one went to supper, or walked in company, or alone by himselfe, according as it stood with his good liking, or as his heart required. The rest of the day, vntill the Euening came, was spent in learned discourse and talking of God, of Plants, of medicaments, and their experience in euery thing: or else of the historie of their owne nation, and what miseries had bene common to them. Before the darke houres of night, they met together againe, and went to prayer.

Now, although the order of their behaviour and actions were wisely gouerned, and many (in their Colledges) liued modestly; yet notwithstanding it came to passe, that some of them (wonne by their owne couetous desires) forgot the Lawes diuine, and (in the neighbouring towns) fell to voluptuous pleasures. But the rigour of each Colledge was such, as if any one had defrauded another, if hee had lied, or had infected himselfe with whoredome: immediately (by common sentence) hee was excommunicated out of the company. For (among them) was kept the most ancient custome of the Synagogue, whereof is spoken in Saint Matthew. Because there might no question be vttered, for instituting any new forme of Iudicature; but the playne ancient fashion, recited as it was giuen by the Fathers, the traces whereof are remaining in the Church.

This policie of the Effæans, comprehended the principall parts of their doctrine, to wit; the study of learning, the exercises of Inuocation, reuerence to their Gouernors, bodily labors, temperance, and modest maners according to the Decalogue, the nourishing of youth; who were instructed in learning, and the Art of Physicke; paines and punishments also appointed for delinquents. Iosephus commended the Colledge of the Effæans, comparing them to the Schoole of Pythagoras. Pliny also makes mention of them in very honorable maner, terming them Effæans, as (since then) diuers other did; for there he speaketh of no other people, but only the Effæans. Hee placeth their dwelling towards the Lake Alphalida, on the west side, not farre from the City of Ptocho, where were the gardens of Balme. It may be, that this place was chosen to study the Art of Physick, as not being the like in all the world, for abounding in all the principall medicines. By this passage of Pliny, and by Iosephus, it appeareth, that the colledge of the Effæans continued to the time of Vespasian: besides, Iosephus re-porteth, that they carried themselves very valiantly in warre.

Now wil we returne to Hyrcanus, who after he had held the gouernement, and the High-priesthood 31 yeares, died, leaving 3. children. Hee was accounted singularly happy in 3. things; to wit, that he had bin so long a time a peaceable prince of the people, and the soueraigne Sacrificer: adding thereto, that he was beleueed to haue the spirit of Prophecie, & knowledge in things to come, by the gift of god.

CHAP. X.

Having briefly discoursed on the 3. severall Sects, of the Pharisees, Sadduces, and Effæans: we go backe againe where we formerly left, to speake of Hyrcanus and his Sonnes.

Iohn Hyrcanus had five sonnes, Aristobolus the first, Antigonus the second; a graue yong man, who in his life time, accompanied with his brother Aristobolus: expelled Antiochus Cyzicenus out of Iudea, and tooke Samaria. The father being dead, his brother also was crowned King. But soone after, when hee had exploited the affaires in Galilee, he went vp to Ierusalem, accompanied with braue Souldiers, to be present at the Feast of Tabernacles. His brother growing suspitious of him, and causing him to be entrapped by his warlike troupes; he was slaine by them neare to the Temple.

Alexander the third, called Iamnes also, had two sons, namely, Hyrcanus the first, Aristobolus the second, Absolon the fourth; being of most milde and peaceable spirit, liued by himselfe priuately. A daughter of his was married to his cousin Aristobolus. The fifth sonne of Hyrcanus is not named at all, and yet was slaine by his brother Alexander: because that (after the death of Aristobolus) he affected the kingdom.

Aristobolus, after the death of his father Hyrcanus, being the first that changed the Principalltie into a dignitie Royall; imposed on himselfe the diademe, and sent also for his brother Antigonus, whom he loued. He put his other three brethren in prison, and that which is much more, he starued his owne mother to death in prison; because she demanded the succession and gouernement of the principalltie, which Hyrcanus had left vnto her on his death-bed.

Afterward, he caused his brother Antigonus to be slaine, he being a braue man, and a bolde warrior, laying diuerse ambushes for him, as hee returned victoriously from Galilee; only because he suspected that he affected the kingdom.

Immediately, beeing highly distasted by this murdering of his brethren, he became seized with a grievous paine in his entrails, and hauing cast vp a great quantitie of blood by vomiting, the Page that carried the Basin from him, fell (accidentally) in the same place, where the ground remained as yet infected with the blood of murdered Antigonus, and there he spilt the cast blood of Aristobolus: which hee vnderstanding, and falling into acknowledgement of the diuine iult vengeance, in excessive torments both of soule and body, yielded vp the ghost. After he had reigned one whole yeare onely, and during which time, hee had augmented the kingdom of Iudea, and constrained the Iherusans to vndergoe Circumcision, hauing formerly vanquished them. He was called Philhellin, because hee vied greatly the familiarity of Pagans.

Alexander, called also Iamnes.

His father Hyrcanus neuer saw him, for as he was in great care about the succession of his children: it was foretold him in his sleepe, that his riches and principalltie, should fall into the power of that new borne babe, whereat hee growing greatly offended, commaunded, that hee should be nursed in Galilee, like to a simple priuate person.

After the death of his father Hyrcanus, he was clapt vp in prison (with his two other brethren) by Aristobolus. But Aristobolus dying at his yeares expiration, hee came to the Crowne, by the means of Alexandra, wife to Aristobolus, to whom he had promised marriage.

Soone after he was crowned King, he slew one of his brethren, who practised nouelties, and entertained the other (named Absolon) honorably, because he was of a peaceful spirit. Then taking order for publicke affaires, hee besieged the citie of Ptolemais round about. The citizens seeing all hope of succour voyde from Syria, in regard of the ciuile warre, which made mighty haucke there; called from Cyprus Ptolemie Lathyrus, expelled by his mother Cleopatra. He coming to them with 3000 men, Alexander retired his army into his country, and dispatched a messenger secretly into Egypt, desiring ayde of Cleopatra against her son Lathyrus. Publickly he capitulated alliance with Lathyrus, promising him 24 tuns of gold, if, expelling the tyrant Zolius, who vsurped Doris and Cæsarea, he would render those Seigneuries to the Lewes.

But Ptolemie being aduertised of Alexanders secret machinations, breaking all alliances, invaded Iudea with his Army, where Alexander mette him with his forces well appoynted, and after a rude encounter, Alexander was put to flight, and lost 30000. of his men. Lathyrus not a little glorying in this victory, made mightie waite in Iudea, sacking & spoyling all places where he came, killing both women and children in euery village; and after he had sliced them in peeces, he caused their limbes to be boyled and eaten by his souldiers, to make them the more terrible to the Lewes. Very soone after, Cleopatra chased this Tyrant out of Iudea, as doubting lest if he should grow any greater, the he would further insult vpon Egypt. Alexander went to visite her at the siege which he maintained before Ptolemais, where he gaue her great gifts: and after he had bin royally welcomed by her, and combined alliance with her, he tooke his way homeward againe.

Much about this time, while Lathyrus returned to Cyprus, and Cleopatra into Egypt, Alexander tooke Gadera, Amathunta and Anhedon, and hauing held a long siege before Gaza, with losse of a great number of his men: finally, by the treason of Lyfismachus, he entred it, & slaying the Citizens most inhumanely, hee rased it to the ground. Nor would he pardon 500. of the principall persons, who labored to yield the city to him but drew them from forth the Temple of Apollo (whereunto they had fled for freedom) to put them to death. But these iocund prosperities were overtaken with a domestick sedition: for, in the Feast of Tabernacles, he was iniured by the people, as vnworthy of the Priestthoode, because hee was borne of a flauie: And hardly it happened, that (in his sacrificing) he was not slayne

by the multitude then about him, who smote him with the boughes and branches, which the Jewes vsed to carry at that Feast. Not a little enraged at this wrong, he called his souldiers together, and entering vpon the vnarmed people, slew about fixe thousand of them: calling diuers strangers from Perſia and Cilicia, to serue as a Guard about his body. Afterward, marching forth with his Army, he vanquished the Moabites and Galaadites, compelling them to pay him tribute.

Shortly after, to his great misfortune, hee encountered with Oboda, King of the Arabians, fell into his ambushes, and his Army being hewen in pieces, hee escaped with much difficulty. Vpon this bad successe, the Pharisees (enraged with hatred against him) tooke occasion to raise the most part of the Jewish people likewise in mislike of him, with whom hee warred (very hardly) fixe whole yeares. For the Jewes that were his aduersaries, drew Demetrius, the Sonne of Gryphus, to oppose his forces with such troops as hee had called from Damas, where hee reigned: against whom Alexander fought to his great losse, for all his strange Souldiers layaine in the field, & hee had no means to saue himselfe, but by flight. Yet, notwithstanding his instant calamity, some of the Jewes were hardened to take his part, in turning requitall vpon Demetrius: and being assisted with some fixe thousand men, he made a small recovery of his former losse.

Now, albeit vpon this victory, Demetrius (perceiuing the revolt of the Jewes) retired his host home into his kingdom: yet notwithstanding, the most part of the Jewes (who were conuined against Alexander) continued in Armes still, whose power Alexander brake by little and little, aswell through industry, as by vertue. And after hee had sped well in some skirmishes, hee shute vp his very mightiest enemies, in the Fort belonging to the Towne of Bethom, which hee enforced with great difficulty, & vsed extreme cruelty vpon his captiues. For he tooke eight hundred of the principal Jewes, causing them all to be crucified, while hee satte banqueting at a Table with his Concubines, and in the presence of all his inuited guests, hauing formerly commaunded their wiues and children to be miserably murdred. The rest (affrighted by this cruel example) fled out of Ierusalem in the night time, being about eight thousand of his enemies.

By this meanes, that dreadfull ciuill warre was appeased, which had continued more then fixe yeares; and wherein, about fifty thousand Jewes were slaine. After these domestick troubles, by continuall courses hee reuenged himselfe on strange aduersaries, who had giuen succour and retreat to the feditious Jewes, winning from them many Townes and Cities. Returning home againe, through his intemperance, hee fell into a Feauer quartane, which held him for the space of three yeares. And yet, hating to abstaine (all this while) from traualle and war, dyed in besiedging a Castle on the Mount of the Gergeſenians, in the nine and fortieth year of his age; of his reigne and Priesthood, the seuen and twenty. Before his death, he left his kingdoms government to his wife Alexandra, and gaue her charge to pacifie the Pharisees, whom he and his Father had offended, vnto their great detriment.

He left two Sons: Hyrcanus & Aristobolus.

Of whom we shall haue leysure to speak heereafter; because first of all, we are to say some what concerning Alexandra, the wife of Alexander Iannes.

Alexandra, wife to Alexander Iannes. After shee had instituted in the High Priesthood her eldest sonne Hyrcanus, who desired nothing more, then to leade a priuate life: shee succeeded in the kingdom after her husband Alexander, being especially aided by the power of the Pharisees, to whom shee gaue authority, to reuocate and erect their ancient traditions, which Hyrcanus (her father in law) had abolished, & granted to them many other fauours beside. So that the Pharisees diminished the whole Regiment of the Kingdom at their owne pleasure; onely the bare name of Queene remained to Alexandra. Finally, as they vnderooke the boldnesse, to execute (vnder colour of iustice) the cheefest Councillors to the deceased King Alexander, who they suspected to haue incited him against the Pharisees Sect: so they proceeded on in many inhumanities. The friends of Alexandra going to Rome with his sonne Aristobolus, obtained (by fauor of the Court)

At this time, Tygranes King of the Parthians, made seizure on the kingdom of Syria; because the Syrian Kings had consumed all their strength and power by domestick warres. And being entred also into Iudea, planted his Campe before the City of Ptolomis: whereof (neuertheless) Queen Alexandra bought the peace by liberrall bounty of gifts. After the taking of Ptolomis, Tygranes returning with his Army to his Countrey: heard newes concerning the victory of Lucullus, and the flight of Mithridates.

Within a while after, Alexandra being fallen into an extreme sicknesse, her Son Aristobolus, taking in ill part the dominion of the Pharisees: fled to the friends of his Father, who had the guarding of the castles, by whose assistance, he got possession of the principall Cities in Iudea. In this feare of the Pharisees, and no great assurance of Aristobolus, who (neuertheless) approached neere with his Army; Alexandra was called out of this life, in the ninth year of her Reigne, and the Lxxv. of her age, which brought peace to the Land of Iudea. But because shee had encreased the power of the Pharisees; it was the reason of many troubles which followed.

The sonnes of Alexander Iannes, and of Alexandra, were (as hath bene said)

Hyrcanus the second.

Aristobolus the second.

Hyrcanus the second, naturally peacefull, and a lover of quietnesse, was entailed by his Mother Alexandra Soueraigne Sacrificer, in the place of his deceased Father. And moreover, after the death of his Mother, by hereditary right he obtained the kingdom. But being vanquished by his Brother Aristobolus in battel, he was glad to saue himselfe in the Fortresse of the Temple; commanded there to leade a priuate life, the kingdom and High Priesthood being quitted to his Brother. For some time hee endured these conditions, but being afterward moued by some accusations, which Antipater the Iudmean (father to Herod) put into his head, as also the frauds and fetches of his brother Aristobolus, hee was induced to flye thence into Arabia, to king Arctas, whom Antipater had won by liberrall promises, to attempt the restitution of Hyrcanus to the kingdom of Iudea.

Arctas invading Iudea with a potent Army, and hauing Aristobolus at the encounter overcame him, and taking the City of Ierusalem, held him so long besiedged in the Temple, vntill by the command of Scaurus, Lieutenant to Pompey, he was forced to retire with his Army into Arabia, and so the enterprize for Hyrcanus proved to none effect. After that Pompey had vanquished Tygranes, & was come into Syria, the two brethren, Hyrcanus and Aristobolus, accused each other before him, touching their right to the Kingdom and High Priesthood. But Pompey, more enclining to the part of Hyrcanus, by the providence and seruices of Antipater; revealed Aristobolus vnder certain conditions. Neuertheless, Aristobolus meaning nothing but mere mockery to all commands, and trusting to the munitions in the City of Ierusalem; Pompey (in reuenge) entred it violently, and won the Temple so strongly defended, where were slaine of the Jewes, about the number of two and twenty thousand, and the City (with the most part of Iudea) rendered tributary to the Romaines. Which tribute they payed for a certaine time, as Iosephus confesseth, amounting to the sum of 10000. Talents, which is 60. Tuns of gold. Pompey hauing walked in the Temple, and entred into the holiest part of all, called Sanctum Sanctorum: at his departing, restored Hyrcanus to the Soueraigne Priesthood, but not the kingdom. Also, he led along with him to Rome, Aristobolus as prisoner, with his two sonnes, Alexander (who neuertheless escaped by the way) and Antigenus, and his two daughters likewise.

Thus Hyrcanus, being possessed of the Soueraigne Priesthood, about foure yeares after the death of his Mother Alexandra, succored Scaurus (left in Iudea with two legions) when hee besiedged Petra, a City of Arabia. Afterward, hee fell into the fauor of other Romain Lieutenants, sent into Iudea onely by the perswasion and friendship of Antipater as with Gabinus, Craſſus, Cassius and Iulius Caesar himselfe, to who hee sent aid, vnder the conduct of Antipater, when he was much hindred in the war of Egypt. And because Antipater had caried himselfe valiantly, Cesar confirmed the High Priesthood to Hyrcanus: & appointed Antipater to be

At the same time also, Cesar permitted

After that Julius Cesar was slaine by the conspirators, a powerfull Iewe, named Malchus, being offended at the encreasing greatness of Antipater the Iudemean, and that the whole administration of affaires should be in his hand; surprized
his life by poisons. But thereupon, Iudea, beeing destitute of so wife and valiant a Gouernour, fell to very miserable condition. For Malchus, tempesting his thoughts with mounting hopes, to become sole maister and commander; was slaine euen in the entrance to his enterprises, by Herode sonne to Antipater, to whom (though he was as yet very young)
his father had giuen the charge of Galilee.
On the other side, the brother of Malchus, desirous to reuenge the death of his brother, theued in the manner of an enemy. Also, Antigonus the captiued son to Aristobolus, escaping from the prisons of Rome: leuying men of arms, made him
selfe maister of a great part of Iudea.

After that Herode had imbarred his proceedings, Antigonus vnder promise of a thousand talents, which value sixe tun-
s of golde, and offiue hundred most noble women; procured Pacorus and Barza-phernes, Satrapes in the Kingdome of Persia, to enter with a maine army into Iudea, to ouerthrow Herode and his brother Phaselus, whom Antionne (one of the three Monarches) had before made Te-rarchs of Iudea. Which beeine done, they should perforce render the kingdom of the Iewes, to the sonnes of Aristobolus.
Pacorus thinking it best, that Herode
should bee surprized rather by subtiltie, then by violence; sent Antigonus on before with some bands of men, to get possession of Ierusalem; and he (in the meane while) would follow with his Armie by Sea, so farre as to Ptolomais, where he had ordered, that Barzaphernes should meete him with a passable Army. Many gaue kind welcomes to Antigonus, running affectionately to him, and promising their ayde against Herode. Neuerthelesse, He-rode and his brother found themselves the stronger in many encounters, not on-

Finally, Antigonus distrusting his forces, called Pacorus into the City, vnder pretence, that (as an Arbitrator) hee should compound the difference for the Principalitie, which was betweene him and Herode, vnder conditions more tolerable: but his purpose was indeede, to surprize Herode vnprouided. Moreo-uer, hee laboured with his vnckle Hyrcanus and Phaselus, worming it so into their heads, to go in embassie to Barzaphernes (remaining in Galilee with his army) and to preuaile so farre with him by rich presents, that he should retriue his power into Syria. To which counsell Hyrcanus
the High-priest, and Phaselus (brother to Herode) yeelding, without suspect of ill, were taken by the Parthians, (euen as the matter was in monopolizing) contrary to the right of Nations, and deliuered as captiues to Antigonus.

Herode being formerly aduertised of these plots and compacts of Antigonus & Pacorus; went forth of the City in the night season, with all his family, some friends, and 800. women, rich and excellent in beautie, and left the persons and their goods in custody of Massada, a well defenced City of Iudmea: which being done, he went thorow Egypt to Rome, euen in the worst time of all the world.

Phaselus, brother to Herode, doubting the cruelty of Antigonus, because he was without armes, and bound; ranne his head (with great violence) diuers times against the wall, and by that means slew himselfe.

Antigonus, not contented with the dis-poyling Hyrcanus of the High-priest-hoode, caused him beside to become deformed, by cutting off his eares, fearing lest he should afterward attaine to the Priesthood againe. For it was not law-full, that any gelded man, or defective in any limbe or member of body, should administer in sacrificing. Moreover, distrusting that he had not sufficiently enough provided for his owne security; hee deli-uered Hyrcanus captiue to the Parthians, to carry him out of Iudea, as farre as possibly they could.

men: which Antigonus formerly had pro-

ty and the pallace royall. And yet not fa-tisfied with this booty, robbed many places about Ierusalem, without leauing any thing behinde them. And after they had ordained Antigonus King of Ierusalem:
they withdrew their armed troups home
into their owne country, leading Hyrcanus
(the soueraigne Sacrificer) along with them captiue.

It was not long after, that Pharases king of the Parthians, beeing informed of the nobilitie whereof he was defended; did set him at libertie, and sent him into Babylon, to be President ouer the Iewes inhabiting there, where, for about five yeares
he was in great honor. But hauing heard, that not onely Herode obtained the kingdome of Iudea, by Augustus Cesar; but also, that he was conioined to him in affinitie, because hee had taken in marriage his Niece Mariana, the daughter of Alexander: he thought on returning him backe againe, promising him mountaines and metuilles, for the goodwill of Herode.

About this time it fortuned, that He-rode, desirous to beget vnto him the courage of the Iewes, whom hee knew to beare great affection to Hyrcanus: repealed him backe by Lettets and Ambassadors, and forthwith sent great Presents to the king of the Parthians, to pay the ransome for his captiuitie. Whereupon, Hyrcanus thinking there would not be any further question of deferring, contrary to the counsell of al the Iews which were in Babylon (who entreated him earnestly to stay there, as fearing that which followed after) returned into Iudea.

Herode welcomed him very magnificently, and (for some time) vied him honourably; euen to the appealing of his father, and often conferring with him on the very principall affaires. Notwithstanding, he would not surrender to him the principality of the high-Priesthood, for the defect of his eares: but, instead of Antigonus (slaine before) substituted a certaine man, named Ananelus, come from Babylon, to enioy the Priesthood. Soone after, he gaue manifest signes of his deadly hatred, against all the posterity of the Asmoneans. As, when (by a close ambush)
he slew Aristobolus, nephew to Hyrcanus, and his most dearly affected wife Maria- na, Niece also to the said Hyrcanus.

Finally, after the ouerthrow of Marke Antonius, one of the 3 chief rulers, to whom Herode had beeene companion, and sent him succors diuers times in war; as some sad thoughts ouertooke him, for feare of Augustus, being Conquerour, and of his aduersaries thorow the country of Iudea, but especially fearing the people (who loued him not) should mutiny by this occasion, & transferre the kingdom of their Ancestors to Hyrcanus (who only remained of the roiall family of the Asmoneans) began to lay snares and clofe contriuing against the life of the miserable old man.
For, he imposed a false crime vpon him,
that hee would haue vsurped the Kingdome: and to make it probable, hee composed counterfeited Lettets; whereupon he being condemned by sentence of the great Consistory, was executed, albeit he was about 80. yeares olde. All his life time was troublesome vnto him, being agitated with infinit accidents of fortune, yet he (naturally) effecting quietnes, and a meane estate. Only herein reprehensible, that he was too facile, in listning to such as hee had him on to the attempting of sond nouelties.

Brother to the aboue named Hyrcanus
the second, and sonne of Alexander:
As young a man as he was, and of hote and liuely spirit, yet notwithstanding, for nine yeares space, he left to his Mother
the administration of the Kingdome, which Alexander (dying) gaue to him, containing himselfe with a priuate life. But at the length, his mother being detained by a long sicknesse, and very dangerous, and he (not a little offended) that all maters were guided according to the fancie of the Pharisees; by stealth made his recourse into the city, and conferred with the friends to his deceased father, who had the keeping of the Castles. Being ay-ded by them in bountifull manner, he gathered an army; by whose assistance, hee possessed himselfe of diuers neighboring places about Ierusalem.

His mother Alexandra dying, vpon
this his preparatiue for warre; Hyrcanus, who all the time of his mother as being the eldest son, made himselfe King by right of inheritance. And to defend his right by Armes, hee went to affront his brother neare to tericho, with an army ordered in good equippage. But being left of his people, who renolted to Aristobulus, vnder hope and perswasion of better recompence; he had no other helpe, but to shield himselfe in the munition of the Temple, where he was for some time besieged by his brother, and finally deliuered, vpon condition, that he should leaue the Kingdome and High-priest hooide to his brother, and leade a priuate life by himselfe.

Some while after, hee conueyed himselfe courtly into Arabia, by the perswasion of Antipater; as hoping to regaine the Kingdome from his brother, by the meanes of king Aretas. Aristobulus knowing the comming of Aretas, King of the Arabians, with Hyrcanus and Antipater, went forth to meete them: and being vanquished in a day of warre triall, hardly fled backe againe to Jerusalem, where hee was (for a time) besieged by the enemies, that closely followed his footing, vntill such time, as hauing promised 300. talents to Scaurus, Lieutenant to Pompey, he prauailed thereby so well, that Scaurus sending in the name of the Roman people to Aretas, commanded him to auoyd out of Iudea, except hee would be enemy to the Romans. By this meanes the siege was raised; and Aristobulus, desirous to be reuenged, assembled men, and made warre vpon the Arabes, of whom he slew fixe thousand in one fight.

While these things were thus in working, Pompey, hauing pacified the East parts, came to Damas, where Aristobulus sent him a magnificent Present, accusing his brother Hyrcanus very strongly to be a perturbur of the common peace. Pompey heereupon appointed, that at the Spring time, both the brethren should be personally present, before him at Damas. Where Pompey vnderstanding the difference betweene them, was more inclined to the case of Hyrcanus; as well for the equitie of his cause, as for his loue vnto Antipater. Neuertheless, he suffered Aristobulus to depart, vnder conditions, which he cared not to keep, but (by machinations) made a mockerie at the matters commanded him; and (indeed) did nothing at all. Heereat Pompey being highly offended, entred into Iudea, with the Army which he had brought against the Arabian * Nabatheans. And because Aristobulus had againe mocked Gabinus, one of the Lieutenants to Pompey, not furnishing him (according to promise) concerning the deliuering of certaine summes of money: Pompey being much incensed by the disloyalty of Aristobulus, brought his Army and Engins before Jerusalem, and because the Iews would not yield themselves, he tooke the Cittie by force, ayded by the counsell of Hyrcanus, on the fasting day of the third month before Pentecost; and in the year when Marcus Tullius Cicero confounded the Conspiracie of Cataline in Rome.

In the surprizall of the City two and twenty thousand Iewes were slaine by the Souldiers, and Pompey (with his friends) entred into the place called Sanctum Sanctorum, and intruded to see such things as were not lawfull, but onely for the Soueraign Sacrificer. And vnderstanding that there were great summes of Golde and gold money in the Treasury, and twelue tunns of siluer coyne; without taking anie thing, he departed thence, and commanded the place to be purified againe. Hee restored Hyrcanus to the high-priesthood, and caused the authors of the warre to be beheaded, who had bene motiues to the rebellion of Aristobulus. Afterward, he demolished the walles of Jerusalem, and made all Iudea tributarie to the Romaine people. Also he adiudged to the Empire of Rome, the Citties and Townes of the Asmoneans, which were takē before from the Kings of Syria: restoring also such to libertie, as in times past had liued in freedom. By this meanes hee locked vp the nation of the Iews within narrow limits, that before had extended their dominion very farre.

At his departure, hee left two legions in Iudea, vnder the conduction of Scaurus, taking Aristobulus captiue, with Alexander and Antigonus his two sonnes, to leade them home in triumph: but Alexander (hauing deceived his keepers) escaped by the way. Here was the beginning of the seruitude of the Iewish nation, who were thus enthralled to the power of the Romaines. The discord of two brethren gaue the first occasion of this calamitie: three-three score yeares before the natiuitie of Christ; foure yeares before that Aristobulus (his Mother dead, and his Brother Hyrcanus deiected from the seate Royall) had taken the Kingdome of Iudea. Saint Ierome writeth, that Jakin, father to the euer-blessed Virgin Marie, was borne the same year that Jerusalem was surprized.

I thought it fit also, to insert heere the sad issue and successe of Pompey, considering, that it seemed to be done diuinely, that hee should be murdered face to face the place which hee had profaned, as well by effusion of bloud, as by foolish audaciousness. For, foureteene yeares after the taking of Jerusalem, being vanquished by Cesar in the battaile of Pharsalia, and thinking to saue himselfe, by flying to the Sonne of Ptolomie the Fleutster, whom he had recommended to the Romaine Senate, when he was chased and banished out of his Kingdome neare to * Pelusium, coming forth of a small Barke, and aged about three score yeares; he was slaine by the command of King Ptolomy, in the presence of his wife Cornelia. And, as it is thought, Virgill wrote these verses on his death:

*A great Trunk lying vpon the Sea shore,
A bodie without head; a head lying Farre from the shoulders.*

Pelusium is distant from Jerusalem, a little more then thirtie Germane miles, but iust confronting it, according to the calculation of Ptolomie. Seauen yeares after the surprizing of Jerusalem, Aristobulus, being escaped from imprisonment at Rome; came into Iudea with his other Sonne Antigonus; where againe he fortified the Port of Alexandria, which Gabinus had destroyed. Many Iewes (affecting nouelties) ranne to him, so that being accompanied with eight thousand chosen men, hee dared to encounter with the Romaines, which Gabinus (then Proconfull for Syria) conducted, who, but a little before, constrained Alexander, the other sonne of Aristobulus (thinking to possess himselfe of the kingdome) to deliuer him vp those Fortresses, and to craue peace. But Aristobulus, sustaining the worst in a sharpe fight, retired with two bands of men, into the most strong towne of Macheron, situated on the Lake Asphalitis, somewhat a little lower then the place where Iordaine entrench into it. In which towne Saint Iohn Baptist, being a long while imprisoned, was finally beheaded. In two dayes the Romaines conquered the towne perforce, and Aristobulus taken, was led to Gabinus, wounded as he was; and so the second time sent bound to Rome, with his two children.

Matters thus pacified in Iudea, Gabinus, attended by his Gendarmery, resealed Ptolomie the Fleutster in his Kingdome, he being expelled thence by them of Alexandria; in which exploit he was assisted by Hyrcanus the soueraigne Sacrificer, and Antipater the Idumean. At his returne, he found all in Iudea and Syria full of troubles and tempests, for Alexander rauaged againe throughout Iudea: but Gabinus ouercame him in a day of battell (where he had worke enough to doe) and chased him quite out of Iudea; hauing massacred ten thousand Iewes.

Afterwards hee continued two yeares in the Prouince, governing all matters quietly, according to the testimony of Iosephus. And hauing repayed many Townes, which had bene much spoiled in the precedent warre; he left the Army in the power of Marcus Crassus, a verie greedy and couetous man, who attempting warre against the Partians, arrived there in Syria, in the year after his second Consulship, one and fiftie yeares before the birth of Christ.

This man hauing intelligence, that there was a great masse of money locked vp in the Temple of the Iewes, went to Jerusalem; and was admitted to the most secret place of the Temple; from whence (contrary to his former faithfull promise) hee carried away more then ten thousand talents, that is to say, three score tunnes of golde; beside a beame of gold, which weighed three hundred Minaes, or (as Iosephus expoundeth it) seven hundred and fifty Romaine pounds weight, amounting to five Quintalles and more then an halfe of our weight. Eleazar, Guardian of the Temple, deliuered that beame to Crassus very willingly, because he had promised and protested by oathe, that hee would not touch any treasure of the Temple, nor more then Pompey had done tenne yeares before.

Now, concerning this avaritious Proconsull, soone after, hee dearly payed for his wilfull periury and sacrilege; being miserably miserably slaine by the Parthians, with his son Publius, an excellent towardsly yong man, and wel-near thirty thousand Romaines, that rather would bee slaine, then taken; Crassus was then threecore yeares of age.

In the meane while, one Pitholus, a very powerfull Jew, and friend to Aristobulus the captiue; after his second surprizall, beganne to raise tumults in Iudea, and weakened the side of Hyrcanus and Antipater. But after the ouerthrow of the Romaines by the Parthians, when Cassius, Questor to Crassus, re-assembled the rest of the Romaine Armie, who had fled away, and brought them backe into Syria, and as he ranfacked the Cities of Iudea for want of mony: he was perwaded by Antipater and Hyrcanus the High-priest, to make triall of his forces against Pitholus, whom he vanquished in the field of battell, and brought him captiue with the Romaine army into Syria, so that thereon ensued peace in Iudea for some time.

Five yeares after, the warre was kindled betweene Cesar and Pompey; and Cesar coming to Rome (forlaken of Pompey) tooke Aristobulus out of prison, and sent him into the East with two Legions, to subdue Syria & Iudea. But being poisoned by the way, by them that tooke part with Pompey: hee remayned long time in the Ile of Malta vnburi'd, vntill Marke Anthony, one of the three Monarchs, sent his body into Iudea, and commanded that he should be interred in the Sepulchre of Kings.

Such was the end of Aristobulus, after many mutations of fortune, hauing been twice taken and sent to Rome, where hee was almost foureteeen yeares prisoner. He was of a factious and seditious spirit, for being moued with ambition, he quarrelled for the kingdome of Iudea with his brother Hyrcanus: vntill such time as hee caused his death, and brought his Countrey into miserable seruitude, which procured the ruine of all his nation.

He had two sons, and as many daughters; Hyrcanus the second his first sonne, soueraigne Sacrificer, who had a daughter named Alexandra, married to his cousin Alexander: a woman wife, but very vehement, whom Herode afterward put to death. Aristobulus the second had Alexander, Antigonus the second, Alex- andra. First married to Philippion, sonne to Ptolomy, king of Chalcis, which is a Region on the coast of Libanus. Afterward, Ptolomie (inflamed with the loue of his daughter in lawe) slew his sonne Philippion, and tooke her in marriage. And after succoured and defended his brother Antigonus, against Herode and the Romaines.

Alexander the second.

Surprized with his father Aristobulus by Pompey; before he arrived at Rome, deceived his guardes, and escaped. Five yeares after, assisted by an Armie, hee invaded Iudea, expelled his vnckle Hyrcanus from Ierusalem, repayed the destroyed munitions, and planted there a Garrison. But Gabinus, Proconsull of Syria, being called thereto by Hyrcanus and Antipater, hauing fought with him in battell; held him a long time besieged in the City of Alexandria, vntill such time as he was constrained to yeeld himselfe, and put downe the chieftest fortifications. Being pacified by the entreaties of Alexanders mother (who alwayes condemned the foolish enterprises of her sonne against the Romaines) hee obtained pardon for Alexander. Neuerthelesse, Gabinus sent him to Rome with his father Aristobulus, and Antigonus his brother captiues: yet writing to the Senate, that it might stand with their good liking, to send backe the children of Aristobulus to their mother, because he had made such a promise in name of the Senate; in regard that that valiant woman, had euermore takē good part with the Romaines.

The Senate was willing heerein to gratifie Gabinus; but Alexander, being returned into Iudea; returned bad recompence to Gabinus, and the Senate, for the great grace which they had granted him. For, seeing Gabinus to be hindred in Egypt, by much trouble (as hath already beene said) being fauoured with thirty thousand men: againe he stroue to subiuagate Iudea, and cruelly murdered all the Romaine Souldiers, that he could finde in the garrisons of the surprized Cities. For which cruelty, hee payed the iust punishment about faine yeares after.

Gabinus being returned into Iudea, laboured first to appease these matters with Antipater: but no way preuayling, he vniited the forces of the Romaine Armies, giuing

uing a violent and dangerous encounter to Alexander, wherein ten thousand Iewes lost their liues, and the rest driuen all in rout. Alexander struiuing to saue himselfe, and seeing his attempts so often times frustrated, and his forces broken; lay close hidden for a while, vntill he vnderstoode, that ciuile warre was kindled betweene Pompey and Cesar, and his father Aristobulus (deliuered out of prison) came thither with two legions. Then he bestirred himselfe to leuy Souldiers also; but was taken in Syria, euen vpon the very beginning of his enterprife, and led to Antioche to Scipio. Before him the Romaines accused him of cruelty, which he had vsed against the Romaine Souldiers in the Garrisons: wherevpon, by Commaund receiued from Pompey, hee was beheaded before Scipio, who then helde Syria, some few monthes after the death of his father Aristobulus; forty sixe yeares before the Natiuitie of Christ; and the selfe same yeare as Pompey was slaine in Egypt, as hath bin said.

This Alexander had these children by Alexandra, daughter to Hyrcanus the second.

Aristobulus the third,
And
Mariana, whom Herod after espoused

But we shall speake hereafter of Alexanders children, because I am desirous first to relate somewhat, concerning the Actions & fortunes of his brother Antigonus.

Antigonus, the last sonne to Aristobulus the 2. was twice taken with his father, and sent to Rome: once by Pompey, and another time by Gabinus. But then (by the fauour of the Senate) he was returned into Iudea with his brother Alexander; & spent some time with his Mother in the City of Ascalon. Then hee went to Ptolomy, (Lord of Chalcis) his kinseman, who refused to assist the fool-hardy and vnhappy attempts of his brother Alexander, for feare of the Romaines. But after the death of his father and brother, when as Iulius Cesar had finished the war of Alexandria, & was come into Spain: he presented himselfe before him in al humility, and made a great complaint, aswell of the pittifull ouerthrow of his father Aristobulus, as also of his brother ther Alexander, both being cruelly slaine by the partakers with Pompey.

He further proceeded, and taxed Antipater with vniust gouerning, who beeing but of a meane descent, and a stranger: had (neuerthelesse) vsurped the kingdome of the Iewes, and had left nothing to Hyrcanus, but the silly name of Soueraigne Sacrificer, doing all at his owne pleasure, to establish the power of his children, and pretending to take away the principallitie from the Iewish: the people (of the royall family of the Asmoneans) thereby to transfere it to his Sonnes. He said, that himselfe was the onely man left, to whom the Lawfull succession of the kingdome appertained; who notwithstanding, being spoiled of his hereditarie dignity, was forced to wander as a vagabond, a banished man and left to all distresse. Concluding finally with humble intercessions, hee requested, that the administration of the Iewish principality might be restored to him, and Antipater dismissed.

Whereunto Antipater answering, began to accuse Aristobulus and his sonnes before Cesar, because (contrary to all right and equity) he had violently rent the kingdome from Hyrcanus his eldest brother, and alwayes beene disloyall and an enemy to the Romaines: wherein, his sons had well followed his example, filling Iudea and Syria with tumults and blood: that being the maine reason, why Aristobulus was so long detained prisoner, and Alexander had his head smitten from his shoulders, for the cruelties he vsed to the Romaines. Afterward, hee procured faithfull witnesses, how modestly he had carried himselfe in gouerning, and what fauours hee had euer extended to the Romaine Capitaines. Cesar beeing thereto moued by these iust causes, licenced Antigonus to depart, and confirmed the High-priesthoode to Hyrcanus; and ennobling Antipater with new titles of Dignity; he constituted him Tutor of all Iudea.

Antigonus much displeased with this refusal, returned to his kinseman the king of Chalcis, where he contayned himselfe almost foure yeares space, vntill Iulius Cesar was murdered by the Conspiratours. For then, when all the world was vp in mutinie, and that Cassius (who was foraging in Syria, impeaching the warre against Marke Anthony) had retired the Romaine Armies out of Syria: Antigonus, assisted by his kinsman Ptolomy, and other

Some yeares after, when Anthony one of the three Monarchs, had encreased the power of Herode, hauing ordaind him (with his brother Phaselus) Tetrarches of all Iudea: Antigonus enraged with anger, thought it not tollerable, that the kingdome of Iudea should bee deuolued vnto strangers in this manner. Wherefore, to leuy a new Armie, hee had found out a yong man of a fiery temper, named Lysanius, his kinsman and hoste; into whose hand the kingdome of Chalcis was fallen, by the death of his father Ptolomy, vnto whom (as hath afore bene sayd) Alexandra, the Sister of Antigonus, was giuen in marriage. As they were working vpon these conclusions, another occasion (very apt and opportune) offered it selfe, because (as then) the Parthians insulted ouer the Prouince of Syria, vnder the conduct of Pacorus and Barsaphernes. Lysanius hauing sent great presents to them, and a thousand Talents promised by Antigonus, as also fise hundred women, excellen in nobility and beauty; they were hereby incited, to releate Antigonus in possession of his fathers kingdome.

What cannot

Before, in the life of Hyrcanus, we haue expressed the stratagem of the barbarous people, to surprize Hyrcanus and Phaselus (being Ambassadors) captiues, and how wickedly Antigonus did cut off his vnckles eares, sending him also captiue into Parthia, to the end, that hee might the more safely enioy the High-priesthood and the Kingdome. But this authoritie, gotten by such wicked cunning and practises, could not keepe firme, or last any long while. For soone after, Herode going to Rome, declared there to Marke Anthony, his fight and calamitie, complaining on the outrages and disloyaltie of Antigonus. In briebe, hee sped so well in his purpose, that instead of Tetrarch, he was proclaimed King of all Iudea, by consent of Augustus, Anthony and the Senate, and Antigonus adiudged enemy to the people of Rome. And although some Romane Capitaines, being sent with Legions into Syria, had charge to expulse Antigonus, and

At length, Anthony vndertaking warre against the Parthians, Sofius was sent into Iudea with a potent Army, to replant Herode; wherefore he and Herode, their forces being ioyned together, besieged some few moneths the Cittie of Ierusalem. Finally, they tooke it by force, the seuenth yeare after the death of Caesar, or of the Empire of O. Iulius Augustus, and the selfe same day that Pompey (seauen yeares before) had taken it.

At that time, as the Souldiers (indifferently on either side) slew and murdered one another, without sparing cyther age or sexe: Antigonus, not able to endure the sight of such a slaughter among the Citizens, came willingly forth of the munitions of the Temple, and fell before the feete of Sofius the Romane Capraine, crauing pardon for his offences, and desiring (aboue all else) that hee would remit the common people, who were no warriors, and to spare the Temple. But the proud Conquerour, making a mockerie of the suppliant King, called him oftentimes (in derision) Antigonus, and after sent him captiue into Syria to Anthony, who was returned from the warre of the Parthians.

Herode sup-

thonus; who keeth his death

Herode being possessed of the whole Kingdome, was aduertised, that Anthony purposed to leade Antigonus with him in triumph to Rome. And fearing withall, that in due consideration of his nobilitie, or in compassion of his miserie, Augustus and the Senate would free him from imprisonment, and send him backe agayne into Iudea: with much ado, he obtained of Anthony, by many reasons alledged, and great gifts bestowd, that Antigonus was staine.

The principal argument that made Anthony yeelde thereto, beyond all others, was, that Iudea would neuer be peaceable, so long as Antigonus liued. Considering, that many Iewes were so displeased by being subiects to him; as it was not possible, by horrible and extreamest torments, to force them acknowledge him the name of King. And therefore hee conceiued, that there would neuer want companions in seditions and mutinies, where such a Commander as Antigonus should beare rule,

And thus Antigonus the last King of the Asmoneans, was slaine by the Romains in Antioche, after that Herode had expulsed him, and led away his vnckle Hyrcanus hauing obtained about fise yeares the kingdome of Iudea, by helpe of the Parthians: twelue yeares after the death of his father Aristobolus, and of his brother Alexander; thirty foure yeares also before the Natiuitie of Iesus Christ our Saviour.

Afterward, the Principalltie of the Iewish people, taken from the Sacerdottall Familie of the Asmoneans, and especially, from the nation of the Iewes: fell into the hand of Herode the sonne of Antipater the Ismenian, and of his sonnes, and sonnes sonnes. So that from the first yeare of Iudas Machabeus, whom his Father Mattathias (dying) appoynted Duke of the warlike troupes, vntill this yeare that Herode beganne to reigne, after the taking in of Ierusalem, and death of Antigonus, was an hundred and thirty yeares. Antigonus left not any heire male, but only one daughter, who afterward was wife to Antipater, the sonne of Herode. But his brother Alexander, by Alexandra, the daughter to Hyrcanus, had these children.

Herode being fully confirmed in the kingdome, would not establish in the hie-priesthood, his brother in law Hyrcanus, reuoked from his banishment in Babylon: as fearing to contrary the Lawe of God, that denied imperfect or dismembered people, to minister in the holy Temple, and such a one was the care-lesse Hyrcanus; but exalted to the dignitie of Soueraigne Sacrificer, another Iew of meane condition, named Ananelus, who was lately come from Babylon. Alexandra daughter to Hyrcanus, taking it to heart, that Herode made none account of her father, nor of her sonne Aristobolus, but had conferred the high-priesthood vpon a strange man; laboured by letters and gifts, to incite Cleopatra, that by the means of Marke Anthony, the High-priesthood might be conferred vpon her sonne Aristobolus.

Herode hauing intelligence hereof, & receiuing letters from Anthony, where-by he was charged to send him Aristobolus; fearing lest Anthony (although a wicked minded man) would be inueigled with the beautie of the youth, and iudge him, not onely worthy of the Priestthoode, but likewise of some portion in the kingdome, made a modest denyall to Anthony, vnder colour, that if Aristobolus should be sent out of Iudea, it would be the occasion of many mutinies to arise in the kingdome, as in hope to enioy a new King: Neuerthelesse, to pacifie Alexandra and Mariana, who hee sawe trauelled so earnestly on the behalfe of Aristobolus, and to the end, they should compasse no more contriuings, with working new cales to Anthony and Cleopatra: of his owne goodwill, hee deposed Ananelus from the High-priesthood, and inuested therein Aristobolus: Notwithstanding, being highly offended against his mother Alexandra, for working such close and vnder-hand practises: he gaue order, that shee should be arrested, and more warily attended within the Pallace, because (hereafter) she should not attempt any thing in the like maner.

Shee being a Lady of great resolute, scorned this suspition and distrust in the King, holding it most dishonourable in him, to be so watchfully kept and obserued: by a saythfull and secret Messenger, signified all her misfortunes to Cleopatra; who againe commaunded, that Alexandra, accompanied with her sonne Aristobolus, should be sent to her in Egypt.

To compasse her intent the more cunningly, Alexandra had caused two Coffins and Beeres to be prepared, such as the dead are vsed to be carried vpon into buriall: wherein shee and her sonne should be carried to the Sea side; and there a Shippe attended ready for them, for transporting them thence to Cleopatra.

The subtilie
deuise of Alexandra, to escape from the custodie
of Herode.

Alexandra imparted this deuice of her owne wit, to a certayne Courtier, named Sabbion, whome shee knew to be farre out of fauour with Herode: because hee stood suspected as one consenting to the death of Antipater, father to Herode, who formerly had bene poysoned; and therefore shee made no doubt, but Sabbion would bee the more fire and secret, in furthering of her escape from thence.

But hee considering, that now hee had an apt occasion thrust euen into his hand, whereby to treade downe the conceiued suspicion of poysoning, and make good prooue of his loyalty to the King; declared the whole intent and purpose vnto him, and how it was to be perfourmed.

Especially Spies and Guardes were appointed, to take knowledge of anie appearing accident, but most of all, when the Coffins and Beeres, should be transported away, and in such artificiall order euery thing was carried: that Alexandra and her Sonne were both surprized, euen in the very bearing thence in the Beeres. Sharpe and seuer threatnings were vttered by the King, to the no small affliction of Alexandra and Aristobolus, to be so treacherously preuented in the verie height of all their hopes: yet pretending pittie and commiseration, hee promised his free and gracious pardon for this offence, provided, that (afterward) they should not practise any such attempt againe.

This clemencie hee then vsed, fearing lest if he should haue inflicted any other execution on them: hee might thereby runne into the displeasure of Cleopatra, who was consenting to the manner of their escape. And yet hee would gladly haue punished this feminine boldnesse in her, but (about all) faine he would haue Aristobolus dispatched out of the way: because hee was the High-priest, and highly affected of the people, in regard of his Royall descent, and many singuler graces in him.

In the proiecting of these wicked deuices, it chanced to be the Feast of Tabernacles, when Aristobolus, being richly adorned in his Priestly garments, performed the office of soueraigne Sacrificer, with such extraordinary grauitie and decencie: that both in respect of his age, stature, and beautie of body, he appeared wonderfully pleasing in euery eye, so that the people standing about him, shewed out aloude with ioy, applauding euery gesture, and any thing that hee did or said, with clapping their hands, expressing the fauour and inclination of all the people to Aristobolus, and what desire they had, to enioy a King of their owne Nation, in regard that their hatred to the present estate of the Kingdome, therein plainly appeared.

Herode ill digressing this loue to his enemy, which he imagined would increase daily more and more; began to seeke into all contriuings, whereby he might (forthwith) compass the death of Aristobolus. And it came to passe, that the Feast being ended, Alexandra seasted him in the citie of Jericho, as hoping to qualifie all displeasure in the King. Herod there shewed him selfe so chearefull and gracious to the women, as possibly might be, and (about all) to the youthfull Lord,) so that the whole day was spent in sports and delights of diuers kindes. At euening, Aristobolus walked with his company in the Kings Garden, where (after he had somewhat extraordinarily heard himselfe with running and leaping) the Guard of Herode, there to appointed by the King, prouoked Aristobolus, to coole his sweating by swimming in a fish-pond neare adioyning.

Such was his gentle & flexible nature, and no way suspicious of anie intended treacherie, as hee was thereto soone perswaded. And as he came swimming neere to the bankes side: they threw water on him in ieausting manner, holding his head diuers times vnder water, vntill at last he was quite stifled thereby, while Herode (walking by himselfe alone) seemed not to thinke on any such matter. But when one of the guard came, and informed him thereof, and in what maner it happened, without any mallice intended towards him: one while hee grieved, another while raged, threatening the guard with death, for being so ouerbold with him. Before the Mother and Sister of Aristobolus, he presented himselfe in most woollmaner, wringing his hands, and tearing the haire from his head, as if he had truly mourned for the Princes death; preparing a most magnificent funerall for him, and whereat there wanted no cost and pompe. By this hellish fraude in Herode, was Aristobolus the third innocently murdered, aged 18. yeares; and after hee had one yeare enioyed the High-priesthood, which Herod restored Ananias againe vnto, Hyrcanus the second, yet liuing, who remayned the onely male of the Asmonean race, and was Mariana.

Sister to this Aristobolus, daughter to the second Alexander, the youngest sonne of the second Hyrcanus, was most excellent both for beauty and chastity. Herode espoused her, after he was declared King by the Romanes, a little before the surprising of Ierusalem, and the death of Antigonus: hee hauing repudiated his wife Doris of Idumea, by whome hee had a sonne named Antipater. This diuorce was the cause, that Mariana was continually in the dislike of Cypri, mother to the King, of his sister Salome, and of some other women beside. Her selfe also (afterward) encreased this hatred, because she, standing vpon the Nobilitie of her race, being issued and descended from Kings: despised the Mother and Sister to the King, they being strangers, and deriued but from meane condition.

It may be, that shee grew the lesse familiar with the King, acquainting herselfe but seldom in his company; because hee had taken the Kingdome of Iudea from her father Alexander, and put to death her vnckle Antigonus, and had also (by treason) murdered her brother Aristobolus the third, a worthy innocent young Prince: Adding withall, that hee had executed her grandfather Hyrcanus, a good olde man, imposing vpon him, that hee affected the Kingdome. It was no great matter of maruell then, if this noble and high spirited woman, disdained amiable conuersation with him, who had giuen her so many occasions of extreme affliction; considering also, that the cares of this young Lady were daily pestered, with shamefull injuries and complaints, which her Mother Alexandra continually made against the house of Antipater.

Finally, she grew to be suspected by the King, for matter of adultery (as I shall hereafter more at large relate in the life of Herod.) And Salome the Kings sister, confederated with other Ladies of the Court (abounding in hatred more and more against her) maintayned strongly the suspicion; adding moreover, an intent of poysoning him. Wherein she taking no care to cleare herselfe, relying vpon Herodes intimate loue vnto her, and her owne innocencie: shee was accused by Herode before his friends, and layne by the sentence of them. Shee left five children liuing, which shee had by Herode, three sonnes, and two daughters, of whom afterward came the two Agrippas, to whom the Royall power in Iudea remayned, vntill the destruction of Ierusalem.

All the other race of Herode, which hee had by nine other wiues, and in great number, layed, as shall be declared, in their due places.

Almost all the whole family of the Asmoneans, being thus expresse, there remaineth now for me, that I should write of the posteritie of Antipater: but Alexandra yet resteth of the Asmoneans, who was daughter to the second Hyrcanus, and wife to the second Alexander. And although we haue already sayd somewhat of her, and are yet to speake of the actions of Herode: yet notwithstanding, I haue thought good to descipher heere summarily, the wooll misadventures of this Lady: for, amongst all other miserable women that we reade of, she seemeth to me the most vnfurnate, as well by accident, as thorow her owne defects. And that they may be the better vnderstood, I haue in order here inserted her parentage.

First of all, this Alexandra being but a young maid, saw, after the death of Alexandra her grandmother (who reigned but nine yeares after the decesse of her husband) the hereditarie Kingdome and High-priesthood, taken perforce from her father Hyrcanus, by his brother Aristobolus, who had long time besieged him in the munition of the Temple.

Afterward, being very young, she was married to his cosin Alexander; and the Citie of Ierusalem being surprized by Pompey: she saw the pittifull fortune of her father, most vnhappy performed, to the great harme of the country and her selfe, being accomplished with horrible massacres, foule prophanation of the Temple, slaughter of infinite Citizens, beside robberies of their goods. Moreouer, the destruction of the Cittie walles, insupportable exactions, with a perpetuall yoke of most seuerer dominion of the Romaines: beside the captiuitie and transport of her vnckle Aristobolus, her husband Alexander, and her cosin Antigonius, to be led villainously (in derision) through the Citie of Rome, to grace Pompeys triumph. No doubt but these mighty misfortunes, were causes of no meane griefe to Alexandra.

Shee likewise beheld the escape of her husband Alexander by the way, who came to make new tumults in Judea: but being ouerthrowne in many encounters, and beside depoyled of all enabling forces: the sawe him againe sent captiue to Rome by Gabinus, with his father Aristobolus, and his brother Antigonius.

Againe, shee sawe him sent into Judea, where growing as tempestuous and troublefome as before: he was agayne chased out of the Countreys limits, wandering from thence as a poore vagabond and banished man. At length, he heard that (by the command of Pompey) he was shamefully executed at Antioche, and that (but a little before) his father Aristobolus, after a long detention of his person, being (with great difficulty) deliuered from imprisonment, was poysoned.

Next, shee sawe the Cittie of Ierusalem taken by the Parthians treacherie, and her father Hyrcauus (by fraude and deceit in Aristobolus) apprehended, his ears cut off, and led away into the enemies land. Shee, in this perillous surprisall of Ierusalem, got forth by night with her Mother, the wife, the siter of Herode, and many other Ladies, hauing her son with her, aged a dozen yeares, and her daughter little more then he: but both exposed to infinite injuries, as well of Souldiers violence, as of great wrongs to their tender yeares, the barbarous people spoyling and rauishing all wherefoeuer they came.

From thence she was sent (with the other Ladies) to a strong fortresse in the Citie of Masada in Iudaea, in great feare and danger of Antigonius, then reigning: where shee remayned about two yeares, vntill such time as Herode (hauing obtained the title of King by the Romaines) returned into Judea; and finding there his power to be strongest, deliuered her and the rest from imprisonment.

A third time also she sawe the Citie of Ierusalem taken, ransacked, and filled with murders, by the Souldiers of Herode and Sofius: her cosin Antigonius led prisoner to Marke Anthony, and afterward put to execution.

Alexandra sawe and felt all these extremities, before the Kingdome of Herode could be confirmed: which being once effected, she likewise beganne to breathe, seeming fully acquitted from all calamities. Nay, which is more, she might haue seeld hir estate in the height of happines, if shee could haue made vse of Fortunes fauours, as they showed themselves in plentifull manner vpon her.

For Herode being King, had diuorced his first wife Doris, and deleated his sonne Antipater, from all hope of succeeding after him; hauing married Mariana, the daughter of Alexandra, whom hee most singularly affected, as wel for her beautie, as many other graces of spirit wherewith she was plentifully endowed. Hereupon ensued, that her Mother Alexandra, being called to the Court, was worthily respected, and had great credite with the King and all other. Her Father Hyrcauus also (already returned from exile) was reuoked home into his countrey: to him Herode, and the rest (by the Kings example) yielded great honour, as vnto their Father.

But Alexandra ouerthrew all this happines, by her vehement ambition, fierceneffe and impatience; so that (at length) she became to be enuelped with mighty calamities, and was the cause of her owne death. For, taking in high displeasure, that Ananels was authorized with the High-priesthood, without any regard of her sonne Aristobolus, to whom it appertained by hereditarie right: she grew to machinate many dangerous matters, to exalt her sonne to that dignitie of the Priesthood, procuring (by the meanes of Cleopatra) to incite Marke Anthony against Herode. Which being discouered, the yet attayned the felicitie, that her son was made soueraigne Sacrificer: but her selfe was not in so noble estate as before, because shee was heedefully guarded, as one dangerously enclined, and much suspected by the king.

She, not able to endure this intollerable rigor of the King, being shut vp from the vse of her libertie; practised secretly to escape to Cleopatra, as hath already bin said, and being taken with her sonne in the very act, wel vnderstood, that she was then runne into the vnrrecoverable hatred of Herode. Shortly after, the extreame sorrow she suffered, to see her sonne Aristobolus so treacherously murdered, might well haue admonished her: that it much better auayled, to conquer Iniurie by Patience, then roughly to wastle with a Kings courage, naturally addicted to wickednesse.

Then againe, bringing Herode into danger, by accusing him before Anthony, for the murdering of her sonne: shee won nothing thereby, but much more contempt and hatred in the King. Inasmuch, that her daughter (otherwise choicely cherished by the King) found his affection to waxe coole; but not without cause and suspition, in regarde of her Mothers cunning contriuings. Adding withall, that her father Hyrcauus was not so much honoured, neither respected by the king, as he was wont to be. Whereby Alexandra tooke occasion, to incite her father against Herode, aduising him to flie to Malichus, King of the Arabians, euen then, when (after the battaile of Actium) the King was in great danger, standing then in no meane feare, because Augustus was Conquerour. For the wily woman did thinke, that if shee could procure displeasure in Augustus against Herode, for his friendship to Marke Anthony; the Scepter would be taken from the Iudmean, and restored to the true heires of the house of the Asmoneans.

This vnhappy counsell being discouered, by the meanes of intercepted letters; was the cause of putting to death the good olde Hyrcauus, aged foure score yeares, and bringing Alexandra into the very depth of sorrowes. Neuertheless, her stomak broken with so many wounds; and, euen hardened (as it were) against all grieuances whatsoever, was scarcely sensible of any of these oppressions; after the losse of so many neare kinned, dispatched by diuers kindes of strange and vnworthy deaths. Among whom, her husband Alexander, and Antigonius his Brother were beheaded. Her vnckle Aristobolus, who was likewise her father in law, was poysoned: her onely sonne Aristobolus trayterously drowned, by the procurement of Herode. Her father Hyrcauus (so neare to his graue) dispatched by an ignominious infliction.

Her onely daughter Mariana remayned, who being married to the King, might somewhat comfort her in these extremities. But this violent woman, swelling in hatred against the King, declared herselfe most strangely troublefome vnto her husband, by continuall reproaching the Iudmean house, and complying of the Kings horrible cruelties: So that, after she became to be suspected of adulterie; and a false crime imposed on her, that shee practised to poison her husband: Herode was the easier wonne to her death, albeit hee loued her intirely, and shee had borne him five children.

Now, notwithstanding so great calamitie, in the miserable & vnworthy death of her daughters; Alexandra could not yet be conquered, neyther vnderstand, how many incumbrances her attempts turned by misfortunes to her and hers; yea, to many other that truly piersed her indifcretion. Nor could she be admonished, moderately to beare precedent and present mishaps (whereof continually shee gaue the occasion) but rather prouoked nouell extremities, by her impatience and peeuish folly: for, after the execution of Mariana, Doris, mother to Antipater, and formerly diuorced: six yeares after was recalled to the Court, and her wonted lodging in the Kings Chamber, and it appeared, that her sonne Antipater was now become accepted, and entertained by the King, in hope of succeeding after him; and the sonnes of Mariana excluded quite.

Alexandra perceiuing, that shee onely remayned of the Asmonean royall family, and that shee was to take care of her daughters children: affected rather to runne into extremitie, then after such frequent causes of griefe, to liue in the despite and contempt of Doris, Salome and Antipater, who was to reigne after his father, and to see the same Antipater, borne of Doris the Iudmean, and not noble (euen when Herode lived but in priuate condition) to be preferred preferred the sons of Mariam, who was a Queene, and they borne in the time of Herodes reigning. Hereupon, she began to consider on some apt opportunity, to exploit a certaine disleigne, which shee imagined to be diuinely instructed to hit foule; in regard that the King (being very greatly perplexed in mind, grieved extraordinarily for his wifes execution) was sicke; euen to death, in the city of Samar: which made her (by faire promises) sollicite the Kings Garrison to revolt from him, whereof there were two, one in the Cittie, the other in the Temple, and these being reduced to partake with her, it would be a very easie way for her to enjoy the Kingdome.

Alexandra exhorted those warrellike bands by faithful messengers (considering the incertitude of the Kings life, or rather the assurance of his death) to possesse themselves of the Pallace, before that Antipater, or any other should invade the kingdome, and to preserve the succession thereof, for the sonnes of Herode by his Queene Mariam, till they came to lawfull age, because they were the legitimate heires, and the Kingdome (by right) belonged to them. But the Souldiers, hauing duely considered on the matter among themselves: concluded, not to follow the perillous and ill-advised counsell of this audacious woman, whom they knew to be most maliciously enclined to the King. For (indeede) they greatly feared the Kings dangerous nature, most couetous of reigning and commanding, and accustomed to reuenge (very feuerly) any attempts, in such as hee held the least suspicion of, being any way affected to the kingdome: as he witnessed most euidently, in the punishments inflicted vpon his owne children.

One of the Souldiers thinking, that by reuelling the aduice of this woman, hee should winne great grace and fauour of the King: posited to Samar, and there disclosed to the sicke King, all the machination of his mother in law: which grew the more tedious to Herode, in regard of very impatiently enduring the anguish of his disleale: and therefore (wholly overcome with rage and choller) hee sent instant command to Ierusalem, forthwith to put his mother in law Alexandra to death, as a trayterous conspirator against his life; and it was accordingly perforced.

Thus after infinite calamities, Alexandra ended her dayes in this tragical manner, for, being neuer contented with any present fortune, she daily begate nouell miseries, one still in the necke of another, only through distasting any instant condition. Otherwise, she was a woman graue, discreet and ingenious, but ouer violently giuen vp to ambition, hatred and anger (very vile and bad counsellors) more then needed. She had out-gone the compass of three score yeares, when she was thus put to death; and so became the family of the Asmoneans quite extinct: but onely what remained in the heires of Mariam, deriued from an Idumean father.

Let this Discourse suffice, concerning the noble house of the Asmoneans, which from a small beginning (in the defence of a most honest and good cause) became exalted to soueraigne glory and dignity, by their owne industry, but (more especially) the helpe of heaven. Afterward, hauing left the principall cause, they began to seeke after power and riches, according to the fashion of Pagan Kings, and to stirre in many vnecessary matters: partly trusting to their owne might, and partly relying on the assistance of strangers. Whereon ensued, that, being first distracted by domestick discordes, and next, admitting entrance to strange enemies: they beganne (by little and little) to diminish; and finally, to leaue the whole possession of the Iewish kingdome, to the dominion of strangers. Euen after they had held the principality of the people, from Judas Macchabees, vnto the beginning of Herodes kingdome, for an hundred and thirty yeares, and had kept the High-priesthoode an hundred and seuenteen yeares.

CHAP. XI.

A briefe entrance into the description of the posteritie of Antipater, holding the principalltie of Iudea, but not the High-priesthoode.

Now wee should come to describe the third Family, that obtained the posterity of Antipater the Idumean, who (in different differently) held the principalltie of Iudea, but not the soueraigne Sacrificers Office (for it was not lawfull, that so sacred a charge should bee admittred by strangers) vntill the destruction of the Cittie, and the Temple of Ierusalem.

For the High-priesthoode was in the hands of others, who indeed were Iewes; but yet of diuers and obscure Families, enlisted by Herode and the Romaines, cyther by fauour or rewards.

It is no easie matter to describe their succession, neither doe I hold it any way necessary for this discourse: considering that afterward, the soueraigne Sacrificers were neuer potent or powerfull; and beside, the soueraigne gouernement remained in the hands of Romaine Captaynes and Princes.

Josephus also was not very carefull, curiously to number the soueraigne Sacrificers; but rather satisfieth himselfe, with declaring, that in the kingdom of Herode, accounting from his reigne, vntill the destruction of the Iewish nation; there had beene nine and twentie High-priests, which space of time continued little more then an hundred yeares. For, from the beginning of Herodes reigne, vnto the second yeare of the Empire of Vespasian, I finde by computation, an hundred and fixe yeares.

But in the first Familie of Iesus, which held the High-priesthoode, after their returne from Babylon, vntill the time of Antiochus the Noble; there are accounted fiftene soueraigne Sacrificers onely, although the time was thrice as long as the latter. For, as we haue already elsewhere related, that from the first yeare of Cyrus, vntill that of Alcimus, are found three hundred eightie and fixe yeares, or thereabout. The cause of this multiplictie of High-priests, grew by so often and frequent changes, one still defeating and ouerthrowing another: one while by the power of money, fauour, or both; another while by might, and assistance of enemies.

The third Family.

CHAP. XII.

Concerning the posteritie of Antipater the Idumean of Ascalon, transferring the High-priesthoode (at their pleasure) to strangers: hauing violently got it from the Asmoneans, and held the principalltie of the Iewish people, vntill the destruction of Ierusalem, vnder the reigne of Vespasian.

Dumea is the vtmost part of the Land of Canaan, confining Egypt and Arabia, and closing vp the coast of Iudea towards the South, holding on that part, which the Tribe of Iuda had by lot in their inheritance. In elder times, it was inhabited by the posteritie of Esaus, (brother to Isaac) who was also named Edom, that is to say, Red-hayred. Of him they came to be called Idumeans, and hauing lost the true doctrine, and holy feruices commanded them by God: they fell to the worshipping of Idolles, with their neighbouring nations.

King Dauid first of all brought them into subiection, and made them tributarie to the Kings of Iuda.

About an hundred and fiftie yeares after, they reuolted agayne vnder Soram King of Iuda, sonne to Iehosaphat, and rebelled against the Iewes, diuided into two kingdomes. And although the succeeding Kings compelled them diuers times, to vnder-goe againe their former feruilitie: yet notwithstanding, they defended their libertie by armes, vntill such time as Iudas was led captiue into Babylon. And then, they tooke many Citties from the Iewes; which afterward (by the Edict of King Darius) they were enforced to restore vnto them agayne, when they were returned from Babylon.

Not long after, Iohn Hyrcanus, sonne to Simon the Asmonean, hauing overcome them in a very difficult warre: constrained them, to make profession of the same doctrine and religion with him, causing them

Antipater.

Succeeded in the government of Idumea, after his deceased father, during which time, he not only wonne the hearts of his owne nation, augmenting and confirming his wealth, by alliance with neighboring Kings, and Cities, but also strongly insinuated himselfe into good grace with Hyrcanus the second, by many acceptable seruices. For he being instituted Soueraigne Sacrificer by his mother, who then ruled the kingdome. Antipater had great hope, that the fauour of Hyrcanus
would (in time) aduance him to higher degree. Now, he perswaded himselfe, that the mother being dead, hee should come to inioy the kingdom by hereditary right.
Wherefore, Antipater was very diligent towards him in all kindes of courtieis, making no account at all of the younger brother: which made him wonderfully

ter laboured

hated by Aristobulus, as it fell out after in open apparance. For, their mother being dead, Aristobulus hauing fought with his brother Hyrcanus in a field of battell, & afterward held besieged in the temple:
he was at length constrained, to dismisse himselfe, both of the kingdome and high-Priesthood. And then (by flowe and politike degrees) he deposed Antipater from the gouernement of Idumea, for his so many good seruices to Hyrcanus in war.

This iniurie more and more enflamed
the hatred of Antipater against Aristobulus, and because hee could not reuenge himselfe by power: hee incited the greatest Lords of the Iewes against King Aristobulus by secret accusations. Above all, he handled Hyrcanus in diuers kindes (hee being of his owne nature, modest and temperate) one while terrifying him with strange feares, another while chear-ing his hopes, with vndoubted comming to his Crowne againe. He told him that his brother Aristobulus, (a man meerely vile by complexion) sought all occasions, either by close contriuings, or open violence, to preuaile against his life: for his more secure enioying of the kingdome, whereto hee had aspired by such wickednesse. Hee auaunched, to haue certayne knowledge, of diuers enterprises in Aristobulus by euident signes: either because they were truly so indeede, or for the more prouoking Hyrcanus against his brother. Moreouer, he shewed the meanes and wayes, whereby Hyrcanus might regayne the Kingdome belonging to him,
to wit, if they both fled thence to Aretas, king of Arabia, with whom he had ancient amitie and alliance, and who (he doubted not) could satisfie their desires.

Hyrcanus was at last wonne by these speeches, being formerly wounded with the wrongs which his brother had offered him; so that accompanied with Antipater, and some other, who not a little despised the dominion of Aristobulus; he secretly went to Aretas in the city of Petra. There humbly himselfe before the King, hee desired assistance of him against his wicked and cruell brother, who not only had deprived him of the High-priesthood, (contrary to all right and equitie) which hee had peaceably enioyed nine yeares in his mothers life time; and not onely also bereft him of the kingdome, which by the law of Nations belonging to him, as being trappes and traines for his life. Whereupon he promised, that if hee should be restored to his Kingdome; he would surrender to him ten Citties, which his father Alexander Jamnes had taken from the Realme of Arabia, and other honourable recompences beside.

Aretas, more moued by the perswasions of Antipater, then all the prayers and promises of Hyrcanus, invaded Iudaea with fiftie thousand men. Aristobulus encountering with him, was vanquished, chiefly by the valiance of Antipater: and being abandoned of his souldiers, the most part yelded themselves to Hyrcanus. Aristobulus got closely into the Citie, and there (with some of the Sacrificers and Citti-zens) kept within the fortresse of the temple, being provided of all things necessarie to endure besieging. But yet before this extremite, he had sent an ambassage (in great haste) to Scaurus, Lieutenant, abiding then in Syria, intreating succour of him against the Arabes: promising him four hundred Talents, that is, two hundred and fortie thousand crownes of the Sunne.

Aretas pursuing Aristobulus with his Armie, entred into the Citie, to lay his siege before the Temple; the Cittizens yelding themselves to Hyrcanus, and the Cittie also. But some Iewes foreseeing, that this debate betweene the brethren, about possession of the kingdome, would cause the ruine of the whole country; lest there their goods, and fledde into Egypte.
Other of the Cittizens ioyned with the Arabes, besieging the munition, and pressed the inclosed Sacrificers very narrowly; yea, much more nearly then the ene-mie, using deceipts and subtilties with their cruelty. For they drew out of the secret Sanctuarie (where this ciuile warre was most vnciuilly maintained) a holy man, named Onias, who in an extreme drought and dread of sterility, made his prayers to God, desiring raine in that needfull season: and would haue compelled him, to curse and damne the besieged to the duell, because they would not yelde themselves. But hee (on the contrary) made his prayers aloud to God, that he would neyther heare the Sacrificers, or Priests besieged against the people, nor

the people besieging against the Priests,
for which cause the Iewes stoned him.

And when the feast of Easter was come,
when there was neede of many beaſts for Sacrifices, the Priests required, that such store might be deliuered them, as was necessarily to be vsed in such solemne Sacrifices, agreeing to pay a thousand drachmes for each beaſt; that is to say, an hundred crownes of the Sunne. But after that the Iewes had receiued so great a summe from the Priests: they descended from the walles, and would not performe a iore of that which they had promised, but mocked the sacrificing Priests, who were ouer credulous in beleeuing them.

But the Lord God being offended with this wickednes, and taking vengeance for their foule transgressions; sent a sharpe winde on the Corne then almost ripe, which being vtterly spoyled, the famine was so great, that a bushell of wheate was solde eleuen times more deare, then vſually
it was wont to be; to wit, at cleauen drachmaes, whereas before (in euerie yeare) it was sold for a drachma, and lesse.

The besieged beginning to feele the want of fooode, and that nothing hindred them from yelding, but onely to heare an answer from Scaurus (vnder the hope whereof, Aristobulus encouraged the Priests, to endure all difficulties of the siege): it fortuned (very successefully for them) that Scaurus sent Ambassadors to King Aretas, that he should withdraw his Army out of Iudaea, except hee meant to proue the displeasure of the Romaine
people. Aretas obeyed this command, and so much the rather, because his army was in great distresse for fooode. By which meanes, (without doing any thing else)
Hyrcanus and Antipater returned backe to Arabia with the King.

Soone after, Pompey came out of Armenia into Syria, whereupon, Antipater procured many of the most potent Iewes, to accuse Aristobulus before him. Himselfe likewise, as an Ambassador sent from Hyrcanus, went to Pompey, and pleaded the cause of Hyrcanus against Aristobulus, and entred into such respect with Pompey; that after the surprizing of the Citie, Hyrcanus was restored to the High-priesthood, but not to the Kingdome. And from thence forward, Antipater beganne to occasions whatsoever, because Hyrcanus, (being a lover of quietnesse) left all to his rule. And so gracious was he with the Romaine Capitaines, in all such seruices as possibly he could do for them: that he intimated farre into their friendship, causing Hyrcanus daily to bestow magnificent gifts, and himselfe receiued all the thanks and profite for them.

First, he was very diligent, to furnish Scaurus with all kinde of munition, when he was left in Iudea with two legions, and made warre vpon the Arabes. Next, being sent in embassage by the same Scaurus to the king Aretas: hee procured peace, in regarde of his auncient amitie with the King, and perswaded Scaurus to bring his Army out of Arabia, after he had receiued of the King three hundred Talents, as much to say, as an hundred and fourescore thousand crowns of the Sunne. Afterward, he assisted Gabinus against Alexander, sonne to Aristobulus, but especially in the restitution of King Pholomey the Fleustier: where he made passage for Gabinus, to goe from Iudea into Egypt by Iudaea.

By the like subtile and cunning means, he qualified rich Crassus, and his General Cassius, being removed from the Parthian warre; fearing lest any thing should be attempted, that might be hurtfull to Hyrcanus, who (from time to time) was accused to the Romaine Capitaines, as well by the sonnes of Aristobulus, as by diuerse powerfull Iewes, that were of the same faction.

But, for the more sure establishing of his power, hee ayded Julius Caesar more then all the rest, to whom he performed faithfull seruice in the Alexandrian warre, in bringing him three thousand Iewes, & procuring the Arabes, Iudaeans, and Iews dwelling in Egypt, to be his companions in that warre. And when Mithridates of Pergamum (who went with a great Armie of Cilicia and Syria against Caesar) was repulsed in Egypt: Antipater (Dameira being subdued) brought helpe to Caesar, and fauored him by the way; when he was compelled (in an encounter) to giue place to the enemy, his men being ready prepared for flight.

For these defects (the Alexandrian war being ended) Julius Caesar confirmed the High priesthood vnto Hyrcanus, permitting him to build vp the City walles a gayne: Moreouer, he appoynted Antipater to be Tuteur of all Judeans, and sent him into Iudea, honoured with the title of a Romaine Bourgesse, and perpetuall immunities beside.

Antipater seeing himselfe exalted to such dignitie, deuised also how to aduance his sonnes. Whereupon, Phelms (being the eldest) he appointed him to be gouernour of Ierusalem, and the neighbouring places about it: in regarde of the negligence and carelesnesse of Hyrcanus in the gouernement. Next to him was Herode, and he as yet but yong: yet he gaue the charge of Galilee to him. Both of them very commendably performed their seuerall offices, which caused their father to become more esteemed generally, and won the fauour of many powerfull persons, by both his owne, and his sonnes liberalitie.

Hereupon it hapned, that some Iews grew iealous and suspicious of Antipater, seeing him (purposely) to maintaine the remission of Hyrcanus, onely for the exaltation of his owne sonnes: abusing all his riches and reuenues, to bestow great fauours and gifts vpon the Romains. In this respect, some of the best aduised Iewes, and of the better sort, feared not to reprehend Hyrcanus publicly, for his neglect and slouthfulness, in referring the totall administration of all things, onely to Antipater and his sonnes, who were scarcely started out of childhood. Having already gathered such heaps of wealth and cheuifance, onely to curry fauour with the Romains, that they were become dreadfull to the whole nation. They bad him to be well aduised, whereto tended this power in the Iudaeans, shewing him withall, that he dealt vniuilly and indifferently, hauing so many Iewes, excelling in valour and expertnesse of armes: to reiect them from managing publike affaires, reposing his whole trust in the defence of a stranger, who intended no profite to the Iewish nation, but only how to leaue the kingdom of Iudea to his owne sonnes.

Now, albeit these speeches did a little moue Hyrcanus, himselfe also fearing the power of Antipater: yet notwithstanding, he could not forget, what benefits he had receiued by him, and what loyalty he had declared towards him, hauing alwayes kept him in extreame dangers. Beside, he feared feared Aristobulus, and his sonnes, against whom he thought he stood in need of a powerfull defender, which made him answer, that he could not dismisse Antipater from gouerning the generall affaires, in regard he had receiued his authoritie from the Romains; who he might by no means offend, without both hazarding himselfe, and the whole Country to vnuoidable dangers.

When the accusers of Antipater perceived, they could worke nothing on the slow and neglect nature of Hyrcanus, they began to consider on some subtile means, whereby they might put Antipater to death. And one of them being named Malichus, excelling all the rest in wealth, wisdom, and courage, fought how to intrap Antipater, by secret plots and ambushes prepared. But Antipater getting intelligence thereof, withdrew himselfe beyond Jordane, where he leuied an Army, by aide from King Aretas his deare friend, with full deliberation to reuenge this injury. Neuertheless, he was appeased by Hyrcanus, because Malichus purged himselfe by oath, that he neuer intended any treason against him.

This hapned immediatly after that the Conspirators had slayne Julius Caesar in the Senate house, when Cassius (Author and chiefe in the coniuration) was come into Syria, and from thence into Iudea: where he villainously ranfacked the Cities and Townes, onely to get money, so that he sold the Magistrats of some places, with their whole families, and pillaged foure great cities in Iudea, selling all the Citizens for slaves: because they had made refusal, to giue such a large summe as this insatiable beast demanded. As he asked of the Iews seven hundred talents, (which summe amounted to foure thousand Crownes of the Sunne:) Antipater gaue charge to leuy this money, partly of his Sons, and partly of the most powerfull Iewes; so that the whole summe being suddenly payd in: Antipaters sonnes were the better welcomed among the Romains. And so farre it proceeded, that Cassius (euen then) made promise of the kingdom of Iudea to Herode, who ouer & above the summe whereto the taxation mounted, carryed store of gold to the campe in Syria when he had ended the war against Marke Anthony and Octavianus. But for the present he commanded the Prouince of Syria to Herode, and the Army by Sea.

Malichus well obseruing, that the power of Antipater lo mightily encreasing, was not (by any patient meanes) to be indured; practised & dealt with the Taster or Cup-bearer to Hyrcanus the High-priest, by great gifts and summes of money: so that one night, as Antipater was at Supper with Hyrcanus, the Taster poysoned him; albeit the sayd Taster had twise bin deliuered from death by Antipater, & held his life of him. Thus was Antipater murdered, in the yere following the death of Julius Caesar, he being (vndoubtedly) a man very excellent, wife, and prouident. Some imagined, that Hyrcanus was not ignorant of the deed doing, or (at least) it was not done in any despight of him: although Antipater by the means of Pompey, got him restored to the Soueraigne Priesthood, and afterward (for the space of 22. yeres) alwayes kept and defended him against the violence of his enemies.

Perhaps one way he had offended Hyrcanus, that (to satisfy the covetous desires of Cassius, and to forestall perills incident to himselfe) he was somewhat ouer-rude in virging money from him, he being an old man, sparing by nature, and the more gripple in holding, in regarde of his age. For which fault, Hyrcanus declared no great distaste in the murdering of his Benefactor. Because many times it comes to passe, that some men, hauing receiued good benefices for a large length of time, and yet growing (at length) to be displeased: they forget all good desertings past, and resting not so contented, proceed to diuers dangerous practises against them. Of such ingratefull men, Philip Melancton, my worthy master, & good father, wrote certaine Verses to this effect:

Some men there are, if thou transport their states
With pompe to Rome, and plant them in the gates:
Such fauour they require not with due grace,
But (like ingratefull wretches) all deface.

Not long after, Hyrcanus payd dearly for this his foolish ingratitude, because (the yere following) Antigonus compassed the meanes to bring the Parthians into Iudea; when Hyrcanus being taken, & led into a strange land by the enemy, well found (but ouer-late) what defence he had lost by the death of Antipater, and then in

CHAP. XIII.

A further entrance into discourse, concerning the race and Posteritie of Antipater, for the better clearing of some obscure doubts in diuers Authors, and full satisfaction of the Reader.

Of the Sonnes of Antipater.

Phaselus the eldest.

The worthe performance of Phaselus in his charge.

He being constituted by his Father, to be Governor of Ierusalem, and the round neighbouring places, to assist Hyrcanus (carelesse, and very vnapt for administration) in regard of his age; discharged his Commission most commendably for sixe yeares space, during the life time of his father. He being dead, hee appeard (by his vertue) a great trouble arising in Ierusalem, in regard that a certayne man, named Felix, driuen by Cassius into Ierusalem with Souldiours, being corrupted with money from diuerse Iewes; laboured to ouerthrow it. But this Felix was vanquished by Phaselus, and for a while kept in prison; but afterward released vpon certayne conditions.

Next, it was no little ioy to him, to see Malichus (the murderer of his father Antipater) punished for his wickednesse: who labouing to invade the Principality of Iudea, was slayne by the Souldiours of Cassius, and by the industrious meanes of Herode.

Cassius being conquerd, Marke Anthony came into Syria, and made Phaselus & Herode Tetrarches of Iudea: notwithstanding all the criminall accusations, alleaded by the Iewes against them. But Phaselus enioyed not that dignity any long while; for the yeare following the death of his father, the City being furysied by the Parthians and Antigonus: he was (by subtilty) taken with Hyrcanus, and slew himselfe remayning prisoner, as I haue already related in the life of the fecond Hyrcanus.

Isippus the third Sonne of Antipater.

Concerning the brethren of Phaselus.

Herode cometh next after Phaselus, in respect of his age. But I holde it more conuenient to speak first of his brethren, whose actions were of lesse fame and esteeme.

Isippus (called by some Gisippus) the third sonne of Antipater, was appoynted Gouvernour of Iudumea by his father, who had obtained the Principallitie of Iudea. After his fathers death, he valiantly defended the family and affaires of his brother Herode, they being driuen into exile by Antigonus and the Parthians: withdrawing them into the City of Massada, against the sayd King Antigonus, enduring there a very difficult siege, vntill that his brother brother Herode (being returned out of Italiane) deliuered him and them, and was afterward proclaymed King by Octavianus Augustus, and by Marke Anthony.

Isippus defended his brotheres cause and all his friends.

Within a while after, when his brother Herode went to Marke Anthony, who besieged the City of Samofata, neare vnto Euphrates; the charge of the Army was giuen to him. But going inconsiderately forraging for the Corn, with sixe silly bands of Souldiers: he was taken in the Straits of the mountaines neare to Sericho, and there slain with all his men by Antigonus, about foure yeares after the death of his father.

His head being smitten off, was carried vp and downe in a mockery, and finally bought of Antigonus, by his brother Pheroras, for fifty Talents, that is, 30000 Crownes of the Sunne. He had a sonne named Isippus also, to whom his winkle Herode gaue in marriage, Olympia, the Sister of Archelaus, of whom he begat Mariana, afterwards married to Herode the lesse, King of Chalasis.

Of them was borne Mariana, wife to Herode, son to Aristobolus, King of Chalasis.

Pheroras, the yongest sonne to Antipater, when his brother Isippus was slaine being as yet but young, he continued alone, yet ayded his brother Herode valiantly, managing dangerous warres (on his behalfe) against Antigonus. At the request of Herode, Augustus Caesar made him Tetrarche, and vied him very honorably; yet returning but bad recompence therefore to his brother: For, hauing procured him; to put his wife Mariana to death, and his two sonnes Alexander and Aristobolus: he at the length compacted with Antipater, to compasse the death of his brother also. But being preuented by sudden death, hee escaped punishment. He dyed some few yeares before his brother Herode, and left two sonnes, to whom Augustus married two daughters of deceased Herode, Roxana and Salome, endowing each with five and twentie thousand Crownes of the Sunne. Hee had a daughter also, married to the sonne of Antipater, yongest sonne of King Herode.

Salome, daughter of Antipater, Sister to Herode King of Iudea.

In her first marriage, shee was giuen to one named Isippus, who being constituted guardian of Mariana, wife to Herode was slaine by the Kings command, because hee would not reueale some matters of secrecie. Afterward shee was married to Cothabarus, Gouernour of Iudumea, from whom shee perterated her selfe by diuorce, contrary to the Lawe of Moses: which permitted Husbands to leaue their Wiues for some cause of importance; but not Wiues to leaue their Husbands. Neuerthelesse, Salome vsed this licence, confiding in the power of her brother: and afterward was the cause, that the sayd Cothabarus dyed miserably. Finally, in despite of her selfe-will, Herode made her marry one Alexander: although she was almost made in loue with a potent Arabe, named Sylens, an vtter enemy to Herode, and one that would not be circumcised.

This Salome was a meere Fury in the Court of her brother, and a flaming firebrand of domestick discordes, whereon many murders ensued. For, being wholly overcome with hatred against Mariana the Asmonean (who despised her, because she was not nobly borne) shee ceased not to enflame the spleene of her brother: contriuing false crimes of adultery and poisoning against her, vntill Herode had put his dearely affected wife to death. Which being done, and Salome fearing some reuenge to be inflicted on her: beganne to prouoke the father against Alexander and Aristobolus, the sonne of Mariana, seruing her turne here in with Antipater, the sonne of Herode, who stood in feare, that these two yong men should be aduanced and preferred before him to the kingdome.

Shee prayled so well by her cunning plots and practises, that they both standing accused, for affecting the Kingdome, and preparing of poysons, they were condemned; and, notwithstanding all their excellent partes and perfections, they were strangled by their fathers command.

Moreover, by her secret and subtil reports, she wrung Antipater into his fathers ill opinion and disgrace, although hee had beene her companion in all her wickednesse; plotting and preparing all the treasons against his father, whereof he had falsly accused his most innocent brethren, the sonnes of Mariana, vntill himselfe was caught in the same snare, and (by his fathers command) dispatched also.

Shée, the minister of so many monstrous cruelties, did suruiue her brother Herode, who left her (by his last will and testament) three most opulent Cities, to wit, Iamnia, Asot and Phaselus; beside two millions and an halfe of siluer coine, which amounts to fifty thousand crowns of the Sunne.

Moreover, she being familiar (by Letters) with Linia, wife to Augustus (whom Iosephus continually calleth Iulia) the said Augustus gaue her the Castle royall in the City of Asalon. And she receiued annually out of the fore-named Cities, three score Talents, which arise to thirtie fixe thousand crownes of the Sunne.

Having liued twelue years after the death of her brother Herode; shee dyed a yeare before the departure of Augustus out of this life, and left (by her testament) to Linia, wife to Augustus, those Cities which she formerly held. She left a sonne named Antipater, and a daughter singularly beautifull, called Berenice, of whom came these children following.

who then gouerned the Prouince of Sy-

ters from his father, appeared at Ierusalem on the day of Assignation, accompanied with a reasonable guard, and recommended by Sextus Cæsar.

Hyrcanus perceiuing, that the Iudges were heauily incensed by the aduersaries of Antipater, and that they would not faile to giue sentence in sharpe manner:
desiring to gratifie his friend Antipater,
he secretly admonished Herode, to withdraw himselfe out of the city, before he were condemned by the Iewes sentence;
and thereupon conuained to prisonment.
The yong man returned backe into Syria,
very impatiently bearing the iniurie, which hee conceived to be doone him by the Iudges, declaring to Sextus Cæsar the treachery of the Citizens, and hauing receiued from him part of the Romaine
Army, and the regiment of the lower Sy- ria: hee resolved to reuenge the wrong which the Councell had offered him: So, going vp to Ierusalem with a maine Army, hee could hardly be with-held by his father, and his brother Phaselus, who met him by the way, and made him to retreat his army into Syria. But yet he could not remouee his mallice, which still he continued against the Conistorie: and which he vtterly quailed and ouerthrew, after his coming to the Crowne.

Not long after the death of Iulius Cæ- sar, by a close ambush, and ayde of Cassius, his Souldiours, he procured Malichus
to be slaine, being the murderer of his father Antipater. Which beeing done, once more hee expelled out of Iudæa Ant- igonius, the sonne of Aristobulus, whom hee ouercame in warre, albeit he had re-couered part of Iudæa.

After that Cassius and Brutus were vanquished neare to Philippi, when Marke
Anthony was come into Syria; Ambassa-dours went from the Iewes to meete him at Bithynia, accusing there Phaselus and Herode to him, because the lawfull heires of the kingdome were expelled, and they (by force) holde the whole gouernement of Iudæa. Herod also met them there, wel
furnished with rich and sumptuous gifts, to beslow on Marke Anthony: of whom he was entertained most benignly, for the loue hee had borne to his father Anti- pater, when being Lieutenant to Gabi- nus, hee was still in warre, during the peace of Syria and Iudæa. Wherefore, howsoeuer he listned to the Iewes accusations, yet he ordained Phaselus and his brother Herode Tetrarchs of Iudæa. And because the Iewes ceased not to send Embassie vpon Embassie, and continually in great number, amounting to a thousand men in the end. Marke Anthony punished them with imprisonment. And because they neuer would giue ouer, but daily in-treated, that (by no means) they might be subiected to Herode; hee caused some of them to be put to death.

Hyrcanus descended to Anthony in Sy- ria (already conioyned with Herode in affinitie, to whom hee had giuen his younger sister Mariana, daughter of Alexander and Alexandra: who was honourably entertained by Anthony, and confirmed in the possession of the High-priesthood:
and obtained those cities and persons (reduced by Cassius into seruitude) to be de-liuered and enfranchised; and that the ra-pined goodes should be restored to their first owners.

The yeare following, Pacorus hauing subdued Syria (attracted by great promises) brought Antigonius backe againe to Ierusalem, as hath formerly bene sayde.
Where Herode (hearing that his brother Phaselus and Hyrcanus the soueraigne Sa-crificer were detained prisoners, contrary to the lawes of Nations, knowing also, that the Iewes were affected to Anti- gonius, fearing both his enemies and the Citizens) he departed forth secretly in the dead time of the night, with his Mother Cypris, his wife Doris, his sister Sal- ome, his affianced Mariana, his mother in lawe Alexandra, and eight hundred other women, beside a great company of friends, and (with much adoe) got not safelie into Iudæa. For his mother was foure wounded by the way, by reason of the Waggon ouerthrow vpon her: so that Herode (as halfe desperate) thought to haue slaine himselfe, because he was ouer-closely pursued by the barbarous people, whom (neuertheless) hee valiantly droned backe, and quite ouercame.

There he left all his company, and such goodes as they carried with them, in a strong Cittie named Massada, vnder the charge and protection of his brother Jo- sippus: and went very secretly (attended but with a few Souldiours) to King Are-

which was betwene him and his father Antipater. But being hindered from entering into Arabia, hee passed (with great difficultie) into Egypt to Cleopatra, who furnishing him with needfull things: hee tooke shipping in the worst season of all the yeare, and shap'd his course directly for Rome; where being arriv'd, hee acquainted Mark Anthony with the fraud of Antigonus, his owne flight, and perill of the people hee had in charge; humbly entreating him, that hee would not suffer him to be thus trampled on by his enemies, to whom hee had expressed kinnesse, and oftentimes exalted them.

Anthony reported the complaint and request of Herode, to his companion Augustus in the Empire, and both they together commended their suppliant friend to the Senate. remembring the perpetual devotion & loyaltie of his father Antipater, towards the Caprains and Souldiours of Rome, and especially to Julius Caesar. In briefe, they prevailed so farre, that (by common voice) Antigonus was iudged enemy to the people of Rome: and the kingdom of Iudea conferred on Herode, the seaventh day after his coming to Rome. He was conducted to the Senate house, going in the middle betwene Augustus and Anthony; Domitius Calpurnius, and Afinius Pollio, Conlulles, going before him, accompanied with other Magistrates and Senatours, even all the way thence to the Capitole, where the Sacrifices were performed. And this being the first day of his reigne, hee was magnificently feasted by Marke Anthony: foure yeares after the death of Julius Caesar; two yeares after them of Cicero, and thirty feuen before the birth of our Sauour Christ.

Herode being returned into Iudea, had a very difficult warre against King Antigonus, which continued the space of foure yeates: because that the Romaine Caprains (as Ventidius, Silo and some other, who had the charge of placing Herode in full possession of the kingdom) were corrupted by gold sent from Antigonus, desiring nothing more then deferring, and neuer earnestly assisting Herode. Besides, many Iewes (ill affected to the house of Antipater) moued many troubles against him.

The beginning then of Herodes reigne was wonderfully difficile, and yet (notwithstanding) by his industrie, diligence and vertue, and sofly, steppe by steppe, hee overcame all hinderances, and possessed himselfe of Galilee, Samarita, and the very greatest part of Iudea.

Afterward, Ventidius sent some bands to succour him, conducted by one named Macherus; but Herode perceiving him to be dull and slowe, and that hee went but coldly about the businesse, as expecting, that Antigonus should still furnish him with fresh handfulls; without expecting any further ayde from such Captains, hee undertook great iournies, to encounter with Antigonus, who besieged Samofata. And (by the way) sped very successfully, against diuers theues that hindered his passages.

As thus he drew nearer to his enemy, Marke Anthony came to meete him, and did him such honour as became a King, with the greater part of his Armie. After hee had heard his complaints, concerning the disloyaltie of some Caprains, who (corrupted by the gifts of Antigonus) had executed no part of the command from Augustus and the Senate: hee sent two legions of olde Souldiours into Iudea, and commaunded Sofus (one of his faithfull Caprains) to follow them with an other Armie, so soone as the City of Samofata was surrendered.

In the absence of Herode, his brother Iosippus, fighting to his owne disadvantage, was slaine with his Armie, by the Souldiours of Antigonus, neare to Tericho. Also, the Galileans revolted, and many rebelled in Iudea: wherefore Herode returned with those olde bands, and hardly appeased them of Galilee. Afterwards, by many encounters, wherein hee had one while the best, and another while the worst, he so weakened the forces of Antigonus: as (at length) hee withdrew into the fortresse of Ierusalem.

Herode brought his Armie against the Cittie, and after hee had raised his munitions, and builded diuers engines needfull for batterie: hee left the Armie vnder certaine Caprains and iourned in to Samaria, to espouse Mariana the Assyrian, who (as I haue formerly tolde you) was daughter to Alexander, the yongest sonne of Elyrcanus the second, who (four yeares before) was affianced to Herode, that that is to say, before that the Parthians had inuaded the Countrey.

In the meane while, Sofus being sent from Anthony with his Souldiers, marched on diligently, and ioynd his armie with the other belonging to Herode, whose nuptials being ended, and he returned to Ierusalem: the two Caprains beganne to assaile the Cittie manfully in diuers places. The besieged Iewes had great want of principall munitions, and yet notwithstanding, hauing embraced an imaginary hope, they thought, that they should be diuinely deliuered. For they continually vied to say, that they fought for freedom of the people for their lawfull king against strangers, for the Temple and Religion against Pagans; sustaining (for some length of time) a very sharpe besieging, and much molesting the enemy by their sallies. But finally, the City was surprized in the moneth of Maie, the very same day as (ten and twenty yeares before) Pompey had conquered it, as hath bene said, M. Agrippa and Cnidius Galus being then Conluls.

The Romaine Souldiers being much displeased at so long a siege, and losse of many of their people; made pittifull slaughter, not onely of the armed Iewes, but also of such as had no defence at all. King Antigonus, throwing himselfe at the feete of Sofus, humbly desired pardon: but he was inuiously reiected, and being strongly bound, sent to Marke Anthony at Antioche, where, at the request of Herod, he was slaine.

In this Militarie furie and combustion, Herod had worke enough to do, to hinder the Romaines, from entering into the most secret place of the Temple, to robbe and carry thence the sacred treasures. Moreover, hee was glad to promise an infinite summe of mony, to obtaine such fauour, that the goods of the Citizens might not bee imbezeled, and borne away by the Souldiours. And in this troublefome tempest, we will giue conclusion to this Chapter; because we enter now into the reigne of Herode, and are to speake of matters concerning those times.

CHAP. XIII.

How Herode, after all these tumultuous troubles and molestations, attained to the sole Government of the Kingdom of Iudea.

After that the Cittie was taken in this manner, and Antigonus (the last King of the Assyrians) slaine: Herode enioyed the Kingdom of Iudea, three and thirtie yeares before the Natiuitie of Christ. Hauing taken order for the Realmes affaires, hee cruelly murdered all those great Lords, that had ioynd themselves with Antigonus against him. And seeing that hee had consumed and waited all his goods, as also those of his kined and friends, in gifts and charges of the warre; by an especiall Edict, he compelled the Citizens, to bring all their Iewells of gold and siluer to the kings castle, and all such money as they had beside. He appointed likewise Guardes at the gates, to search all such as passed in or out: yea, such as carried the dead to buriall, fearing lest (in any manner) they should conuey thence coine, or any precious thing whatsoeuer.

At this time happened a famine, in regard of the seuenth yeare of rest, wherein it was not lawfull to sowe the grounds. And in the former yeares past, the fields remayned (in many places) vntilled, by reason of the continuall ciuile warres. So that the estate of the Cittie was very miserable, being fallen into wofull seruitude; whereof the better sort of people, as Simon, Zachary, Ioseph and some such other tooke part: who neuertheless, in these sad spectacles and miserable calamities, cheered vp their diuising spirits, by hope of the Messias his coming, who should saue them. And they perceived it to draw neare, because they obserued, that the Scepter was now wholly taken from the house of Iuda.

repealed (by his letters) from banishment Hyrcanus the second, who lived then in Babylon, because he had married the daughter of his daughter, and sent presents to the taking of Parthia, for the ransom of his captiuitie. When he was come to Ierusalem; hee did not make him soueraigne Sacrificer, because hee was mutilate or imperfect: but in recompence thereof, bestowed great honours vpon him, so that in publique assemblies, he caused him to sit in the highest roome. At the same time he substituted (in stead of Antigonius in the High-priesthood) another Iew come from Babylon, named Ananelus, a matter greatly offensive to him and the people. Which Herode perceiuing, hee depoued Ananelus, and placed in his stead Aristobolus, brother to his wife Mariana: whom hee caused to die by detestable fraude a year after, rendering the High-priest-hood to the sayd Ananelus againe. Whereupon, Alexandra accused him of this crime to Cleopatra, and he being appealed by Anthony to Laodicea, to render an account for this imputation; rather pacified him by golden giftes, then any vaine and vnauidible excuses.

But Anthony made him answer, that he had not any neede of such succour; giuing him charge (by the perswasion of Cleopatra) to make warre on the Arabes, who would not pay the annuall pension of two hundred Talents, whereof, he had made promise to Cleopatra. Hee hauing (so well as he could) vniited his forces together againe; repulsed the Arabes, and compelled them to returne home into their countrey: which otherwise had conuerted to the Iewes heauier calamitie, because they (encouraged by their wofull miseries) put all to fire and were followed by a dreadfull pestilence:

which made lamentable spoyle and ha-uocke, both in the fields and cities, and likewise in the Kings campe.

After these apparent and publique calamities, meeting together in such grie-uous manner; Herode felt into a great per-sonall danger. For, after the day at Actium, wherein Anthony (the chiefe friend to Herode) was foyled, and dying there-vpon: Herode was in no meane dismay,
for feare of Augustus the Conquerour;
and the people well perceiued his feare,
because hee knew not how to determine of himselfe. Whereupon, some of the people (vnable to endure this dominion of a stranger) beganne to exalt their spirits, vnder hope of some sudden nouelty, and ioyed at the danger wherein Herode
was. About all the rest, his mother in law Alexandra (imagining the time to be now come, wherein shee might reuenge the death of her sonne, and retrace the kingdome againe to her own family) solicited very strong and firmly her father Hyrcanus (now very aged and decrepitate, and one that alwayes affected quietnesse) in regard of his many iniuries; to flie into Arabia, to the end, that if Herode were ill with the other women) to another Fort, named Alexandria; giuing the charge of them to Tisippus, General for the finances of the kingdom, and to Soemus his most certaine and singular friends. And this trust also he imposed on them, that if Augustus offered any ill to him: they should kill the two women instantly, and conferre (so much as in them possibly lay) the kingdom for his sonnes, vntill

they were come to age, by the assistance of his brother Pheroras.

These matters being thus ordered and appointed, he trauelled on to Augustus, who then heard all Ambassadors in the Isle of Rhodes, where leaving off his diademe and kingly robes, keeping all the rest of royall liberty, as trusting in his cause and the Emperours clemencie; he confessed, that hee had beene a friend to Mark Anthony, and would haue sent him succour, if he had required it; but that he was diuinely withdrawne from his company (in how miserable condition soe-uer) by the warre which hee then made vpon the Arabes: Wherein he had sustained so many losses and misfortunes, that he was sufficiently punished for his friendship to Anthony, and for the seruices he had done vnto him. But if now it pleased Augustus to experiment his faithfullnesse, hee would make it apparent vnto him, by as true seruices.

Augustus tooke such delight in the magnanimous confession of Herode, that hee embraced him amiably; restoring him to his Crowne, and assuring him;
to expect as many kinde benedictions from him, as euer hee had receiued by Marke Anthony.

Herode finding Augustus so gracious,
tooke courage from the former despayre wherein hee was, assuring now the possibility of his Kingdom the more firmely to him. Wherefore hee exceeded his ability in gifts to Augustus, as also to his friends and the Army. Hee bare the Em-perour company beside, at his laying in to Egypt; and when he came into Syria:

hee receyued him with entertainment
more then royall, hauing borrowed all necessarie prouision, throughout all the parts of Iudea.

Augustus finding so many great re-spectes, meerey flowing from Herode, refused that part of Iudea to him, which Anthony had giuen to Cleopatra: adding thereto likewise Samaria, and other Cit-ties on the Sea coastes, whereby the wealth of his kingdom was greatly augmented.

Herode.

Herode hauing mette with all this hap-pinesse and felicitie abroad, at his returne home into Judea, found all things there very bitter and troublesome, by private and domestick hatreds: For, his wife Mariana had already gotten intelligence (two severall times) by the Guardes, that they had charge to kill her and her mother; if eyther Anthony before hand, or Augustus now in this doubtfull time, disposed otherwise then well of him. Whereupon, at their meeting, Mariana by no means would come neare him, notwithstanding all the flatteries or signes of ardent loue hee shewed to her: reproouing him for such cruell commands, and plainely telling him, that they were no testimonies of a true husband. Herode
entred into suspicion, that it was not possible for him to be disclosed, or his secrets knowne to the Guardes: but eyther it must be by Tisippus, or lastly, by Soemus, wherefore he grew very chollericke, and studied how to taxe and punish her for a dultery. And yet such was the power of his loue, that he could not redde all that he suspected; neyther exercise any crueltie against so faire a woman, of great Nobilitie, endowed with all graces belonging to a body of such singulartie.

At length, his sister Salme remoued
all these hinderances in him, and prouok-

for, finding apt occasion to reuenge her owne contempt, she kindled a fierce fire in him of suspicion; namely, in the matter of adulterie, adding withall, an intent of poyson prepared for him, which shee money. Hecreupon, the King grew outrageously incensed against her; and having caused her to be condemned by the sentence of his friends; commanded her to be immediately executed, although she had been the mother to him of five children. But soon after he repented his vnauided rashness, and so extremely desired his wives company againe; that he fell into an extraordinary languishing, shunning all societie whatsoever. And, vnder colour of riding on hunting, hee would secretly steale into Caues and Dennes in the Forrest, as hoping there to finde some asswaging of his sorrow; and being vnable to withstand the extremities of melancholie, hee fell into a deadly disease.

At the same time, there was a great plague or pestilence in Iudea, whereby multitudes of people were consumed: so that many men were perswaded verily, that God had sent this punishment for the Kings cruelties. And as the King himself lay extremely sick in Samaria, where every one was in mightie despaire of his life: Alexandra (his mother in law) strove by large promises, to winne the Guardes of the Temple and Citie to partake with her. But the conspiracie being reuealed, Herode gave order for her sudden execution. The King then seemed outwardly to be somewhat recovered, but yet carried himselfe most cruelly against those friends, that were of greatest familiaritie with him; because his sickness (howsoever shaddowed) increased daily impatience, which made him the more inclined to all villenies and tyrannie.

When he perceived, that there remained not any one of the Asmoneans Family, or of any other side, to interrupt him in his power, onely the multitude excepted; hee grew to such assurance of himselfe, that he did many things repugnant to the lawes of God, and the customes received by the Jewes. For, in the Citie of Jerusalem it selfe, hee builded a Theater and an Amphitheater, wherein were performed foule and dissolute plays, huntings, and combats of Fencers, according to the manner of the Pagans. He instituted also, (at every five yeares end) a lout and Tournament, in the honour of Augustus, propposing there publicly the Cæsars Images, and the Victories obtained by them. But vnderstanding, that the people were greatly offended with these vn-vsuall things, prohibited by the Lawes of God, and prouoking many to practise his killing, as also conspiring meanes whereby to effect it: he fortified diuers places very respectiue, against all ambushes and seditions; as Alexandria, Heradion, Hyracanon, and others, and planted strong garrisons in the most commodious places.

Hee builded also newly (or else magnificently repayed) diuerse Citties and Townes, which hee stiled by the names of Emperours, or of his friends: the principall whereof was the Tower of Straton on the Sea side, which hee called Cæsarea: and Samaria, distant a dayes iorney from Jerusalem, which hee called Sebastea, that is to say, Augustus, according to the Emperours name. Also, he repayed Athedon, which hee called Azrippion, of Agrippa, the kinsman to Cæsar. Hee builded Antipatrida, by the name of his father, in the field of Capharsalania. Also Phasélida, by the name of his brother, neare to Jericho: and Herodion, by his owne name, on the Marches of Arabia.

In the thirteenth yeare of his reigne, there happened a great dearth throughout the Land, by reason of an extraordinary drought; which was the cause, that a great famine did accompany the preceeding mortalitie of men and beasts: during which time, Herod caused diligent search for corne, & brought great quantities out of Egypt, and other neighbouring Regions beside, which he distributed (by the poule) to the people. But, because money grew short for such a distribution, in regarde that the royall treasure had bene wasted, about those sumptuous and excessive buildings; hee employed all his vessels of golde and silver, and all his Jewells besides, in the buying of corne. By which bounteous liberality, hee not onely redeemed the losse of his credite, by the offences done to his people, but also drew great fauour and affection from them.

In the fouenteenth yeare of his reigne, Augustus comming into Syria, gaue the Kingdome of Chalcis to Herode; adding also thereto Drachonitis*, and Batanea*. Moreover, he gaue him power, in this his long sickness, to appointing auditors, which which of his sonnes he pleased, to be his heire and successeur. In recompence of which large bountie, Herode dedicated a goodly Temple to Augustus, which hee builded in Panæda, neare to the fountes that feede the river Jordane. Which Pagan flattery of his, estranged agayne the multitude of the Jewes from him; and therefore to please them, hee quitted the third part of their taxations. Notwithstanding, as he could not containe some of them, crying out incessantly, that it was intolerable, to erect temples to mortal men in Iudea, and there to reuerence them as Gods: so hee sought to restraine other by violent torments, sending Spies and Pickethankes into publique and private Assemblies, who reported vnto the King whatsoever was spoken of him. It is further reported of him, that himselfe (sickely as hee was) in a common habite or disguise, would often walke abroad in the night time, listening in such companies as conferred together, to know what they said, concerning the present estate of the kingdome.

At length, finding neither loue nor fidelitie in the people, hee strove to binde them fast to him by oath; wherein hee preuayled, attracting some by large and goodly promises, to giue him their oath of Allegiance and Loyaltie: others hee constrained by feare of torments, putting some to death in diuers kindes, that peremptorily refused to sweare. Onely the Pharisees tooke excepted, whom hee pardoned, in loue to a few aged men, that hee reuerenced for their sanctitie of life, and which made them deare to the people. Neuerthelesse, hee condemned them in great fines and amercements, which were payed by the wife of Phariseas, to binde that Sect in loue to her. He quitted also the Effraims from taking the Oath, holding them in no meane admiration: as following a manner of living most holily, and farre exceeding humane nature; beeing singular in fore-telling things to come.

In the eighteenth yeare of his reigne, beeing desirous to vnit his subjects to him by farre greater benefices, and to abolish the remembrance of his precedent excesses: hee undertooke to builde the Temple of Jerusalem most magnificently, the former building (if heerein wee may beleue Iosaphus) beeing vtterly beaten downe, which building had continued five hundred yeares, after the returne from Babylon. This worke, admirable in greatness, sumptuousnesse and cunning, was finished in eight yeares, and dedicated with great solemnitie: wherein hee gaue three hundred Oxen for the Sacrifices, seauen yeares before the Natiuitie of Christ.

Afterward, the Disciples declared the magnificence of the building. And, as Christ fore-tolde, after that the Temple had continued about foure-score yeares, it was vtterly ruined by the Romans, from the top to the bottome.

The building of the Temple being ended, hee would needs be carried to Rome, to salute the Emperour Augustus: from thence hee brought with him his sonnes Alexander and Aristobolus, whom hee had by his murdered Mariana, and had sent them renne yeares before to Rome, to be brought vp in the house of Asinius Pollio. And the reason of his bringing them thence into Iudea, was, to quicken and cheare their hopes; that they were to succcede him in the kingdome. And first of all, he bestowed wines on them; giuing to Alexander, Glaphira, daughter to Archelaus, King of Cappadocia; and to Aristobolus, Berenice, daughter to his sister Salome.

These young Lords and Ladies, were very gracefull both in minde and bodie, which made them the more choicely affected of the people. But Salome, and some other (who had induced Herode to murder his wife, fearing if they should come to the Crowne, they would reuenge the death of their mother) laboured, by litle and litle, to kindle hatred in Herode against them, deliuering assertions abroad; that they disdayned their fathers company, because hee had put their mother to death.

Herode growing into health, by weak degrees, and these wicked deuices proceeding on; newes came, that Agrippa (neare kinsman to Augustus) was arrived in Asia, and Herode iourneying to meete him, quickly perswaded him to visite Iudea. Having giuen him there most honourable entertainment, and shewne him the munitions and other buildings; he returned to his Campe, making king great haste in going thither. The winter being over-past, Herode followed him, when he crossed to Pontus his armie by sea, and kept him company during the time of that expedition. Returning soon after to his owne home, hee found all in disorder, by domestike hatreds purposefully prepared. For his sister Salome, and his brother Pheroras, immediately accused Alexander and Aristobulus (being the sonnes of Marians) affirming, that they had openly complayed on the vniust death of their mother, and threatened to be reuenged for it. Heere to they added, that winning the Vulgars fauour without any dissimulation; they had prepared a traine for their ancient father: trusting to the power of Archelaus, father in lawe to one of them, and to the friendship of the Romains on the other side, which they had long both wrought to this intent, with the very mightiest in the Court of Augustus.

False accusations imposed on Alexander and Aristobulus, by Salome and Pheroras.

Herode layes trains to entrap his innocent sonnes upon the treacherous speeches of his brother and sister.

Herode enduring continually any thing, much rather then the least suspicion of vndermining his kingdome; became amazed mightily at these allegations, appointed some of his intimate friends, to be present at banquets, and other familiar conferences with his sonnes, to be the better assured of their words & attempts: When (perchance) the young Lords (neither proiecing or suspecting any ill) might utter some one word more liberally then other (being thereto prouoked by crosse language in the vrgers) purposefully deliuered forth, to draw somewhat from them, in extolling the nobilitie and vertue of their Mother, which is the bounden duty of any childe to doe. But this serued the turne sufficiently, for Herode to credit, that whatsoever his sister had reported, was true. First of all therefore, he reprehended them very seuerely; next, to induce their better modesty and reuerence to their father, by feare and ieaousie; he beganne to countenance, and carefully respect his sonne Antipater, (who was borne of Doris, when she liued a person of priuate condition) that they might thereby gather his intention, for making him to bee his successour in the kingdome.

A man willing to credit his sonne periwaded of their truth in any thing to his owne advantage.

This did more vehemently distaste the young Lords, and made them now to complaine more bitterly of their father, as also of their owne unhappinesse and vltage; all which behaviour in them, was imparted to their father by the afore-sayd intelligencing spies. Beside, Salome compelled her daughter Berenice (by frequent iniuries incited betwene her and her husband) to disclose what secrets passed betwene the two brothers, and what priuate conferences they had together. All which she made in much greater manner to the King, then they were indeed, onely by hir vile additions, and falsifications, incensing him still so extremely against them, that he tooke them both with him to Rome, and accused them of treason before Augustus.

A mother worketh a daughter against the life of her own husband.

There, after the infortunate Gentlemen had made satisfaction to Augustus and some other Iudges, by euident purgations, teares and intreaties, they were reconciled again into their fathers grace, and returned home with him to Iudea: where the Multitude being met together, he declared before them the cause of his iourney, and to what happie success it had sortd. Adding withall, that (by the liking of Augustus) Antipater was next to succcede after his death, as being his eldest sonne; and then afterward, Alexander and Aristobulus should enioy their right, in reigning each after other; all which hee reported to the people in a long discourse, which we haue formerly related in our Militarie Orationes.

Augustus reconciled the sons to their father.

From this time forward, Antipater insisted the more audaciously, in whetting the fathers spleene against his brethren, by false, forged and crafty calumniationes; beside diuers other reports of nouelties, meereley deuised for the purpose. He being highly displeased, that they should haue any title or claime at all to the kingdome: as fretting extremely, that their credite held more specially with the people then theirs did, for the mothers sake of whom they came. In briefe, he neuer ceased, till (by the helpe of Pheroras and Salome) till he had periwaded his father, that his two sonnes Alexander and Aristobulus, were growne proude vpon their reconciliation, and practised (instantly) to possesse themselves of the Kingdome. Herode being further informed of those accusations, by such as were employed for the purpose; by racking, torturing and other cruelties, put to death many of his

And yet no other harme could bee approved against them, but onely youthfull and vnadvised complaints, of excessive cruelty in their father; and his ouercastie facilitie, in lending eare to false reports, only through the detestable impietie of their brother Antipater, and them of his lineage.

The two brethren accused againe by letters to Augustus.

Herode impatient at so many suspitions, and fiered hourly with the diuells of his house, Salome, Antipater and their complices: once more, by his letters sent to Augustus, hee flatly accused Alexander and Aristobulus of treason. Now, because Augustus had giuen him permission, to punish his sonnes according to the exigence of their crimes: hee accused them before Saturninus and Volumnius, Governours of Syria, and other Romaine Citizens his friends there present, whom hee had caused to come from Iudea to Beritha, a Cittie of Syria: Alter that they were condemned by pluralitie of voyces, he sent them to be strangled in Sebasta: where likewise were executed three hundred persons more, who were said to giue consent, to an imaginarie flight imposed vpon the two innocent Princes. Aristobulus at his death left three sonnes and two daughters, which hee had by his wife Berenice; and Alexander two sonnes by Glaphyra; besides some daughters, whereof we will speake in their due place and time.

Pheroras poisoned by his wife.

From this time forward, Herode beganne to be very vnfortunate, because all his Court was troubled with bitter hatreds, disdaines, suspitions and treasons: so that Antipater (compacting with Pheroras and some other Courtiers) determined to kill the King his father. And as hee was plotting priuily, how he might be called to Rome by Augustus, for better strengthening himselfe with the Emperours power, and winning friends in his Court by gifts: it came to passe that Pheroras dyed, whose wife was accused before Herode by some of her owne friends, to haue poisoned her husband. Herode making inquisition after this offence by tortures, chaunced (by little and little) to come to the knowledge of farre greater crimes, and the treasons of his sonne Antipater plainly appeared.

Heereupon, the King being extremally enraged, spared not any of his Court from torturing cruelly; no not so much as the women and their daughters, very neare in loue and kindred to him, if hee could suspect them in the very least manner. And as hee stroue to informe himselfe, by all his best and diligent meanes, so much the more hee grew to be hated of all his followers, so that (consequently) he became worse then miserable.

Herod tortures his courtiers cruelly.

Onely his Sister Salome, was faithful to him, who compassed the means by craftie Spies, to finde out the plots of all the Conspirators, which shee still revealing to her brother, enflamed his fury extraordinarily: making him to distrust them that were most familiar with him, by forged tales and faithlesse suspitions. So that Herode accused Antipater (who was taken with the poyson readily prepared for his father) before Quintilius Varus (who was slayne by Arminius Cheruschus in Germanie, twelue yeres after with Legions) and being convicted of the sinne of parricide, and condemned; hee commaunded him to bee kept prisoner, vntill by Letters and Ambassadors, hee vnderstoode the will and pleasure of Augustus, concerning his punishment.

In the meane while, hee executed many, both men and women, as being consenting to Antipaters attempts: amongst whome were diuerse innocents, wrongfully accused by malicious enemies, and meereley swallowed vp in Herodes furie, as in the roaring billowes of the Sea.

Mallice will hardly want matter to worke on.

Soone after, being about the age of seauentie yeares, quast and confounded with domestike calamities: his former sickenesse grew now to farre greater violence vpon him, which made him ten times more cruell towards his subiects. For now hee was verily periwaded, that the Iewes reioyced as much at his homebred miseries, as they did at the extremitie of his disease. Wherefore hee deuised very cruell punishments, for matters of filly or small offence: for hee burned alie fortie young Schollers, of the very chiefeest houses in Iudea, with two Masters that were excellent men: because (being moued with iust griefe, to see the Temple of God prophaned) they had ouerthrowne (somewhat violently) an Eagle of golde, placed in the Portall of the Temple, and in the honor of Casar; a thing very costly and magnificent; but contrary to the customes of the Iewish nation. The monstrous crueltie inflicted vpon these yong men, was the cause of great troubles in the Cittie, after Herodes death.

Hee exercised also other great cruelties, amongst which, Philo the Iew recordeth, that in the thirtieth yeare of his tyrannicall reigne, he slew the Sanhedrin: to wit, the ordinary Iudges of the house of Danid, and substituted other (newly conuerced to Iudaisme, or skillfull in the Lawe) in their stead. Moreover, he slew the husband of his sister Salome, who was of the Tribe or Linage of Iuda, and a Sonne, which hee himselfe begate of a woman of the same Tribe; because hee had sayd, that Christ our Sauour was already borne, who was promised in the Lawe, and by the Prophets, to be of the house of Dauid.

Also Saint Matthew the Euangelist, in the second chapter and fixteenth verse, maketh mention of an other notable example of his crueltie, where he writeth, that being aduertised by the wife men of Persia, that the Messias was borne: hee gaue strict commaund, that all the male Children should be murdered, in the Towne of Bethlehem, and all the villages round about.

Macrobius is a witnesse of this most inhumane act, who recounteth (amongst the witty conceits of Augustus) that hearing report of the Infants slaughter, from two yeares olde and vnder, caused by Herode to be done in Syria, and his owne sonne, being also slayne among them, hee sayd: That he had much rather be Herodes Hogge, then his Sonne.

Moreover, feeling his entrails to rot and putrifie, his blood and flesh boyling, and vermine creeping all ouer his bodie, despayring of liuing any longer: by Edict, he assembled the chiefe of the Iews, such as excelled the rest in wisdom, wealth and authoritie; causing them to come from all parts of the Kingdome to Iericho.

Being there arrived vpon his commaund, they were thither vppen in the place appointed for Triumphs, as if hee purposed to conferre with them before his death, of some important matter concerning the State of the Kingdome. But hee gaue charge to his sister Salome, and to her husband Alexas, that so soone as hee had giuen vp the Ghost: they should dispatch the liues of the mightiest Iewes by the Archers of his Guard, coueting by this meanes, to make a wofull lamentation amongst the Iewes, who else would reioyce at theyr Kings miserable end.

Besides, that they should thus keepe (without any manner of impeachment) the possession of the Kingdome for his sonnes, when they of greatest power were dead and gone.

Now, albeit Salome, and her husband made promise to the King, for the execution of his bloody will: yet after his death, and before they made any declaration thereof, they let loose all the Iewes, without offering them the least iniury, accounting it to be neither safe for them, nor the children of Herod, to obey such a barbarous and inhumane injunction.

A little before his death, the Ambassadors which returned from Italy, did bring him Letters from Augustus, whereby hee gaue him power ouer his Sonne Antipater, eyther for life or death. But the rage of the Father was now somewhat cooler, wherefore hee commaunded, that his Sonne should be brought to Iericho; but yet to keepe him still in bands.

It fortuned, that Herod (liuing in such horrible and extreame torments, with stinking putrification of his body:) sodainly caught a knife, and sought for the fittest place to ridde himselfe out of those paines.

But Archelaus, one of his kinsmen, and other seruants (being by) hindered his violent intent of murdering himselfe: wherewith, a great tumult and out-cry ranne throughout the whole Pallace; euen as if the King had bene dead. Antipater being prisoner, and vnderstanding, why these cries came thus from euery place: beganne to be very iocund and mirthfull, euen as if his father were dead indeede, and would haue induced the Guardes to let him haue liberty, vpon very liberall promises he made to them.

But he that had the especiall charge of him, fearing the crueltie of the King, went to see whether he was dead or no: reporting to him his sonnes merry disposition, and the matter which he had so earnestly moued him vnto.

Herode mightily offended at these tidings, commaunded, that (without any delay) his son Antipater should be slayne in prison. Which being done, himselfe liued but fiewe dayes after his sonne. So that, what with the violence of his sickness, encreasing the torments of his soule, he died: hauing reigned foure and thirtie yeares after the surprizall of Ierusalem; and fawen and thirtie yeares after the Romaines had proclaimed him King. A man equally euell to all men: from base and lowe degree, exalted to eminent places of honour, by industrie, bountie and friendship: very happy abroad, and vnfortunate amongst his owne, and hated (both of his subiects and domesticks) for his crueltie.

All the time of his gouernement, hee had contention and quarrell principally with three aduersaries. First of all, against the Family of the Asmoneans, which hee strove vtterly to extirpate by all his policies: Secondly, against the Iewish people, who could not endure the dominion of a stranger: and although they kicked continually against him, yet finally they were charged with a hard yoke of seruitude. The third aduersarie, more troublesome and difficult then both the rest, was his owne household people. For, as hee slew one part of them (being no way guilty or offensive towards him) by listening to false reportes of the enuious, and according to his owne suspicions, still to support his greedie desire of rule: so did hee punish others taken in the fact, who indeede conspired against him, vntill such time, as being more broken and battered by his domesticke encumbrances, then by extremitie of age; he payed the tribute due to Nature. Philo the Iew writeth, that hee reigned fixe yeares lawfully, and one and thirtie yeares tyrannically.

In the three and thirtie yeare of his reigne (as it is auouched by Epiphanius) vnder the first description of the Word: Iesus Christ, our blessed Sauour and Redeemer, was borne in Bethlehem of the Virgine Mary. At the age of two yeares, by the Angelles admonition, hee was with-drawne from the crueltie of this wretch, by his father and mother, who fled with him into Egypt. Afterwardes, hee was brought backe againe into Iudea, at the beginning of the Primacie of Archelaus.

Herode altered his Will three severall times: The first change was, after hee had put to death his two sonnes by Marians the Asmonean, and then hee sent it by the hands of Antipater (hee going to Rome) to Augustus. That Will confirmed as his heire in the Kingdome, Antipater, his eldest sonne by Doris: but yet with this condition, that if he dyed before the time, his sonne Herode, whom hee had by the daughter of Simon the high-priest, should succede him. To whom (vpon this occasion) according to the opinion of Iosephus, hee had giuen in marriage Herodias, the daughter to Ariobolus, sonne of Marians the Asmonean.

After the death of Pheroras, brother to Herode, the treasons began to be discovered, and the King being informed, that the Mother of Herode, his destinated successor (and daughter to the Soueraigne Sacrificer) had consented in wicked counsell with Antipater: hee razed the names both of Antipater and Herode out of his Will, frustrating them from all hope of euer coming to the Crowne.

Beside, he expelled the two mothers, Doris and Mariana, out of the Pallace, despoyling also his father in lawe Simon, of the High-priesthoode.

In his second Testament, hee left the Kingdome to his last sonne, named Herode Antipas, and hee to succcede after his death, being borne of Martha a Samaritane. Therein hee made no mention at all of Archelaus, nor of Phillip, who were elder in yeares then hee: because, by the suggestion of Antipater, some of his friends had falsely accused them by Letters, in the time of their studying at Rome.

By the same Testament, he left a thousand Talents to Augustus, which amounteth to three score runnes of Golde. To Liua the wife of Augustus, and to the children and enfranchised friends of Augustus, hee gaue fiewe hundred Talents, that is to say, thirtie runnes of golde.

Last of all, after that (a little before

In stead of King, hee made Antipas Tetrarch of Galilee and Perea, that is to say, of the Region situate beyond Jordane.

Herode Antipas and Phillip made both Tetrarchies.

In like manner, hee appoynted Philip Tetrarch of Gallonitida, Traconitis, Balanea and Paneda. To his Sister Salome (who amongst all his kintred) he had onely found faithfull to him, and helpfull in all his aduertities, hee left three wealthy Citties, Tumia, Azot and Phaselida, with fiftie thousand Crownes besides.

Hee assigned great reuenues to his other sonnes, and to their children, whom hee left in priuate condition, and augmented the Legacies which he had sent to Auquitus and other at Rome. But Auquitus (afterwards) distributed all the money to him appoynted to Herodes kintred; retayning nothing to himselfe, but onely certayne costly vessells, as a token of remembrance for the dead.

Histoire, in regarde that the Description made by Iosephus, is somewhat different. Especially in Herodias, whom Iosephus sayth, to be sometime married,

not to Phillip the Tetrarch, as the Euan-gelist Saint Mark, in the sixteenth chapter and seauenteenth verse of his Gospell auoucheth, but to Herod, sonne to the daughter of Simon the High-priest, who soone after was aduanced, and ioyned
with Herode Antipas Tetrarch of Galilee, that slew Saint Iohn Baptist.

He sayth besides, that the dauncing daughter of Herodias, was married to Phillip: But the authoritie of the Euan-gelists ought to be of greater weight with vs, then to that of Iosephus, who in this Genealogie of Herode, speaketh things
very contrary, which is not much to bee maruelled at, in a Familie of so great extendure. For King Herode, according to the ancient manner of the Kings of Iu-dea, had many wiues together, in all being tenne, two whereof were barren,

Doris his first wife.

Her he married in priuate condition,
taking her from a place of slender repute,
her father beeing as then liuing. Of her hee begate Antipater, whom hee dis-inherited, his mother Doris beeing dior-ced, after he was married to Mariana the Asmenean: nor would hee permit her to be present in Ierusalem, but onely at three famous solemnities.

But after that Mariana was put to death, hee receiued Doris againe into his Court, and gaue her admittance to his bedde, re-calling home the sonne
also: beeing fully resolu'd, to haue left him heyre to the Kingdome, if hee had not bene the cause of his owne ruine and death, by wicked machinations, continued against his father and brethren;
beside, hee brought his owne mother into the dislike of his father.

Antipater tooke to wife the daughter of Antigonus, the last King of the *Asme-
neans*, by whom hee had also Antipater, to whom hee was married the daughter of Pheroras his great vnckle. Afterward hee married Mariana, daughter vnto his

that he could no otherwise enjoy her, but by lawfull marriage; made her father Simeon (sonne to Boethus) High-priest, by deposing Iesus, the successeur to *Ana-

Of her hee begate Herode the second, whom he had instituted (in his first Will) second heire after Antipater his eldest sonne. But growing offended (afterward) for some fault in his mother: hee altered his Will, and deprived him of all hope of succeeding.

Iosephus writeth, that this Herode the second (who alwayes afterward liued pri-uately) tooke to wife Herodias, the daughter of Aristobulus, slaine by his father; who afterward was exalted by his brother *He-nealogie of Iosephus agreeth not with Saint Marke, who ruleth it in this manner.

Herode, the second, borne of the High-charge.

His wife Herodias that left him, married with the brother to her husband.

The daughter Salome was married to the last;

The issue of Herode by his fourth wife

Olympia, married to Iosippus, sonne of Iosippus the brother to King Herode: Of whom came this Posteritie following:

Mariana, espoused to Herod the fourth, King of Chalcis, and had a sonne named Aristobulus, who (by Nero) was instituted Gouverneur of Armenia the lesser. He had to wife Salome, the daughter of Herodias, as formerly hath bene declared.

The fifth wife of Herode was Cleopatra of Jerusalem, whose children were Phillip, who (by the last Testament of his father) was appointed Tetrarch of Trachonitis.

Herode, of whom I finde nothing recorded in any Historie.

But, considering that Iosippus saith, that this Phillip was brother to the father and mother of Archelaus; I make some doubt of diuers other places before mentioned by him, where (perhaps by want of memory) he wrongeth himselfe in the numbering of Herodes children; as in the second Chapter of the same Booke. And that of the same mother Marthaca, were borne Archelaus, Phillip and Olympia: And that of this Cleopatra, issued only Herode, called Antipas. From whence it proceeded (as I thinke) that Iosippus attributed two sonnes vnto this Cleopatra, Phillip and Herode: of whom (nevertheless) he maketh not any mention in his Historie.

I thinke then, that Antipas should be placed for Phillip vnder Cleopatra; for, because he nameth Herode also: some (not very skillfull) haue attributed two sonnes to Cleopatra: euen as if I should say, that Iulius and Cæsar had bene two Consuls. Assuredly, this coniecture seemeth to be confirmed, because Archelaus (being vpon his departure to Rome, after the death of his father) left all the care and managing of the kingdome affaires to Phillip, as to his nearest and dearest brother; and not to Antipas, whom he ought to haue preferred before Phillip, if hee had bene his germaine brother by the same mother. But this shewes it selfe much more evidently, in regard that Iosippus, in the thirteenth and foureteenth Chapters of the same fouenteenth Booke, saith: That Archelaus journeying to Rome, tooke along with him his mother Marthaca, who dyed there, before the suite (concerning the succession) was decided; and that (soone after) Antipas followed him, who likewise was accompanied with his mother. It must needs follow then necessarily, that they had diuersitie of mothers. Wherefore it somewhat amazeth mee, that Iosippus repeateth in the Historie of the Iewes warres, to haue spoken ill in his Antiquities: to wit, that Archelaus and Antipas were brethren by one mother.

The sixth wife of Herode, was Pallas, who had a sonne named Phafelus, of whom Iosippus writeth nothing.

The seauenth wife was Phadra, who had by Herod (being then ancient) a daughter named Roxana.

The eighth wife of Herode, was Elpis, by whom hee had a daughter named Salome.

Afterward, Augustus married the two sonnes of Phororas, to these two sisters, Roxana and Salome, beeing but young when their father died. To whom (beside the Legacies of their father) hee added (of his owne) in their dowrie, two hundred thousand peeces of silver money: which summe, if Iosippus doe vnderstand Drachmaes thereby, as I imagine, it amounteth to five and twentie thousand crownes of the Sunne.

The ninth wife, was the daughter of his brother, whom Iosippus nameth not.

The tenth, was his Cousine germane, ynnamed also.

By these two wiues Herode had not any children.

All this so great lineage of Herode, failed (well-neare utterly) within the space of seuen yeares, the most part of them liuing in private manner. Such as attained to gouernement of affaires, and succeeded in some small portions of their fathers dignitie; were only three sonnes of Herode, to wit, Archelaus the Ethnarch, Phillip and Antipas, Tetrarches, and two younger sonnes; the first Agrippa, King of Iudea, and Herod the fourth King of Chalcis; Agrippa the last, in whose reigne was the Iewish warre, and the destruction of Jerusalem. I will speake briefly of them all in order.

CHAP. XVI.

Of the Ethnarchie of Archelaus; and the plea of him and his Brother Antipas before Augustus, for the right of Gouernment.

BY the last Testament of the Father (as I haue already sayd) Archelaus was appointed successor with royall power; provided, that Augustus would be so pleased. But scarcely was the fathers body interred, when a great mutiny arose in the City, and he lost his peoples affection by cruelty. For some of the kindred & parents of the yong scholars that wer burned alio, about bearing down the golden Eagle, returning to the Feast at Easter, mouing the people by their teares and complaints to challenge reuenge of certaine slanderous persons, and deposition of the Soueraigne Sacrificer, whom Herode had established in the ending of his dayes: Archelaus sent his Light horsemen against the people, and made a bloody slaughter, to the number of three thousand, beside diuers put to flight. After that, the tumult was for a time appeased, hee left the charge of his kingdome affaires to his brother Phillip, and tooke his journey to Rome, accompanied with his mother Marthaca, and some other friends, to require of Augustus the full establishment of his Fathers Will.

By the suggestion of their Aunt Salome, Herode Antipas followed after his Brother, to contend with him for succession in the kingdome before Augustus. There hee accused him of cruelty, approouing, that the Crowne should rather bee his, then any due to Archelaus; because by the second testament, he was onely ordained heyre to the Royall dignitie; when his father Herode was found both in bodie and memory. And such a Will so made, ought to bee of farre greater respect and weight, then the last so neere his death; when both body and mind were vncapeable of sense and reason.

Soone after, fifty Ambassadors were sent from the people of Iudea to Rome, to entreate, that they might no longer be gouerned by a King: but rather that Iudea (being reduced to the form of a Province) might be vnder command of the Romane Captaines (as afterward it was, but to the Iewes no great aduantage.) But if hee needs they must haue a King, and of Herodes posterity: they openly confessed, that they much rather affected Herode Antipas, then Archelaus, who (at his very entrance) gaue them sufficient vnderstanding, what mildnesse and moderation they should afterwarde expect in him.

While this sute was thus in hearings, and Augustus consulted thereon, with some of his most intimate friends; greuous tumults chanced to be moued; first, by Sabinus, Procurator for Cæsar in Jerusalem, and afterward in diuers other places of Iudea. For some people (of no worth) emboldened by the Kings absence, hauing gathered together certaine companies of Theeues; durst attribute vnto themselves, both the Royall dignity and Ornaments. During which time, Iudea was wonderfully waisted in manie places with fire and sword; vntill (by the vertue of Quintilius Varus, who scattered the armies of the Theeues, and hanged vpe about two thousand, such as were cheefe Leaders in the sedition) the danger was well ouer-blowne.

These troubles being certified by Letters to Rome by Varus, caused Augustus (hauing ended the sute concerning the succession) to send backe the Sonnes of Herode to Iudea againe. But he had diuided the whole kingdome of Herode into two partitions: one whereof hee gaue to Archelaus, whom hee named Ethnarche, which dignity he afforded to be greater then that of Tetrarche, & yet much lesse then Royall power. Promising (nevertheless) that he would make him King, after he had made triall of his industry & moderation in this gouernment. Moreover, hee diuided the other part into two Tetrarchies, which he gaue to the two Brethren to Herode Antipas, Galilee and Pærea; the reuenewes whetof amounted to two hundred Talents; that is fixe score thousand Crownes of the Sun. But the Ethnarchie of Archelaus, which containd Iudæa, Iudea, and Samaria, valewed fixe hundred Talents in reuenewes.

Archelaus being come backe into *Jujects (by whose accusation, hee had not only lost his Kingly authority, but almost the halfe part of his government) began to carry himselfe cruelly towards them, and (for small or no causes at all) did put to death such persons, as hee imagined had desired the alteration of the State.

Moreover, he highly soyled his reputation, with marriage prohibited by the laws of God. For at his returne from Rome, as he passed throw Cappadocia, to visite his kinsman king Archelaus; hee found there Glaphyra (widowed the second time)
who had bene first married to Alexander that was put to death by his Father Herod with his broder Aristobulus. After his death, her Father in law Herode, sent her (with her dowry) vnto her owne father, where she was remarried to Imba King of the Numidians; who being likewise dead,
she came and lived with hir father again.
Archelaus (inueigled with her beautie)
tooke her to wife, notwithstanding shee had bene married to his brother Alexander, divorcing his owne wife, named Mariana. This Glaphyra died a little before Archelaus was sent into exile, being afrighted with a dreame; wherein shee seemed to see the ghost of her first husband, reprooving her for this wicked marriage with his brother.

Finally as he ceased not from committing extraordinary cruelties; so hee chan-held the principality, from the death of

after hee had bene conuicted by sufficient Witnesses, hee was sent into Dauiphne, where hee died; without leaving any chil-confiscated to the Romaine Emperour, treies (each of them) two yeares, even vntill

sor Tiberius sent Valerius Gratus into *Ju-

Tracottis, & of the neighbouring Regions beyond Iordane; euen from the Springs of Tyberias or Genesareth, to the Springs of Iordane, and the foot of Mount Libanus. Hee governed this his Tetrarchie the space of seuen and thirty yeeres (with great commendation for iustice and modesty) which hee also beautified with many goodly Buildinges:
For in Panemda, neere to the sources of Iordane (where sometime his Father Herod had erected and dedicated a Temple to Augustus) hee builded a Cittie, which he called Cesarea of Philippi: and another vpon the lake of Genesareth, named Bethsaida; which encreasing and growing into great wealth, hee called it Tullida, after the name of the wife to Augustus.

in marriage Salome, the daughter of *He-iointed with his Brother.

fied, rose from the dead againe, and the

Of the life and death of Herod Antipas, brother to Phillip, and Tetrarche of Samaria and Peraea, &c.

His Herode Antipas, by the second Will was instituted successor to his Father. But the Testament being altdred, hee was ordained Tetrarche,
and had (for his partage) Samaria and Pe-rea, which is a most fertile Region beyond Iordane, betweene the Lakes of Tyberias and Alphalsida. Neuertheless, being not contented with his Fathers gift, and trusting to the precedent Will; hee contended at Rome with his Brother before Augustus, touching the possession of the kingdome. All which notwithstanding, hee obtained nothing else but the Tetrarchie left him by his father, & then again confirmed to him. Hee took first to wife the daughter of Aretas, King of Arabia, living with him more then fiftene yeares. But afterward, being called to Rome, passing along by Phillip the Tetrar-che, or (as Iosephus writeth) by Herode the second, borne of the daughter to the high Priest: being enamoured on Herodias, daughter to his brother Aristobulus, hee contracted marriage with her, promising to repudiate his Arabian wife.

Being returned from Italy, hee tooke away from his Brother, Herodias and her daughter Salome; whereat the daughter of Aretas finding her selfe offended (secretly disguised) fled to her father in Arabia; whereupon ensued a lamentable war.
For Aretas, purposing to reuenge this vniust diuorce of his daughter, sent a potent Army against Herode; which did vtterly ouerthrow all his Forces, notwithstanding their strength and multitude in number.

This Herode Antipas, detained S. John Baptist sometime prisoner in the strongdefenced City of Macheron (situated on the Marches of Perea and Arabia, neere to the lake Alphalsida): because hee hadde boldly reprooued him for this incestuous marriage; where the Adulteresse found the meanes (afterward) to haue his head smitten off. The same Herode laboured subtly to entrap Christ, as he was teaching in Galilee; and afterward, when Pilate

sent him prisoner to him, hee sent him backe againe opprobriously, because (at his request) Christ would not worke any miracle before him.

He likewise embellished his Tetrarchie with faire buildinges; for (to his great charges) hee builded Sepphorim, a Cittie of Galilee, which hee caused to bee called Antocratorida. Hee called another Tullida, by the name of Augustus wife, which before was named Betharama. After the death of Augustus, because hee had bene a kinde friend to Tyberius; hee builded a new City in honour of him, neere to the Lake of Genesareth, which hee commanded to be called Tyberias. But because the place was prophaned by great heapes of dead bodies there buried, so that (by Moyse Lawe) it was not lawfull to dwell there, hee allured some (by diuers commodities and immunities) to builde there, making habitations for poore people; compelling the rich and mighty, to inhabit (with their families) in this new City.

In the second yeare of the Empire of Caius Caligula, when Agrippa the Brother of Herodias returned from Rome into Judea, adorned (against all attempters) with the royall dignity: Herode, by the continuall injuries of his wife, was enforced to vndertake a iourney to Rome, to entreate the royall dignity of the Emperour. For this woman (burning with ambition) said it was vn-sufferable, that her Brother Agrippa (being but a while before poore & beggerly, and so farre indebted, that hee was made seruite to his Creditors) should now triumph with a Kingly Crowne, surmounting his Vnckle in power and dignity, hee hauing bene to him as a nursing Father, and adiudged (by the second testament) worthy of the kingdome.

Antipas, prouoked by the incessant in-tigations of this arrogant woman, went vnto Rome with her; desiring of the Emperor Caius, to enioy the name and dignity Royall: beside, by manie greuous accusations, hee practised to make Agripa hateful to the Emperour. But Agrippa (aduertised of his Vnckles voyage and intent) preuented him, and sent letters before him by an intimate friend: wherein he informed Caius, that Herode Antipas was confenting in the conspiracie of Seianus, against Tiberius, and that now (having close intelligence with the King of the Parthians) there was some noetic intended against Caius. A matter easily to be conieured, by the great preparation for Armes which Antipas made: whereby, in an instant, he could be suddenly furnished with an Army of three-score and tenne thousand able fighting men.

Caligula, incensed by this report from his friends, demanded of Herode, what prouision hee had in a readinesse for his Tetrarchie; Where to hee answered: That he had all things fitting for a King. Whereupon Caius instantly commaunded, that hee should be carried prisoner to Lions in France, and there kept in perpetual exile. Moreover, by his Letters, hee gaue all his goods, with the Tetrarchie of Galilee and Perea, to Agrippa: except what appertained in proprietic to his sister Herodias, whom he reputed innocent, and for her hee would haue all to be intirely referred, if she would returne into Iudea againe. But Herodias, thanking Caius for his liberality, replied: That presently she could not make any vse of this great fauour, because she held it vnreasonable, to leaue her husband in this calamitie, whom she had alwayes accompanied in his flourishing prosperitie, and raised thereof very royally.

Thus spake this subtle woman, as hoping thereby, that the Emperor would alter his rigorous sentence, concerning the condemnation of Herode, and that shee should not vndergoe the selfe-same censure, considering his supposal of her innocencie. But Caius (being highly displeased at her haughtie stomacke) commaunded, that being dispoyled of all her goods, shee should walke with her husband in the same nature of exile. Thus Herode was the instrument of his owne harme, by listning (ouer-lightly) to the persuasions of this ambitious woman: for, if he could haue contented himselfe with his estate, hee had longer time enjoyed peaceably his dignitie of Tetrarch. But they both deferred iustly this heauie penaltie; because, being ioyned together by incestuous marriage, and charitably admonished in the greatnesse of their sinne: they did put to death the most innocent man Saint Iohn Baptist, vnder colour of a rash oath, pretending conscience.

This great downe-fall happened vnto them, about tenne yeares after the beheading of Saint Iohn; eight yeares after Herode had hunted Iesus Christ, and sent him bound (clothed like a foole in white) as vnwilling to endure his presence. There is not any thing recorded of his Posteritie, but that the Principallitie of Iudea went from the sonnes of Great Herode, to a younger sonne of another sonne Aristobulus and Marians an Asmonean, to wit, to Agrippa and Herode, of whom I haue here let downe the Ancestors and Posteritie.

CHAP. XIX.

The life of Agrippa, the first man of that name, coming to be King of Iudea.

Little before the death of his grand-father Herode, being as then but eight yeares olde, this Agrippa was sent to Rome, and there nourished with Drusus, the sonne of Tyberius. Hee was greatly affected by Anthonia mother of Germanicus and Claudius the Emperour, in regard of his mother Berenice; whom she loued as if she had beene her sister.

Being come to age, he retired into Iudea, after the death of Drusus: because Tyberius expelled from his court, all them that had beene friends to his deceased sonne; as fearing lest the sight of them, should bee the renewing of his sorrow. But Agrippa became charged with great doubts, wherinto he had entred at Rome, after the expence of all his owne meanes. Wherefore he wandred abroad for (some times) with his wife Cypri, beggerly, poore, and vtterly abandoned of his friends; so that at length, shame and pinching pouertie would haue prouoked him to shorten his life. But his wife Cypri, making humble supplications to Herodias, the sister of her husband: she preauailed so farre, that Herode Antipas the Tetrarche, builded a house for him in the city of Tiberias, and assigned him there a yearely reuenue. Not long had Agrippa enjoyed this benefite by his brother in law, but Herode growing offended at his table, for some wordes spoken by Agrippa, ouer-boldely reprovoued him angrily, terming him a begger, and a vagabond, and that he liued by his bounty.

Agrippa grieuing at this reproach, forooke this fauour afforded by Herode: and borrowing some small store of money, of one that respected him, but at extracme interest; once more hee intended to visite Rome, and there againe to make triall of his fortune. Hee went to salute Tyberius in the Isle of Capree, where he found gracious entertainment for a few dayes: vntill some Agent for the Emperour, wrote backe from Iudea, that Agrippa did owe thirtie thousand Crownes of the Sunne, to the Receiuers of the Emperour. Beside, that he had formerly made many escapes, euen when the dayes for repayment came, vsing nothing but subtle and colosing shifts.

Tyberius much offended at these rydings, commaunded Agrippa to auoide his Court, vntill hee had made full satisfaction: which hee did (with great difficulty) by the meane of Madame Antonia. Wherewith Tyberius was so well pleased, that hee appoynted him the guardian of his twinne sonne Tyberius. But a little before the death of Tyberius, once againe he fell into his disfauour. For, being at supper one night, with Caius, the yoong adopted sonne of Tyberius, among other speeches passing at the Table; Agrippa wished, that olde Tyberius might quickly die, to the end that Caius should enioy the Empire.

This wish comming to the eares of Tyberius, Agrippa (by the Emperours commaund) was clapt vp in close prison, and there so kept, vntill such time as Tyberius deceased. Caius, well assisted by his warlike troupes, and by his father Germanicus, came to enioy the Empire, and hauing released Agrippa out of prison; adorned him with the habits becomming a King, subiecting also those countries to him, which Phillip the Tetrarch, and Lysanias formerly had commaunded. Moreover, he gaue him a chaine of gold, of equalitie in weight to the yron chaine, wherewith he was bound lying in prison. Hee remained a yeare with the Emperour Caius at Rome; and then tooke leaue of him for his returne to Iudea, to take possession of his kingdom.

Thus you see, that hee who (before) was not onely despised, in regard of his necessitie and great debts, but also durst not abide in any place, for the importunite of his creditors; was (to the admiration of all such as sawe him in that wofull miserie) raised to the magnificence royall, which which caused some to tremble, that denied and refused to aide him, or had iniuriously repulst him, while he lived in private estate and extreme poverty. Soone after, Caius Caligula gaue him Gabrie and Berca, with all the cheuifance of Herode Antipas his emulatur, and of his sister Herodias, as in our last Chapter we haue related: wherefore, after he had taken order for his kingdome affaires, hee tooke his journey towards Rome, with gifts and presents, to declare (on his owne behalfe) what seruices and acknowledgement hee made, for so many gracious fauors done to him by Caius.

During the time that Agrippa was at Rome, there happened a strife betweene the Citizens of Alexandria, and the Jewes dwelling in the same Citie: so that (by lottes) Ambassadors were sent on eyther part to the Emperour. Amongest whom was Philo the Jew, whose testimony we haue diuers times made vse of, in the course of this present Historie. There the Jewes were sharply accused by a Greeke named Appian, for many faults, and especially, for oblitinate contempt of the Imperiall dignitie: because in all parts of those Citties where the Jewes dwelt, they would not suffer any Statues or Images of the Emperour Caius to be erected; but if any were set vpp, immediately they would throw them downe very opprobriously.

Caligula being very furiously moued with this complaint, repulst the Iewish Ambassadors, somewhat rudely, and wrote to Petronius, (who from the beginning of his Empire, he had sent Gouvernour into Iudea) that with all the haste he could possibly vse, hee should erect the Emperours Statue, in the most holy place of the Temple of Ierusalem, if not by consent of the Jewes, yet in despite of them, and (by force of Armes) whether they would or no.

Petronius, willing to obey this command, yet knowing the execution would not be easie; called the Legions from all parts, & being prouided of sufficient succor, went from Syria to Ptolemais, carrying a braue army along with him. But first he made knowne to the Jewes (by Ambassadors and Letters,) wherefore he came in such dreadfull manner, as grounded vpon the Emperours command; desiring the people, that he might rather perforce it by their good liking, then by the course of force & violence. The Jewes, not a little affrighted at these news, came from a great number of Townes and Citties, into the fields before Ptolemais, bringing no arms or weapons with them: but entreating Petronius, not to fulfill so wicked a command, protesting, that they would rather endure a thousand deaths, then suffer the Temple to be prophaned with the Statue of a man.

Contrariwise, Petronius admonished them to take heede, lest this their stiffnecked opiniõ, should procure the countries desolation by fire and sword; alleging shil vnto them, the sterne commands of the Emperour, how gracious hee had bene towards him, and (being angrily moued) would admit no mercy, to such as disobeyed him in the least manner, approving his speeches by examples, of diuers tormented in strange kinds. He further desired them to pardon him, in not denying to execute the Emperours charge imposed on him: because they knew well enough themselves, that neuer any refused to fulfill his command, but was extremely punished for it. Wherefore, hee rather intended to aduenture his life, in fighting against their whole Nation: then to bee held remisse or negligent, in what the Emperour had enioyned him.

Heereupon the multitude resolved to insist, entreating him to pardon their religion and iust constancie, if (more fearing God, the Creator of heauen and earth, and hauing often experimented his heauy wrath, by their transgressing his commandements) they did now oppose themselves against the Emperours will, being full of impietie. Considering also, that Petronius himselfe confessed, that he stood in such feare of a mortall man (whose life was vncertaine) that he held it no safetie for his person, to transgresse the least of his commandments.

Petronius, amazed at this obstinacie in the people, and (after that the assembly was disperfed) finding himselfe in great perplexitie, what hee should doe in this dangerous case; paused a while vpon it. For, hee had bene particularly admonished by Aristobolus, brother to King Agrippa, and some other Princes of Iudea, with earnest imprecations, not to foyle himselfe himselfe, with the innocent blood of so great a multitude, by the wicked command of the Emperours; because in so doing, hee should brand the Romaine Empire, with so infamous a note of cruelty, as the like was neuer heard of before, destroying a whole Nation, for refusing to suffer the Image of a sinfull man, to be aduanced in their most holie Temple. Which diuine honour, no man (of vnderstanding or good iudgement) did euer couet before: but contrariwise, many, to whom such an offer had bene made, did holde it in no meane detestation.

They further aduised him, that hee would write to the Emperour, and let him vnderstand the peremptorie resolution of the people, in defence of the doctrine and ceremonies given them by Almighty God, calming his displeasure so well as hee could, from proceeding in so cruell a sentence. But if it should come to passe, that the humour of the Gouvernour might not bee altered: yet then hee had enough to goe on in, and (when hee did please) to proceede in Armes.

Petronius desiring to consider in these matters more maturely, and to trie the peoples inclination yet a little further: went with his Army to Tyberias, where an infinite number of Jewes met him, incessantly entreating him, that their sacred Temple might not bee prophaned. Why? answered Petronius, Dare you warre with the Emperour? Feare you not the power of the Romaine Empire, knowing how weak your strength is, to contend against so mighty a Monarch? Wee resist not by Armes so great a power (cried out the Jewes) but humbly lay downe our lines at Casars foote: rather then, against the Lawe of our God, we will see the Statue of the Emperour, to bee erected in the holiest place of our Temple. Which words were no sooner spoken, but they all fell flat vpon their faces, prostrating their neckes to any that would finite them.

Petronius perceiving them so resolute and inuincible, that they rather would die, then suffer their Temple to be violated; considering also, that already (for the space of fortie daies, they had not toucht the earth with any labor, although it was the onely apt time to sowe their seede: after he had consulted with some of his friends, hee concludet, that hee would write to the Emperour. Yet, before he would make any publication thereof, he meant to presse those people somewhat further. So, causing a mighty multitude of the vnarmed Jewes to meete at Tyberias; and to feare them in most dreadfull manner; he engirt them on all sides with warlike troupes, and his horfemen ready prepared to ouer-runne them. Once more hee declared to them, the rigorous command of the Romaine Emperour, the obedience of all the people in the like case; the daunger wherein hee and al his were, if they did not effect what hee had commanded. Wherefore hee exhorted them, that the Emperours anger might be endured: because such fayled not to reuenge cruelly, the breach of any thing commanded by him.

But when the Jewes cryed out all with one voyce, that hee ought to make more account of Gods commandment, then of any mortall mans whatsoever, to trample them vnder his horfes feete, or slice them in peeces with their Swords, that so all the Jewes being extirpated, he might vse the Temple at his owne pleasure: Petronius, entirely moued to mercy, his heart throbbing, and his eyes ouer-flowing with teares, commanding silence by a Trumpet, thus he spake.

Seeing you are so resolute, that you desire rather to die, then violate the Lawe giuen you by God, I am not the man, that (by a wicked kinde of obedience) will foyle your Temple; for which I see you endeavour so much. Nor will I doe seruice to the Emperour my Maister, in a matter so monstrous and inhumane; but rather will be a partaker in your perill, then purchase my life, by the innocent blood of so great a multitude. Be comforted then in this your Religion, and returne to your labour, which (for so many dayes) you haue omitted. For mine owne part, I will labour by my friends and mine owne Letters, to alter this opinion in the Emperour. If hee command me to Rome, and condemne mee to death, I will gladly endure it: knowing, that by my death, a people living in great danger, may yet preserve their Religion to themselves. For your part, pray to God, that what I enterprize for your safetie, may have a good issue for us all.

When the Jewes had heard this Oration; as people extraordinarily ioyfull, they beganne (with loude voyces) to extoll the pietie of Petronius, wishing to him all felicitie. And sodainly, vpon the Assemblies separation, there fell a mightie shouwe of raine (all the day before, and the whole moneth fore-going, the Heauens were so cleare and bright, that the earth was burnt by extremity of heat) and this the Jewes interpreted to bee a signe of their happinesse.

While matters proceeded thus in Iudea, King Agrippa being at Rome, vnderstoode the troubles in his kingdome, and the occasion from whence they proceeded. Whereupon, he made a magnificent feast for the Emperour, consisting of all the delicacies that possibly could be devised. Caius wel knew, that Agrippa would not launch out in such liberall expences, but that hee intended some especiall suite to him: wherefore, with a gracious countenance and franke spirit, hee bade him boldly ask what he would, protesting, that he should not be denied. In a long & well prepared Oration, Agrippa resolved the Emperour, that he desired not any enriching of his kingdome; but humbly craved pardon for the Jewish people, if, in feare to be punished by God; they had not receiued his Statue into their Temple of Ierusalem.

Caius accounting it a shame and disgrace to him, if heerein he should refuse his friends request: wrote to Petronius, commending his care for the execution of his command. Adding withall, that if (with the peoples liking) the Image was already placed in the Temple, so to let it rest: but if the people would not voluntarily suffer it to bee doone, by no means to offer them any violence. Soone after came the Letters sent from Petronius, concerning the stowte resolution of the Jewish Nation: which quite altered him from his former minde, and made him highly displeased with his Captaine, for not performing what hee had enioyned him.

Wherefore hee wrote againe to him, that if he would not be brought to Rome, and there be massacred with most horrible torments: hee should make choice of what kinde of death himselfe pleased, as a punishment for the contempt of his command.

It came to passe, and (no doubt) diuinely, that the ship which carried these cruell Letters, was greatly tardied by boysterous tempests: so that another shippe (bringing the newes of Caligula's death) arrived there in Iudea before it. Fearefull indeede was his death, but well worthy such a monster, who shortly after hee had written these terrible menaces to Petronius, was massacred, with his wife and daughter, by Chereas and his confederated conspirators. Whereupon Petronius, being inshoured of the Emperours death, and thereby exempted from all feare, receiued the other Letters of his death. Thereby he plainly perceiued, that almighty GOD had miraculously preferred his life, for the good hee had doone to the Jewish Nation.

About the same time, Claudius was saluted Emperour by the Souldiours: who, because hee had bene both councelled and assisted by Agrippa, at such time as hee remayned in Rome: he confirmed vnto him (by publique Edict) the Kingdome of Iudea given him by Caligula, adding also Samaria, and all the other parts and portions, which his grandfather Herode the Great formerly possessed.

Moreover, hee gaue him the Tetrarchie of Lyfania, called Abella, with a part of Cilicia, and Comagena, which hee had taken from Antiochus. He conferred also on Herode, brother to Agrippa, the Kingdome of Chalcis.

Agrippa being in this manner richly recompenced, returned to Iudea, in the first yeare of the Empire of Claudius, and ascending vp to Ierusalem, gaue thanks to the Lord for his good successe. There hee made a sollemne great feast, hanging vp in the Temple, the Chaîne of golde which Caligula had given him in memory of his miseries, and diuine deliuerance.

Afterward, he beganne to fortifie the Cittie

Cittie of Ierusalem, and with such sufficient furniture, that Claudius (feearing a reuolt in the Jewes, vnder trust in such a well ordered fortification) forbade Agrippa by his Letters, to finish the work hee had begunne. Hee was also most liberall towards his subiects, and (about all) a superstitious obseruer of the traditions, receiued in the forefathers lawe. So that, hearing the Apostles to vaile them of no reckoning to winne the good liking of the sacrificing Priests, and fauour of the vulgar people: Hee executed some of the Disciples of our Saviour Christ, and namely James the brother to Iohn, they being the sonnes of Zebedee. Hee also caused Saint Peter to bee put in prison, during the dayes of vneleauened Bread, to bring him forth to the people after the Feast. But the Euangelist Saint Luke amply declareth, that Saint Peter was deliuered by the continuall prayers of the Church: where hee also declareth, the miserable end of this Herod Agrippa.

Now, concerning the description of Iosephus, speaking of his death: it agrees with the Historie of Saint Luke in this manner. After hee had reigned ouer all Iudea for the space of three yeares; in the fourth, hee came to Cæsarea, where hee celebrated the Feast with a great company of the Jewes; causing Playes to be acted, in honour of the Emperour Claudius, and for his health.

The second day of the Feast, he entred the Theater in the morning, attired in a Roabe of cloth of siluer, tissued, and made most sumptuous and artificiall: where, on when the bright beames of the Sunne did cast their radiance, it caused such a lustre by their reuerberation; that all eyes were dazeled with the splendour of the garment. Whereupon it happened, that some of his Flatterers, interrupting him in his Oration; tolde him, that he spake like a god; nay, and (with a loude voice) called him God, craving mercy of him, because (vntill then) they had feared him but as a man onely; but now they plainly perceiued, that hee farre excelled all humane nature.

As the King gloried in these flattering clamours, no way reprooing them for such impious behauiour: hee was suddenly smitten with a most grievous

paine in his entrailes, so that very hardly hee could bee carryed to his Pallace. Where, after many horrible torments, his life expired the fifth day: being iustly punished for the cruelty, which hee had exercised against the members of the true Church of Christ, whereas otherwise, he was very benigne and gracious towards all men, especially to strangers and Gentiles. Hee reigned (in all) about seauen yeares; for hee helde the Tetrarchie of Phillip (vnder Caius Caligula) three yeares, and foure other yeares, the whole Kingdome of Iudea. He dyed in the foure and fiftieth yeare of his age; the third of the Empire of Claudius, and the twelfth yeare after the resurrection of our Lord and Saviour Christ Iesus.

His posteritie hath already bene related, whereof Agrippa, being his eldest Sonne, and of the age of seuen yeares when his Father dyed; albeit Claudius the Emperour gladly desired, that hee should haue bene successour in his Fathers kingdome: yet some other preiudged so farre with him, that all the Regions (subiect before to his Father,) were againe reduced into the forme of a Province; and the first Governour sent thither to rule in Iudea, was Cuspius Fadus, or Fadus Cuspius.

The death of Herode king

After the death of his brother, Cuspius Fadus being sent into Iudea, throu to have the custodie of the Roabes and other ornaments, which belonged to the Soueraigne Sacrificers, and to transerre the Sacrificers to Romaine Gouvernours: whereupon, Herode transported himselfe to Rome, at request made to him by the Jewes, whose cause he maintained there so well; that he obtained, that the garments belonging vnto the High-priest, should be kept in the custody of the High-priest. Moreouer, hee obtained of Claudius, that he should haue the charge and care of the money, consecrated to the Temple of Ierusalem. Having power also, to depose the High-priest, for some causes of importance, and to substitute an other more sufficient. A Graunt which brought great gaine and profite to the Kings; because the Priests fought by power of money, who should haue that soueraigne dignitie.

Cuspius Fadus gouerned the Countrie of Iudea, when a certaine man, named Thendus, abused in such sort the vulgar people by his enchantments: that hee brought them to Jordane, promising to make them passe (dry-footed) ouer the diuided river. But Fadus following, took him by his horse-men, and hauing put him to death, scattered all the heapes of his followers. Gamaliell maketh mention of this Thendus, in the fifth chapter of the Actes of the Apostles.

Tiberius Alexander was sent by Claudius, to succcede Fadus in the gouernment; vnder whom happened that terrible famine in Iudea, which Agabus had foretold in the eleauenth chapter of the Actes of the Apostles; and which was about the sixt or seuenth yeare of Claudius: which extremitie was somewhat asswaged, by the liberalitie of Helena, Queene of the Adiabanes, who caused great plenty of corne to bee brought out of Egypt, and heges from Cyprus. Also the Churches of Greece and Asia, gathered much money, which they sent to succout the brethren, that endured the famine in Iudea.

Herode, King of Chalcis dyed in the eight yeare of the Emperour Claudius. Hee had two wines, each after other; the first was Mariana, daughter to Olympia, the youngest daughter to Great Herode, by whom he had Aristobolus. Afterward, he married Berenice, daughter to his brother Agrippa, who brought vnto him two sonnes. And this was his issue or posteritie, which was reputed quite consumed, by the calamities hapning in the warres of the Iewes.

¶ Of Agrippa the last, Sonne to the youngest sonne of Herod the Great, the last King in any part of Iudea.

His Agrippa, being aged seuenteen yeares, was at Rome with Claudius when his father dyed; and succeeded not immediately after his father, because of some enemies about Claudius therein were his hinderance: who alleged; That his youthfull yeares were not apt to gouerne so great a kingdome, neither to bridle a people so rebellious. But indeede, their pretence was, to enrich themselves by gouerning the Countrey.

Five yeares after his fathers death, his vnckle Herode being dead also: Claudius conferred on him the Kingdome of Chalcis, at the age of 22. yeares. He gaue him also the same power his vnckle had, to keepe the treasure of the Temple of Ierusalem, and to create the High-priests. Of which authoritie Agrippa made verie good vse: for (in a short time) he depose diuers, and substituted other at his pleasure.

At such time as Agrippa beganne his reign, Cumanus was sent into Iudea, to succede Tiberius Alexander in the gouernment, who greatly tormented the country, which already fauored of the succeeding ruine. For, at Easter, the fourth day of vnleauened bread, a Romain Souldier kept a garrison about the Temple; vnreuerently shewed his base backe-part to the people, they being dutifullly busied in the seruice of God.

The Jewes not a little moued at this iniurie, gaue very bitter speeches against the Gouernour Cumanus, because hee did not punish this wicked act of the Souldiour.

Cumanus taking in disdayne their bold words, and fearing some violence by the malicious multitude: sodainly (but very secretly) summoned his armed Legions and horsemen together, who discouuering themselves before they could be suspected; made such an affright among the vnarmed popularity, that they fled away so confusedly crowding, that more then twenty thousand men and women, were trodden and crushed to death in the Streets and other places, to the great and grieuous lamentation of all the people.

Another tumult also followed soone after, the issue whereof was not yet so pitifull. For some theuing Jewes, had (vpon the highway) shrewdly beaten and wounded one Stephen, a seruant to the Emperour Claudius, stripping him out of all that he had about him.

Cumanus heereat highly offended, and not finding them that had done the deed; tooke all the neighbouring parts, where the fault was committed: Which being done, a Souldiour finding a Booke
in his booty, which contained the writings of Moses and the Prophets, made a pub-

like shew thereof in derision, & after tore it to peeces, in presence of the chieftest Jewes. Sodainly a great multitude of the Jewes ranne (by troups) to Cesarea (where then was the ordinary abiding of the Romaine Gouvernours) and required, that iustice might be inflicted vpon him for this wicked act: whom if Cumanus (by the persuasion of some) had not beheaded, to satisfie the enraged peoples anger; this tumult could not haue bene appeased, without very great effusion of blood.

Afterward, some of the Gabulens ascending vpp to Ierusalem to the Feast, were slaine by the Samaritanes; which was the cause of many murthers committed on both sides. For, eyther part being encouraged to reuenge, ranne into fresh injuries, by way of robberies, putting to fire and sword all they met withall. But, because Cumanus (corrupted with money)
did not repress those theueueries done by neighbour-on neighbour. Quarrecus, President of Syria, was called thither by the contrary side, who (hauing receiued information of the fact, and executed the authorits of the mutinies) sent Cumanus
to Rome, to render a reason for the Prouinee committed to his charge. He being convicted of auarice and crueltye, was sent into exile by Claudius, & in his place, was appointed gouernor of Iudea and Samaria, Claudius Felix, brother to Pallas, who (long time before) was sent into Palestine, to gouerne the Tetrarchy of Ph-lip, as is affirmed by Cornelius Tacitus.

Almost at the same time, that is to say,
in the twelfth yeare of his Empire, Claudius gaue to King Agrippa the Tetrarchy of Phillip (being destitute of a Gouernor)
which contained Trachonitis and Batanea, giuing him also Abella, the Tetrarchy of Byzantium. Then he gaue to his vnckle paternal Aristobolus (brother to the first Agrippa, and Herode of Chalcis) the kingdome of Chalcis.

After these assayres thus passed ouer,
the condition and estate of the Jewes grew worfe and worfe; and now beganne the gouernement of Felix, who being reprooued by Ionathas the High-priest, for his rapines and other wicked actions by him perfourmed, and yet not daring to depole him from the Sacerdotal dignitie, because hee stood in feare of the people: suborned diuerse Ruffians, who (entring into Ierusalem at the feast with the multitude) slew so secretly the High-Priest Jonathas, and others marked for the same purpose with him; as very easily they were concealed in the troupes.

This attempt speeding so well as the Ruffians could desire, fell out to bee the occasion, that (at every feast) they made a market or merchandise, of killing the honestest of the people: sometimes being hired there-to by other, sometimes out of their owne spleene and mallice. So that every man stood in feare, because no one knew how to secure himselfe; audacious boldnesse dreading no punishment, in regard of the Governours carelessse negligence.

Troupes of theeves ranne every where making spoile, though many were apprehended by Felix, and executed: yet wickednesse had taken such deep roote, onely through neglect in the precedent Governours, as it could no way be holpen; no, not by the greatest severity of iustice. And the worst of all was, that these theeueries were maintayned by the High-priests authority: amongst whom, such as were best stored with money, kept bands of desperate villaines about them, by whose meanes they oppressed such as they pleased, laying close ambushes to kill and murder them.

In the thirteenth yeare of Claudius his Empire, Paul the Apostle was taken in Ierusalem, and being led thence to Casarea: pleaded his cause before Felix and Drusilla, as S. Luke declareth in the foure and twentieth of the Actes. Afterward, Felix called for him diuers times, and heard him answer for himselfe, hoping that Paul would redeeme himselfe by money. But after hee had kept him two whole yeares in prison; at his departing from Iudea, hee left him there, to please the Iewes.

Claudius died in the foureteenth yeare of his Empire, and Nero (at the beginning of his government) encreased the authority of Agrippa, adding thereto part of Galilee, with the Cities of Tyberias, Tarichea and Iulada. Forthwith he sent Porcius Festus into Iudea, calling home Felix, whom they of Casarea followed, and accused him of cruelty, rapines and other vniuſt dealing, but he escaped by the cunning of his brother Pallas. So soone as Porcius Festus was arrived in Iudea, hee gaue audience (at Casarea) to Paul and the Iewes his accusers: and as he intended to send Paul to Ierusalem, he (feareing the ambushes of the Iewes) appealed to the Emperour Nero.

Some few dayes after, Agrippa went to Casarea with his sister Berenice, onely to salute the new governor: which sister (after the death of her husband Chalcus) liued so familiarly with her brother, that there was great suspition of incestuous acquaintance. Paul was brought before them to pleade his cause, and (in a wel couched oration) so approved his innocence; that, according to the Kings owne opinion, he might haue gone at liberty, if hee had not appealed to Casarea. Not long it was, but Paul was sent (with other prisoners) to Rome, in the first yeare of Neroes Empire, as is auouched.

Agrippa returning to Ierusalem, offended the Priests very grievously, by a building erected in the Pallace royall, and somewhat neare to the Temple: for hee could thence discerne, whatsoever the Priests did in the inward parts, and when they loytered in the sacrifices and diuine Seruice. The Priests holding this action vnlawfull, erected a wall (on the Temple side) of the like height; whereby Agrippa was not onely hindered from seeing the Temple, but also a great part of the City. The King insisted, that the wall should be beaten downe; but the Priests so preuailed (by means made to Poppa the Emperours wife) that Nero allowed the wall to remaine as it did.

Heereat Agrippa being exceedingly offended, deposed Ioseph the foueraigne Sacrificer, placing Ananias in his roome, who was of the Saduces Sect, a man very bolde and cruell. He (Festus dying in Iudea, and Albinus his successour staying somewhat long ere he came) tooke occasion to exercise cruelty against many worthy persons; especially against James the sonne of Ioseph, brother to our Lord Iesus Christ by an other mother, a man (in the iudgement of all them dwelling in Ierusalem) excelling in innocence of life and pietie, who was throwne down headlong from the highest wall of the temple; and (by command of the said Ananias) ouerwhelmd with stones, about threescore yeares after the birth of Christ.

Ioseph the

Ananias ex-

Ananias confessed James to be murdered.

For this wicked deed, he was accused before Agrippa, who feared the Roman Emperour, named Albinus, now neere approaching; and also stood in feare of the peoples fury: wherefore Ananias was dismissed from his Office, exercised by him but three monthes onely. And yet he ceased not to commit great cruelties, against them that were of his owne condition. For, in regard of his great power, hee had many Theeves (kept at his charges) of whom he made vie to murder his enemies priuily. Beside, hee made them breake into the Garners of corne, to steal the Tythes therein enclosed: which beeing often done without any punishment, was the cause of starving to death manie of the poore Priests.

Albinus being overcome with insatiable courtoisnesse, cared for nothing else but onely to get wealth together, by any vile meanes whatsoever: wherefore, such of the Priests as gaue him Gold, hee winched at all their wickednesse, and permitted Theeves to doe what they listed, if their kindred or friends would redeeme them with money. By which meanes, in short time, all Iudea was full of Theeves, all things turned topsie turvy, no Iustice exercised in any place: and there was no acte so horrid or execrable, but it might quickly be pardoned for money.

Gestius Florus was sent as successor to this Horfe-leech, who farre exceeded the rapines of Albinus, by insinipit other wicked courses; so that the Iews reputed Albinus a Saint vnto this other. For Florus proceeded not couerly, nor after the cunning manner of his predecessour: but by open violence, scorning, stealing, rudely taking, and doing whatsoever he pleased; for will onely was a Law to him. And surely it seemed, that he was meely sent by destiny to the Iewes, so to irritate them by open iniuries, and blinde them from all desire of reuenge, as finally to be their vtter ruine. For, the whole country being ouer-runne with Theeves, and the people growne desperately desirous of warre; had a hope of some other Dominion, groaning vnder the tyrannical Roman rule, and (in insatiable zeale) were perswaded to recover their liberty.

In brecfe, the time was come, which Christ and the Prophets had foretolde, concerning the destruction of the whole

Priesthood, and policy ordained by Moses and diuine authority: considering, that the Messias had already bene sent, for the loue of whom, both the Priesthood and policy had bin (till that time) diuinely preferred. Wherefore, vnder Gestius Florus, threescore yeeres after the Natiuity of Christ, five and thirty yeeres after hee was crucified and risen againe, the twelfth of Neroes Empire, the founteenth of this Agrippa now in question; and three yeares before Paul was put to death by Nero: the warre began to waxe tempestuous, because the Iewes reuolted from the Roman Empire, and entred into mutiny against Casarea.

Florus could easily haue quenched this warre in the beginning; but that hee rather affected, to nourish and feede the flame newly kindled, by provoking the Iewes dayly more and more, still adding iniury vpon iniury: vntill the fire slewe fourth both farre and neere, that finally, it wrought the destruction of all Iudea.

At the beginning of this reuolt, Agrippa labored very seriously, to stay the Iews from this furious desire of warre, and to regaine peace and tranquillity, by requiring pardon of the Romanes for their offence, which they might haue obtayned on meane conditions, in regard it was very euident, that they had some iust causes of rebelling, by the outrages done vnto them by Florus. But he came so short of their expectation, they hating nothing more, then to heare of peace or equity (as very hardly) he escaped theyr violence. Perceiuing then the Nation so enraged for fight, & (like men blindfolded) throwing themselves impetuously into perdition; he retired from their furious enterprize, and sent ayde to Vespasian in Iudea, to tame the head-strong course of those Rebelles, foreseeing already in his soule, the sad ruine of all the Iewish people.

Heere I could weaue vp the sagge-end of this History, with report of the Iewish warre, which Iosephus and other authors haue described; but that my heart vill not serue me, to discourse those strange & miserable ouerthrows, which (in their pitifull events) did exceed humane beleefe. shut vp from all succour, wofully tormented, and finally (wholly confounded, with numberlesse calamities) almost altogether quite raced out, and destroyed. For after that the Lewes were reuolted in the twelfth year (as is affirmed) of Nero, the army of the Romanes neuer ceased for six whole yeeres together, cruelly to raiage
the country of Iudea, because from time to time, the Lewes (by their inuincible obstinacy) prouoked the victorious folders to such tyrannies, as the like were neuer heard of.

But though I spare to relate the deuastation of the whole country: who can conceiue (with true iudgement) but the miseries of the City Ierusalem it selfe?
Which, before it beheld the Romane enemy, for the space of sixe whole yeeres, felt (within it selfe) farre more cruell dome-sticke aduersaries: as beeing diuided and torn in peeces, by Sects, Factions, and Seditious of Theeues, fighting amongst themselves (when they had none else to quarrell withall) for rapines, murders, and other mischeefe, every Faction thinking to support it selfe, by dooing iniurie vnto it selfe, and surmounting one another in number, and manner of nouel villanies and extremity.

Furie grew on to such horrid perfection, that if any Man or woman were esteemed holy, religious, and modest:
these were arguments sufficient, to yeld
a pregnant reason for their death; and the goodes of the richest Citizens, must be brought forth, and layde before their doores, while the Faction fought who should enioy them. To kill people of meane or simple condition, was but to ridde them out of the turbulent crowdes, for they were esteemed but as a charge to the City, and hindered the way when the siege should beginne: for this they accounted their wisest course, and best meanes, to abide a long lingering siege.

If any man durst but speake a word, or expresse by any apparant signe, that hee disliked the present License vnto all Villanies, it was presently termed Treason, and flatte conspiracy with the Ro-manes; yea, it was a sinne deserting terrible punishment. And as great an offence it was, to mourne or lament for Parents or Friends, being slaine or murthered in these vprores.

To prophane the verie holiest part of the Temple, with Rapes, Murthers, and Massacres; they sayde, it was fighting in defence of the Temple, and for the Religion of the country. To beare away violently the riches out of the Temples Treasure, and to waste them in all Villanie and abominable excefse: this was teamed, borrowing money, wherewith to defend the seruice ordained by G O D. And vpon paine of death, no man durst flye, or get him gone, from these horrible, diuellish, and dangerous courses.

Moreover, such as dwelt in the Citie,
beheld (beside these publike miseries)
their owne bodies, their wiues, children, and goods, exposed to the violent & vnbridled attempts of those mercilesse Vil-lanes. In breefe, there could not be thought or deuised any iniury or opprobrious behaviour, which the miserable Lewes might feare or expect from the Enemy, but they first made triall thereof vpon themselves, vsing no resistance at all against it. Wherefore, the coming of the enemies army was no way dreadful vnto them, but rather gladly desired; and euen
but as a sollection, or rather a recreation (when the City was sharply assailed) the seditious factions were enforced to ioyne their forces, for repulsing the enemy, and to breath awhile, from their owne dome-sticke theeneries and warres.

The last six moneths of this warre, after that the City was round engirt with enemies, and themselves had piled, polled, and miserably spoyled all that they could by their intestine robberies: they began to feele a famine in the heighth of extremity, which was accompanied likewise with so greuous a Pestilence, that in the time of the siege, above eleauen hundred thousand men died by the plague and famine. During this war also, great multitudes were daily murdered within the wals, by the iynituous and rebellious factionists: & in the assaults, surprizals, and sacking of the city, many millions of people lost their liues. Also in the war time, there were taken 97000. persons, who were partly sold as slaues, and partly distributed to rounde neighbouring great Citties, there to bee giuen and deuoured

By these pittifull examples of Gods

then) be retyred to Ierusalem to shelter themselves in her fortifications.

CHAP. XXII.

A breefe Collection, of the principall Accidents which happened in the time of the siege.

The beginning of the siege.

He fourth day of the first moneth, Xantiqua (which is April with vs) the Citie
of Ierusalem was besiedged, nere to the feast of Easter.

The two and twentieth day after, Titus essayng (in vaine) to haue it yielded, raised his bulwarkes, and prepared his Engines to batter the City.

The fteenth day of Artemision, which is May, Bazetha (that is to say, the new city, the first wall being taken) which was a part of the City beyond the Temple towards Bisla, newly annexed, and enuironed with walles by the first Agrippa was seized on by the Romanes.

The twelfth day of the said month, the second wall was taken, and yet the same day it was recovered againe.

The sixteenth day, the Romanes hauing taken the other wall again the second time, enioyed the base or lower part of the City, which the Lewes called Acra, & was seated beneath on a little hill.

The one and twenty day, two parts of the City were lost, when the Lewes (being graciously entreated by Titus) did dai-ned to embrace peace. Then the Souldiers began to mount their scaladoes, nere to the Towre called Antonia, ioyning to the third wall, where their Ensignes and Bulwarkes being raised in twelue dayes, they were againe as quickly burned by the Lewes.

All the whole moneth of Dention, the which answereth to that of Iune, the Ro-manes were seriously busied, in engirting
the whole City with a Wall, to hinder
the bringing of victualles to the Lewes, and also to bereaue them from all means of fight.

The first day of Panemon, which refereth it selfe to our Iuly, Titus taking compassion on the people, whom he knew to dye by the extremity of the Famine and Pestilence, onely through the obstinacie of some among them; being desirous to deliuer them without long delay, he erected new Terrasses vp aloft, and began to batter the third wall, called Antonia, verie difficult to be surprized. This Antonia, was a most magnificent building, and very strongly munit nere to the Temple, four square in forme, and carrying the greatness of a very large Castle. Herod
the Great had builded it, in fauour of the Soueraigne Sacrificers, and gaue it the name of Marke Anthony the Triumire.
Within that goodly Monument the Ornaments belonging to the High-Priests were continually kept.

The sixth day, the Antonia was wonne, because the walls fell downe of themselves, on that side where the Iewes hadde vndermined, to get forth of the Citie, with intent to burne the enemies rampiers.

The eight day of Loion, which is the moneth of August, after that the Iewes had beene many times exhorted, to desire peace of so gracious a Conquerour; after they had repulsed his often Ambassages by base injuries, and wicked abuses: the Temple was forcibly taken, being a worke well worthy of admiration. And (contrary to the Edi& of Titus) it was set on fire by the offended Souldiers. So that it burned the very same day, when as (six hundred, three score, and nineteen yeares before past) it was burned by Nabuchodonosor, Colonell of the Chaldeans.

The surprizing
and burning of the Temple.The batterie of the City of David.

The twentieth day, was the batterie of the high Towne (called the City of David) begunne: after that the Iewes (once more admonished to lay downe Armes) refused peace, being gently offered vnto them.

The seuenth day of Gorsipion, which is our September, the high part of the City was taken: the Fortresse whereof was the Temple, as the Antonia was Bulwarke to the Temple.

The high town
taken.All the Citie
burnt.

The eight day, all the City of Ierusalem, (pill'd & rancked before) was conuerted all into ashes.

The foure and twentieth day of October, Titus celebrating the birth-day of his brother Domitian in Casarea (a Citie on the Sea-coast) had Playes there of sundry kindes: wherein were brought forth three thousand Iewes captiues; some of them being deuoured by beasts, the rest killing one another, fencing and fighting each against another.

The seuenth day of Nouember, Titus went to Berytha, a City in Syria, where he celebrated the Natiuity of his Father Vespasian, & where (in sports & pastimes presented before the Romans and Grecians) a great number of captiue Iewes, were some trodden to death, others hackt, hewed and torne in peeces.

The cheefe reason why
the Author
made the collection of these histories

I haue collected this small discourse, concerning the wofull consummation of this City, which sometime was the principall seat of Gods people, and of his diuine Doctrine: from the eight yeare of King Dauids reigne, vntill the finall destruction, being eluen hundred, thirtie and seuen yeares. The due Obseruation whereof, may serue to testify the mighty anger of God, against the despisers of his Sonne, and of his word in him reuealed; exampling vs, from falling into the like calamities, either by a violent appetite of oppressing the true Doctrine, or to darken & obscure it by false interpretations, or (vnterly contemning it) by wandering into euery wickednesse.

Now I returne againe to Agrippa, who (according as hath bene sayde) detesting the furious madnesse of his Nation, and evidently fore-seeing their wofull ruine sent ayde to Vespasian, making VV arre against the Iewes, and by that means partly saued his owne Countries, from the lamentable spoile happening in this warre. Nero being dead, and Galba chosen Emperour, he proiected a iourney to Rome, with Titus the sonne of Vespasian, to entreate the confirmation in his kingdom by the new made Emperour. But contrary winds intercepting them, they could not compasse what was intended: but receyued tidings neere vnto Achisia, of Galbas death: which was the reason, that Titus returned towards Syria, Agrippa holding on his course for Rome. But Italy being embraced with ciuill warre, because Otho (successor to Galba) being slaine, and Vitellius presuming to the Empire, Agrippa was very hastily called backe to Iudea by Letters, where he assisted Vespasian to bee saluted Emperour by his soldiers, and safely to conduct a well provided Armie towards Italy, with purpose to encounter the Captaines of Vitellius. So he left his sonne Titus (with some legions) to beate downe the Iewes, especially them of Ierusalem, as hath bin said before.

I finde no other matter of Agrippa, or any other of the posterity of Herode the Great: but onely Philo, writing of Agrippa, saith: That he reigned seuen and twenty yeares. He dyed then (by *Philo*s account) in the threescore and eighteenth yeare of Christ, the seauenth of Vespasian, and the fifth yeare after the destruction of Ierusalem.

Philo further saith, that this Agrippa had a sonne, named Agrippa, who reigned thirty yeares after the death of his father: wherefore he attained to the year an hundred dred and eight after the death of Christ, and to the eight of Traiane the Emperour, which yeare Philo, being ouer-spent with yeares, foretold would be the last of his reigne.

CHAP. XXIII.

Of three great and notable Doubts, which the ancient Philosophers knew not how to resolve, and for what cause.

The naturall illumination of Ancient Philosophers.

THE ancient Philosophers, illumined by the gifte of God, made curious search into all things belonging to nature: and verified all their propositions (without contradiction or repugnancy) by other propositions meerly naturall. Notwithstanding, they neuer knew how to resolve three things, verie doubtfull and of importance, neyther could yelde a reason for the causes of their originall.

The first doubt naturall decline man
to dye.

The first was, that they well knewe a desire giuen to man by nature, that hee would neuer dye, neither feelee any paine or greauance whatsoeuer: but to liue happily in the pleasures of this world, without the want or neede of any thing; and yet hee could neuer attaine to the end thereof. On the other side, hauing made this proposition, that God and Nature neuer did any thing in vaine, & that this appetite in man enliued thence, whereof they coueted to finde the cause; considering beside, that in all other naturall effects the proposition alwayes did verifie it selfe: they were vtterly confounded in infinite perplexities, being neuer able to compasse the end.

The second
doubt, why liberty and small desire in man to
death.

The second was, they said & affirmed naturallly in like manner, that euery man felt in like manner, that euery man felt in like manner, a peruerse carnall inclination, or sensuality, quite contrarie to the former appetite of vnwillingnesse to dye: and yet this carnall lustful desire, causeth a man fall into diuers diseases, which are the abridging of life, yea hasteneth on death, wherto his other appetite is an vtter enemy.

Moreouer, many couet after riches and pompe; seeking to winne them courageously in the field; where soonest of all they meete with death, or else bear away wounds, maimes, afflictions of mind, & other misfortunes, quite contrary to their desire indeed.

The third doubt proceeded from the order of nature, all inferiour things being gouerned by their superiour: as wee see the elements obedient to the celestiall bodies; the Orbes and Spheres to the mouing intelligence, and all the intelligences to the cheefe of all, which is God loued and desired. Onely in man is this order peruerted; for he being composed of a soule and a body, the flesh which is the vilest part of all other, stands repugnant to reason, yea and to the soull, which is the very noblest part of all: and (which is farre worse) draweth it to the bent of his owne wicked will. And therefore the Apostle saide; That hee felt a Lawe in his members, repugnant to the law of his thoughts, and attracted him to sin.

The Philosophers that were before the coming of Christ, neuer knew how to find out the occasion of this disorder: yet making curious search for it, fell into many and sundry errors. Wherefore Anaxagoras saide: This exorbitant irregularity, happened at the beginning of the world, and when all things were confused in the ancient Chaos. For the intellect being separated by discord, and reioyned by concord, all things were created good, and well ordered in their kinde: onely man excepted, whose flesh hee saw to be ill disposed, and disagreeing with the reasonable soule. And therefore, euen as in that Chaos these two things were discordant: so in like manner afterward, they still continued repugnant, contrary to the rule & order of all other things in the world. In this manner, this poore Philosopher imputed the blame of all, to the diuine intellect, which is God himselfe.

Others saide: That this proceeded from the celestiall constellations, vnder the which man is engendered, and receiueth birth. For Aristotle durst neuer bee so bolde, as (openly) to yelde a resolution of this doubtfull difficulty; but seemed (as it were) to contradict himselfe sometimes, saying; Sensuality is naturallly inclined to evil, howbeit (with great difficulty) it may sometimes be ruled or tamed by the moral vertues. And in another place he saith, That the felicitie

licity which is atcheued by the vertues morall, is the gift of God. By consequence then those morall vertues, in whose operation the happinesse of man doth consist; must be the gift of GOD, and no way naturall.

Contrarywise, the Manichees, desirous to render a reason for this peruerse disorder, saide : That there were two soules in man, the one good, made of the substance of the Prince of Light; and the other badde, made of the substance of the Prince of darkness, and these do cause this continuall combat in man.

Origens afterward saide; That before the creation of the world, all things were conferred in Heauen which sinned against God: by therefore (as a punishment) they were disposed into ill complexioned bodies, and from thence ensued this controuersie in man.

All these detestable opinions were confuted by Saint Augustine, writing against the Manichees; where, by long & pregnant reasons, hee proueth the occasion of the fibuerion of this order; and that because they had no vnderstanding in the sacred Scriptures, they vterly lost that light. For in them is declared to vs, the full resolution of these doubts, and there may plainly be discerned, that these two propositions are good and true, and both of them in the order of Nature. To wit, that God and nature neuer did anything void of purpose, and that it is very conuenable, that a man (by nature) should not desire to dye, but to leade a happie kinde of life, and yet without power of attaining thereto; nor because he hath this desire giuen him in vaine, for it is truly naturall: but to obtaine the end and effect thereof, is a matter accidental to man, and not naturall.

For it is plain and apparant, that God created man immortal, in such sort, as effectually (according to the very foundest opinion of all Diuines) he could not haue dyed, nor be subiect to any miserie, if hee had obserued his commandement. But having transgressed, hee ought iustly to suffer death, and the miseries of the world; therefore, because he obeyed not his command, he incurred death and all afflictions. So that by the sinne of disobedience (as the Apostle saide) death came into the world. Herby it appeareth the, that death was not (at the first) naturall to our prime father, neither successively ensuing to vs, but accidental; because it was not the intention of God.

Thus come wee then to resolve this doubt, that desire not to dye, nor endure any paines; is giuen to vs by nature, and not in vaine: because the power was giuen vs to obtaine the effect, but in regard of our disobedience, the desire still remaineth, and cannot be taken from vs. By the selfsame reason is the second doubt answered: for of our felues, by carnall obscenity, and glutinous gourmandize, we purchase death, and make way to this disorder.

In like manner, the third is resolved by Adams sinne committed, whereby hee lost the original righteousnesse which God had giuen him, which serued him as a bridle to moderate himselfe by iust order, and so this harmony fell into confusion. For the soule, which ought to govern the body, as beeing the thing most noble and excellent; came afterward to bee governed by the sense, and by the bodye. And so wee see evidently, that this subuersion is no way naturall, but accidental.

By this meanes then, the proposition remaineth firme & true, that those things most worthy and most noble, ought to govern them of lesse noble and inferior quality: which sayleth not, neyther can, as well wee may obserue in the celestially bodies. And if in man it falleth out otherwise, it is by accident of the faulte, deserting this and worse, but not by Nature.

by them obtained, against so many furious people, and most potent nations. On the contrary also, they maruell not at the decadence of that Empire, which began, when they began to equisume those Ceremonies and religion. For we may obserue by infinit histories, full of examples, that so long as they were best obedient to religion; their Common-weales prospered so much the more happily, & the enterprizes of their Captaines fell out then successively. As was well noted in Pompey, Brennus, and infinite other, who albeit they were idolaters, and neuer knew the true God: yet it seemed (neuertheless) that by certain meanes of terrestrial distribution, God fauoured them that were religious. And it might be perhaps to this end, that like as the people were, then zealous in a religion, whereof they had neither foundation, or any perfect beleefe; they would (by far stronger reason), bee good obseruers of the true faith, if it had bin reuealed to them, as now it is vnto vs. The effects then make it euident, that heauen neuer left them, without some apparance of good prosperity, & fortunat success in their temporal affaires.

The Ceremonies which the auncient Romaines obserued in times of warre, or peace, were many and diuers; wherein I must needs be silent, because the relating of them all, would require more time than I am allowed; and it might offend to speak of some, and not of other. My intent therefore is, to make relation of such only; and especially by them obserued, before war was moued against any Prouince. To the end, that moderne Princes may perceiue, how farre out of the way they wander, in attempting war inconsiderately, & making no consultation first to GOD: wherein (if they iudge rightly) they may conceiue, that ill success happeneth to them by no other occasion, they living in Religion so farre inferior to Ethnickes and Idolaters.

When newes came to Rome, concerning the rebellion of some Prouince, or of any trouble giuen by some barbarous Prince to their countries, or to any of their confederates: they sent ambassadors to him, by whom the Senate gaue to vnderstand, that they would know, in what manner the wrong receiued should be repaired, with refraining from offering the like afterward, wherein finding obstinacy then war was intimated. The Senate hauing created a Captain for this expedition, called the Sacrificers, who were commanded to invoke the Gods with their prayers for the Romans; neuer went forth to shed the blood of their enemies, vntill the Priests had first wept, and made their solemn prayers in the Temples. Afterward, the Senate being assembled, went to the temple of Iupiter, where they swore a most solemn oath. That at all times when the enemy (against whom the instant warre was published) would require a new consideration with them, or desire pardon for the offence, past & present, should neuer be denied him. This being done, the Consul (elected for the enterprize) went to the Capitole, and there made a solemn vow, to such one of the Gods, in whom hee reported confidence, to offer some singular thing vnto him, if he returned home victorious from the warre. And were the offering of it neuer so great a value, yet the people tooke obliged to pay it. Then the banner of the Eagle, being the ancient ensigne of the Romans, was brought forth into Campus Martius, which they did, to let the people vnderstand, that in Rome there might no feast be celebrated, so long as their fellow Citizens and kindred were in warre; & so bringing out the ensignes, delivered them to their feuerall Captains. But first, a Prætor mounted on the gate called Salutis, causing a Trumpet there to sound, while the soldiers received their pay. Whereby may be gathered, that they sturd not their armies at any time, till they had first appeased and honored their Gods, and likewise made their orisons for the prosperitie of their Captains, and vertuous carriage to their enemies in conquering them. For, if their Consuls (appointed for war) in conquering any Prouince or city, made not euident testimony, as well of their vertue as valor, they were greediously punished by the Senat. Hereof we haue many examples, but two only shall serue my turn: the one for vsing vertue in his campe; the other, for due punishment inflicted vpon him, who (being victorious) soiled his reputation in base manner. Fabritius, being endampned with his army of Romanes before Fidena, a Schoollmaster of the Citie came forth with the Sonnes of diuers principall Citizens, as intending to gratific tific the Consull with them, and so presented them vnto him. The Consull (albeit hee might haue detain'd them, and thereby haue made himselfe Lord of the Cittie) not onely refused to accept them: but stripping the Schoolemaister naked, and binding his hands, hee gaue a Rod to euery Scholler, and so sent them (whipping him) backe to their fathers. This benignitie tooke such preuayling power in the foules of the Citizens; that they yielded themselves instantly to the Romaines.

The other was thus. In the yeare of Romes foundation, 318. warre was deliberated by the Senate and Consules, against the Sarmates; and other people inhabiting by the Mountaine Caucasus, which (according to Cosmographers) deuiding Asia in the middest, terminateth Syria on the one side, and finissheth India on the other; where, by extremitie of cold, the Vine hath no ability to grow. Lucius Pius was created Consull, and appointed for this expedition; where, waging cruell warre against them: Fortune was one while fauourable to him, & then againe frowning. But in the time of a truce concluded betwene them, Lucius very friendly entertained the Sarmates Captaines, and hauing diuers times banquetted them, perceiuing that they were lickerously affected to wine, because it was a rarity among them; at last he made them a bountifull feast; wherein he fitted them with great plenty of wine; that they (in drunken loue to him) yielded the whole Prouince tributary to the Roman people. The warres so concluding, & the Consull being returned to Rome, hee demanded Triumphes; which not only was denied him by the Senate; but also his forme of victory so abhorred by the people, that they did put him to death, and for his greater defamation, engraued an Epitaph on his Tombe, speaking in this manner.

The Epitaph appointed by the Romaines, to be engrauen on the Tombe of Lucius Pius.

Here lieth the Consull Lucius Pius, who, not by Armes in the fildes, but by carowing at his Table; not by the Lance, but plenty of wine, conquered the Sarmates.

And yet the Senate, not satisfied with this his disgrace, caused publicly to bee proclaimed throughout Rome, that all (whatsoever) had bene wonne in the Romaine peoples name, by Lucius Pius, should be accounted as nothing. And wrote (moreouer) to the Sarmates; that they denied any Conquest of them; but referred them vnto their former priuiledge and liberty.

CHAP. I.

Of the Gouvernement and Administration of Justice obserued in the Commonwealth of Luca.

Luca is a noble Cittie (seated in the Country of Tuscany) so called of Lucomenus, King of the Tuscanes. Strabo saith, that Luca is a Citie neare to the mountaines of Luna (and nowadayes the Country is called Lunigiana) and that the Region yeeldeth very woorthy men, apt and able in valour for Armes: there being a multitude of knights, from whom the Senate receiued the Military order.

But because we are to discourse of our times, I say, that Luca is now found to be about two miles in circuite, seated singularly, and in a good place. It containeth about foure and thirty thousand persons within the walles; and there are rich families, because the men of this Citie do trafficke greatly in merchandise, and especially in matters of Silkes: for which (amongest all Christians) they haue no meane name. In the time of Castruccio Castracani (who was of the Interminelli) he became Lord thereof, there being a diuision of many families, that would not obey a Tyrant; they vied the Arte of making silke together, deriuing great wealth from diuers parts of Italie. They brought also into Florence, the Artes of making cloth of golde and silke, whereby they attained to inestimable riches. The men are (naturally) very courteous and modest, not niggardly, but bountifull, and therefore prosperitie commeth the more freely vpon them. The Luacan tongue in Tuscany, is held to be very sweete and pure, because they haue no meddling with noyous accents, which are common to all other cities of the Prouince. This so small a cittie, hath a long time maintained it selfe in freedome, and so still doth, with good and substantiall orders.

The Councell.

Her maine foundation (as it is in all other Common-wealths) consisteth of the Councell; because on them depend, and from them are deriued all the other Magistrates, that are members of a bodie so well ordered. These Councellers do discourse on the State occasions, and are (indeede) Fathers of that Common-wealth. It is compounded of three kinds of persons, because some are ordinarily of the Councell, and they continue a whole yeare. Some others are invited ad bene placitum, and are not ordinary. Some others are subrogated in the place of such as die, and so endure for a full yeare. This Councell consisteth of an hundred and three score Citizens, but ordinarily are in number an hundred and twentie.

The Signoria.

The City of Luca is diuided into three parts, which (there) they vse to tearme Terzieri: The one is of S. Saluadore, the second of S. Pauline, and the third of S. Martine. The Councell doe elect the Signorie from the three forenamed Terzieri, that is, for euery Terziero they create three men, which are nine in full number. Beside these, they elect the Gonfaloniere, who is the head, or chiefe of the Common-wealth, & (for examples sake) he is first elected from the Terziero of S. Saluadore; next from that of Saint Pauline; and the third time from that of Saint Martine: and the Terzieri being once so gone ouer, the Gonfaloniere returneth for election to S. Sanjur, and so successively (each after other) according to the foresaid order.

By these men, and by the Gonsaloniere living abroad, other are to be elected, called Antiani, and the election is made in this manner. Three men are chosen, who they teame Affortitori, one for each Terziera. These, have the charge of counting the Ballots of them that are elected, culling out such as they think fittest, after that the Council have made choise of many men, and then they elect the Gonsaloniere. And in making this election, the Affortitori sit in Council separately in a place, and accomie the Ballots vntill they come to the number: which being not complete, they reballot them over againe, vntill they be an hundred & eighty in number. And neither such as are slobogated, nor the other balloted, are published to the Council; but only are made knowne to the Affortitori. And because no fraud or deceit may ensue by the Affortitori, two principall chosen Fryars are of their assistants; one of the order of S. Dominicke, and the other of S. Francis.

These Affortitori have Authority, to bring the men elected to the Magistrates, at such time as they think fitting in several months; and this deputation done by the Affortitori (who are the prime men of Luca) it is kept by them in secret, & they are sworn not to reueale it. The Affortitori created, then they create the Seignior, who cannot bee vanquished, if they have two third partes of the Ballots, although the foresaid Ballots are to be seen by none but onely by the Affortitori. The charge of the Seignior is to hear (freely) matters of iustice and punishment, being alwaies present in the Palace, & may not depart thence vnder capital penalty: the publike purse payeth their expences.

By this forenamed body of ten, one other officer is chosen, whom they call Comandatore, and this new man they make nere vnto them, his gouernment lasting no longer then three daies: in which time he hath liberty and authority to commaund all the other, yea, and the Gonsaloniere, & is Patron in euery busines. And although the supplications which com to the Signory, are presented to the Comandatore, & if he wil not present them to the college of the Lordes or Signiors, they remaine with him: yet notwithstanding he cannot dispose of them without the authoritie of the Signior. And if the Comandatore propounde the supplications to the Signorie, & there they passe two thirds, the Gonsaloniere propones them afterwards in the Council. The authority of the Signorie extendeth vnto strangers, but not ouer the Citizens: and they propound al things, but conclude nothing.

The Secretaries Office.

The Office of the Secretaries (who are three in number) is very important. These men haue authority, onely in matters of sensue to the maiesty of the Commonwealth, being absolute in that case, & are about the Gonsaloniere. But true it is, that they can do nothing without the Gonsaloniere; and before they conclude any action, they must tender the cause vnto the Council. Sometime it falleth out, that seeking iudiciously into the matter, they accomplish it, & afterward render a reason for it to the Council, when they haue done it: either, because they could not congregate the Council in the instant, or in regarde the cause necessarily required, to haue such sodaine expedition.

The Council of Conference.

The Colloquie, or Council of Conference, is composed of 18. Citizens, and they are elected by the Council. These men, if the Lordes are doubtfull in any matter, and that the case cannot be easily deliberated: they meet together, and discourse on the cause propounded to the Council, and after they haue discussed it pregnantly, then they determine together, whether it is to bee granted by the Council, or no.

The Council of sixe.

These six men (being of found reputation) haue charge of the expences & profits for common employment. They provide and command all things, which passe in many accounts, and are as Gouernors of the rents and reuenues. They haue also a Chamberlaine, who is the executer of their deliberations. And all these are likewise chosen by the greater Council.

The Rota.

In many Cities of Italy, this office is ordinary, consisting of three forraigne Doctors, within the compasse of fiftie miles. One of them hath the Title of Potestata, the the second is Iudge of malefactors; & the third is Iudge in ciuill causes. By turnes they haue their feuerall changes, and euery sixe moneths, one of the Centers as Potestare, being first Iudge of malefactors; and his Office of Potestare being past, hee becommeth Iudge in causes ciuill. So that each one of them is Potestare, Iudge for Malefactours, and Iudge in ciuill occasions, as it comes to his turn. If the Potestare haue (perhaps) a Citizen in his power; he doth no more but forme the Proceesse, and sets downe (in writing) his owne opinion, what is the merite of the delinquent, and so it passeth vnto the Council, who either commend, teare, or temper the opinion and sentence of the Potestare; and then in such a case, the Potestare entrench into the Council. On strangers, the Potestare may absolutely determine, without any other: And in breefe, these three men do also discourse on ciuill matters.

The Marchants Court.

These Officers are nine in number, being elected (by threes) out of the Terzieraes. They haue a forraigne Doctor for their Iudge, being their Assistant. They iudge in causes appertaining to merchants; their authority stretching (in the said matters) to blood.

The Office for Store.

In like manner there are nine Officers; & so chosen out of the Terzieraes. These men are the providers of Come, that the City may continually be furnished therewith, and they hear all causes concerning the matter. Prouision still being made for euery three yeares, and the Garners diligently respected where the Come is kept, being full supplied, that there may be no want.

Six Commissioners.

And because throughout the whole Countie, certain assemblies are ordained of such persons as are meete to manage armes: for this especiall businesse, and such occasions as may happen in times of warre; these sixe Commissioners haue authority to muster and make ready bids of Souldiers, and all such things as are requisite for them. Whatsoeuer belongeth to this businesse, passeth thorough their power, and their sentence in them carieth allowance.

For Health.

There are likewise three especiall Presidents, for matters concerning the countries health. These Officers do regard, that all the food may be found and good; that all filth and vncleanesse may be sent out of the City, and men employing all diligence, to conserue the people from being offended by any pestiferous accident, or whatsoever annoyance may be preiudiciall to health.

The Council for disobedience.

And because in euery City, there are found too many persons, not enclineable to any goodnesse, but praictising to liue viciously, adding themselves to lewde courses, and are merely opposit to all well instituted rules, for liuing ciuilly, & in good order; therefore the men of Luca haue a Council, which they entitle, for disobedience, and inflicting punishment on such (as by their vile example) may be the ruine of a well-policied Commonwealth. And the forme of their discipline (in this case) carieth some correspondence with the Ostracisme vsed amongst the Athenians; only herein is this difference, that the Athenians banished such, whose greatnesse and power grew suspitious to the people, and so sentenced them for ten yeares, whereas here it extended but to rascality onely, and the sentence lasting but three yeares.

The Office for Lodgings.

Eight Gentlemen are appointed to this Office, who haue charge for vnderstanding the affaires of all strangers comming into the City, and what businesse they haue there. All hosts stand bound to giue in writing the names of such Guests, as come from any part abroad, and are not of the City, and those names they must deliuer to these officers. And if perchance some one tell a lye, reporting one thing for another; he is then examined by the strappado, because the truth of his businesse there, ought to be knowne. Such as approue themselves good and honest, being no spies or teachers to the Citie, are kindly entertained, their Lodgings orderly appointed, and their expences well respected.

and out of this hundred are chosen Captaines and Collonels. These men haue good Wages, if they be called to guard the Wall in the night time: whereas otherwise, the guard for the wals consisteth of Citizens artificers, such as haue wiues and children, and are waged with three Crownes each man euery month. At the gates stand men of the country, and each gate also hath two Citizens Commisaries: one of them being there early in the morning at the gates opening, & so continuing til dinner time; and at his parting commeth the other, who stayeth there til Evening, when the gates are shutte in againe.

CHAP. I I.

What benefite and honor it is to a Prince, to haue a comely bodye, a gracious countenance, and venerable aspect.

NE of the parts (in mine opinion) which maketh the Maiestie of a Prince to be most venerable (speaking of exterior graces) is beautie of body: which wee see to be accompanied with singular grauity, and which yeeldeth argument of wisdom and knowledge.

And although the rule of Pythagoras hath often bene noted to faile, affirming, That in a crooked body there can neuer dwell a right soule (because we haue seene in an ill shaped body, to reigne diuers choyce vertues) yet that which is most frequent and ordinary, is to see the contrary. And if an honourable aspect and representation, serued to no other end in a Prince, but to encrease his authority and reuerence, yet are they much more dignified, if some signes of vertue and bountie doe beare them company. As on the contrary, they are diminished by ill shape and deformity. For Cicero sayeth, The habitude of vertue is of such efficacie, that it maketh vs to loue him that is possessed therewith. Euen so, Maiestie in the person of a Prince, hath a veneration meere in it selfe, which attracteth the hearts of his subiects vnto loue: vrged thereunto (perhappes) by no expresse fantasie, that a Prince ought to be vertuous, and conforme his actions to the beauty of his body.

This reason (it may be) hath induced many barbarous people to iudge, that there was no man capable of a good spirit, to bring any great attempt to successefull end; but onely such a one, as was endued (by nature) with a goodly proportion of body, and an honorable presence. Macrobius declareth, that in the life of Merce on Nilus, the inhabitants (who are said to liue halfe againe as long as we do) vse to elect as their Prince, him whome they know to be the strongest, and of far goodlier presence then any other. There is no man, but will repute a deformed Prince, yet vertuous; ought to be preferred before him of goodly person, and vicious: but when wee come to make equality of them, our affection will rather leane to the comely body, then vnto the counterfeit.

Demetrius, the sonne of Amigonius, was of such a goodly and honourable representation, that there was neither Painter or Caruer that durst attempt to portraire him: for there was in him both a sweete complexion, and terror mixed together, yet ioyned with such manuetude & grauity, as it plainly appeared, that hee was meere borne, to be affected, feared, and reuerenced altogether. VVee read of Marius (who had so many Triumphs) that he was of such a venerable aspect, as being prisoner to his enemy Silla: a French man was sent by him to murder him. Who entering into the prison, with his weapon ready drawne, and noting in him a verie graue and dreadsfull aspect; he became to dismayed and terrified, that hee returned backe, leauing the prison open, and (by that means) was the cause of preserving his life. Alexander the Macedonian (being but of meane stature, and not ouercomely countenanced) walking with his deereley affected Friend Ephestion: the Mother of King Darius (being verie desirous to salute Alexander) offered her courtesies to Ephestion, making him many humble reuerences. For, seeing him to be so goodly a man of person; he verily thought, that (of necessity) hee must be Alexander.

Example of deformity in Philopomenes Governor of the Achayans

A City of Achaea on the borders of Sicilia.

A pleasant history of Philopomenes hunting.

The Citizens who opposed Philopomenes to be some more slightly persons then he appeared to be etc.

Historics make report, that Alcibiades, Scipio, and many other, did highly honor and make great the dignitie of their authority, onely by their sightly appearance: wherewith also their innated vertues being combined, did inestimable benefite to their severall Countries and Commonwealths. On the contrary, we finde that many Princes and Captaines, as well auncient as moderne, haue bene despised for their lowe stature, and other defects of honourable presence, euen to the perill of their liues, whereto I purpose to produce two examples onely.

Philopomenes, Duke of the Achaians, and much renowned, was of so lowe stature, misshapen presence, and deformed countenance, that when he arrayed himselfe in mechanike habire (as oftentimes he vsed to doe) he seemed rather to be of vile and vulgar place, then woorthy to haue gouernement of the people. He was greatly addicted to hunting, and therefore resorted very often to Megara. It so chanced on a certaine day, that this desire of hunting carried him further off, then hee had any willing intent to goe: so that hee arrived at the house of a Citizen neare adioyning, who was a singular friend of his, and had lately before bene married. He had but one seruant in his company; because the rest hee had sent to other places, and being come to his friends house, he knockt at the doore: and the women looking soorth at their window, demanded what they would haue; when the seruant replied, that Philopomenes, Duke of the Achaians came to haue entertainment there.

The woman being much amazed, that a man of such worth, and so much unexpected, should come on such a sodaine thither, and (having neuer seene the Duke) reputing thele to be but two of his seruants, which came before to giue knowledge of his coming, because they were thus alone: without returning any other answer, came and opened the doore to them. When they were entred into the house, she sent one of her seruants to aduertise her husband speedily (who was then abroad at the next village:) requiring Philopomenes & the other with him, to sit downe in the meane time, while she bestired her selfe to prepare supper. About the house trots she and her maid, her thoughts much busied and molested, beginning one thing, and then another, but neuer going thorow or finishing any, though she had but little time of allowance. At last, looking on Philopomenes, who sate muffled in his cloake, and might be more cold then hee would make (he of wherbeat (happily) the more smiled, then at his deformitie) she, somewhat roundly (like a nimble stirring hufwife) prayed him to lay by his Cloake, and help her to make a good fire, because her other seruants were else where imployed, and that supper might be made readie in due time, against the coming of his Lord and maister.

Heereupon, he tooke a hatchet which she gaue him, and fell to cleauing wood for the kitchen: having formerly giuen order to his man, to take no other knowledge of him, lest the woman should discern any scruple of the deceit. While hee stood stoutly to this employment; home came the maister of the house, who knowing Philopomenes, and wondering to see him so homely busied; did him humble reuerence, saying, My Lord, this is no office for you to undergoe. Whereto (smiling) hee replied: Worthy friend, let mee alone, I doe but pay the penaltie due to my deformitie.

In our time, Ferdinand King of Spaine, who had the title of Catholike, a verie wise and discreet Prince; but of stature, rather too lowe, then of any mediocrity, and although hee had a royall face, and was a man of great gouernement, yet it appeared plainly in him, that it was not correspondent to his other members. Besides, hee vsually wore his garments of cloth, whereby he was rather thought to be a Citizen, then any way taken to be a King.

The King traailing (on a time) to Naples, accompanied with Queene Isabell, and being there longly expected; by occasion of weather, hee arrived at a haue towne on the Sea coast (called Pentoli) with his onely Gally, the rest being much better prepared, remaining behinde. Landing there, he was honourably received by the Inhabitants, according to the extent of their power in such a place. While the Pallace was furnishing, and prouision for his diet preparing, hee walked alone by himselfe in a Hall, where where (very soone after) a poore blun fisherman came to him, who (by chance) had taken a goodly fish, wherewith he intended to present the King. The Fisherman, not knowing him, desired to vnderstand where the King was: he presently answered him; I am he. The Fisherman brake fourth into loude laughter, imagining that hee had mecrely mocked him; wherefore hee prayed him agayne, to tell him where the King was: and he againe affirmed himselfe to be hee. But the Fisherman, discerning in him no maiestie-call resemblance, either for his person or habite, and no attendants about him sitting for a King; returned backe, and carryed away the fish with him. Hereat the King could not chafe but smile, and some of his especiall Lords and Favourite immediately entering (after they had saluted him with their wonted reuerence) laughing outright, thus hee spake vnto them. Lords, did yee not meeete a Fisherman going forth? If you doe not goe and giue him assurance, that I am your King, wee shall loose the best Fish that euer I saw. Instantly the Fisherman returned backe againe, and beholding him (whom he so much neglected) to bee so duectfully reuerenced by such worthy persons; he beganne to conceiue in his soule, that (vndoubtedly) he was the King, and falling vpon his knees before him, he humbly presented the fish vnto him.

Wee may account this for a merry accident, in regarde of another which happened to him, and by the same occasion of mis-censuring his person. For, at another time, the same King being at Barcelona, going in Procession with his courtly attendants, as wayting on the Sacrament, on the day dedicated to that solemnity: hee was suddenly set vpon by a Spaniard, who gaue him so mightie a stroke with a great Dagger on his necke, as had bene sufficient to smite off his head; but that the blow was rebared by a great chaine of golde, being then (accidentally) about his necke. This Spaniard being taken, and suspected that hee had some other complices in the action; was put to the tortures, where he would confesse nothing else, but onely that he was moued out of his owne mind to do it, in meere hatred he bare to the King. Heere-upon he was demanded, what occasion should so prouoke him to hate the King? He answered; Truly nothing else, but because his countenance did not please him, for, it appeared so vngainly vnto him, that if they did set him at libertie, yet he would kill him, whatsoeuer came of it. Questionlesse, it was a strange case, that a man should so desperately endanger his owne life, because a King was not formed to his liking.

CHAP. III.

Of the inhumane actions, and monstrous cruelties of Aristotimus the tyrant; a subject well becoming a Tragedy.

Aristotimus, vnder the fauours, and forces of King Antigonus, tyrannically vsurped ouer the Eleans, exercising his power so intemperately, that he omitted not any kinde of iniury or cruelty, whereby he might afflict the miserable Cittizens; for he was (by nature) more inhumane and cruell, then any man liuing in his time. Hee added to this his cruel disposition, the counsell of barbarous men, to whom hee not only gaue the rule of the kingdom, but also the gardance of his owne person. Among all the extraordinary cruelties, that which he inflicted on Philodamus, a very honourable Cittizen, deserueth to be recorded for a most especiall example.

This Philodamus had a daughter of admirable beauty & singular graces, named Mica, on whom a soldier called Lucius (an especiall fauourite to the Tyrant) became so extremely enamored; that (in a bold & imperious manner) he sent to her father, commanding him to send him his daughter. Philodamus, much afflicted at so lawcie a command, & knowing what power Lucius had with the Tyrant, fearing also what might happen to him and her mother, laboured by perswasions, that his daughter should go to him. But the yong Virgin, who more prized honor then life, by meere instinct of her noble education, fell on her knees before her father, & embracing his knee very strictly, humbly entreated, that hee would not expose her to such monstrous dishonour, but rather to see her dead before his face, then deliuer her to such shame and indignitie.

The tyrant Aristotimus, Mica in his father.

The father being moued by her teares to compassion, fate downe by his wofull wife, and sorrow now sung grieue in three sad parts, which admitted no leifure for a finall resolution. Whereat Lucius growing impatient, through the violence of his hote and fiery lust, seeing the mayd not brought, according to his wicked expectation: he ran himselfe to the house, where finding her on hir knees before hir parents, fall holding her fathers legge in her armes; with heavy threatnings, hee commanded her to arise, and goe thence along with him immediately. Shee continuing her wofull complaints, refusing to rise, or listen to his menaces; the cruell man, tearing off her garments to her naked skinne, did strike and beate her in most vnmanly manner; all which she endured with a most constant courage, not breathing fourth so much as a sigh, but as one prepared to suffer his vttermoost cruelty.

On their knees fell the mournfull father and mother, before the wretched man, not able to abide so rufull a spectacle, entreating him, to take pity on the Virgine, and their age. But seeing they could not preuaile with this mercilesse barbarian; they called for helpe to the gods, and men, whereat hee waxing extremely displeased, drew out his sword, and slew the Virgine, as thus he embraced the knee of her father. Although this horrible cruelty moued not the Tyrant a iote, yet the Cittizens so distasteth the deede; that some of them hee punished with present death, and banished some other, so that eight hundred fearefully fledde into Aetolia: who afterward writing backe to the Tyrant, desired so much fauour of him, that their wiues and children (with some part of their goodes) might bee sent thither to them, to liue with their husbands.

The women, not a little glad at this good motion, beganne to make vp their hardells, some providing wagons, others horses, for conueying thence their goods and children.

Vpon the day appointed for their departure, all the Gates were set open for them to passe out at; their waggon and horses laden with their children and goodes; and as they offered to issue forth, diuers Sergeants and Catch-poles (standing ready for the purpose) cryed out to them with dreadfull threatnings, to stay and passe no further, ouerthrowing the waggon and horses, laden with their goodes and children, so that they were not able to escape out of the crowds: but beheld their yong children bruiued in peeces vnder their heels, they not being any way vnable to helpe them. Afterward, such women and children as were left aliue, the Souldiers assembled them together, driving them on before them, (like herds of cattell) beating them with stauers towards the Tyrants Pallace, who (causing all their goods to be taken from them) imprisoned them and their children together.

This horrible cruelty did highly displease the Cittizens, who not knowing how they might best incite the Tyrant to pity their wiues:ooke fixtene vestall Virgins, consecrated to Dionysius, and attyng them in their religious habites; theyooke sacred things out of the Temple in their hands, and (in sollemne manner of a Procession) went towards the tyrant, to craue mercie of him for the women and children. The Souldiers, who stood as a garde about the Tyrant, being moued with reuerence to those holy Virgins; made way for them, that they might the easier come into his presence. Aristotimus affording audience, to vnderstand what these women desired, and gathering by the very entrance into their Oration, to what end the full scope ayimed; hee gaue very disdainfull looks vpon his Guard, reprouing them roughly and rigorously, because they suffered them to come so neare him. Whereupon, the rude Souldiers, without any regarde of their Sexe or religious condition; smote them with the stauers of their halberds, giuing them many cruell blows and bastinadoes, vntill such time as they went away from him, being each of them condemned in two Talents fine betide, because they had presumed so boldly to enter into his presence.

There was a noble Cittizen in the Citie, named Hellanicus, two of whose children the tyrant had put to death, and yet (in regarde of his age) did not account him any way to be suspected. This worthy Gentleman, being no longer able to dure, the outrage and cruelty inflicted on

* A Region in Greece, between Acanth and Phocis.

Aristotimus being in fear goeth to his women prisoners, and cruelly threateneth them.

Megeffena, wife to the Noble Lord Thimoleon, chiefe among all the women on his Country : determined to finde out some apt occasion, and to reuenge all wrongs by the death of Aristotimus. In the meane while, the other Cittizens, that were fled before into Aetolia, hauing mustred so many men together as they could possibly procure; entred into open armes, and came into the Eleusians confines, where they fortified themselves, and daily drew more and more to their faction, determining present warre vpon the Tyrant, many neighbouring friends assisting them with supplying forces, so that they encreased to an indifferent armie.

Vpon these proceedings, the Tyrant became afflicted with very great feare, so that he went to the women whom he detained prisoners, and being a man of a diuellsish spirit, couering to compasse whatsoever he would haue, rather by rigorous menaces, then any faire or gentle means) commanded them very roughly, to write to their husbands by Ambassadors, that they should desist from their present enterprise : otherwise, hee would instantly massacre all their children, and cause them to be beaten starke naked throughout the Cittie. To these threatnings the women returned not any answer, which incensed him with the greater rage against them; and hee sternely commaunded them, to giue him resolution what they would do. Some, not hauing the boldnesse of spirit to reply, stood stedfastly looking vpon the rest, as questioning in their soules, which of them should returne the answer, yet making no account of all his threatnings.

Among this company of worthy women, was one, named Megeffena, wife to Thimoleon, who, as well in regarde of her husbands Nobilitie, as her owne innated singular vertues, was held to be the very chiefe of them, & (with the like esteeme) they honoured her. This Lady, when the Tyrant came in among them, would not rise to giue him any reuerence, neyther suffer any of the rest to do otherwise then as she did. She hauing heard the Tyrants menaces, sitting still vpon the ground, and returning no signe at all of reuerence, she spake thus.

Aristotimus, if there remained in thee any wisdom, then wouldest thou not make thy recourse to women, to haue them write a direction to their husbands, what they should doe; but rather thou wouldest send thy wives to them, with better speeches and more woorthy consideration, then thou hast vsed toward them, making a mockerie of vs, by a most base and dishonourable deceit. And now, when thou seest thy selfe able to doe nothing else; thou presumest (by our meanes) to beguile our husbands by faire wordes, as formerly thou hast abused our credulitie. Thou deceuest thine owne iudgement, for we will not suffer them to be agayne overreached by thee; neither doe thou imagine them to bee so foolish, as to sheld their children from death, or preuent the losse of their poore wives liues, they will forebare to execute that whereto they stand obliged: I meane the freedom of their Country. For the losse of vs & their children is not so yokesome to them, as the glad some satisfaction will be, to deliuer their people and Countrey from outrage and cruelty.

Longer would Megeffena haue continued her discourse, but that the Tyrant (being vnable to bridle his rage) commaunded the Ladies sonne to be brought thither, that there hee might be slaine in her sight. But whilst the Officers were seeking among the rest of the imprisoned children for her sonne; the mother (with an vndaunted courage) calling him by his name, sayd. Come hither to me, sweete Boy, and rather die by thy mothers hand, then endure the bloody crueltie of a Tyrant.

These wordes so amazed Aristotimus, and kindled such outrageous cholier in him, that (drawing forth his Sword) hee purposed to haue slaine the Lady. But one of his chiefe familiar friends, named Chilon, standing by, caught her in his armes, and pacified his fury.

This Chilon was one of them, who practised with Hellanicus the Tyrants death, as vnable also to suffer his cruelties. Hee hauing somewhat calmed the extremitie of his rage, caused him to put vp his Sword agayne: plainly telling him, that it was a matter monstrous, and ill becoming the dignitie of a Prince, to soile his hand with the blood of a woman.

Within a while after, there hapned a strange

A City between the Hills of Attica and Olympus, where Jupiter had a Temple.

strange prodigie, as foretelling the death of the Tyrant. For, being in bedde with his wife, whilst the Cooks were making ready his diet, an Eagle was seene to hover ouer the Lant-horne of the Pallace, and letting fall a great stone directly into it (it being ouer the Chamber where hee lay) it made a great noyse in the hall, and giuing a fearefull loud shoute, the Eagle vanished from the sight of all that beheld it. The Tyrant awaking, with the confused murmure of such as had seene it, and not a little dismayed when it was reported to him; sent for a cunning Soothsayer, in whome hee reposed no meane confidence, to vnderstand what the meaning hereof might bee. The Wizard bade him be of good courage, for it figured nothing else, but that Jupiter had an especial care of him, and sent his Eagle so to expresse it. But he told the Cittizens quite contrary, in whome he durst repose his trust, because he knew their hatred to Aristotimus: and bade them be bolde, that some fodayne and strange kinde of death, should (in a short while) happen to the Tyrant.

Heereupon Hellanicus and his Confederates, thought fit to delay the time no longer, but concluded to kill him on the morrow following: because the verie same night, Hellanicus sleeping in his bed, seemed to see one of his sonnnes, that before had beene slaine by the Tyrant, who cryed out aloud to him, saying, Deare father, Why doe you sleepesthus? Wherefore doe you trifle away the time? Stand you in doubt, that you shall not be made Prince of the Cittie? Hellanicus confirmed by this Vision, went early the next morning to finde his vowed friends, hastening them to execute the deed determined. At the selfe same time, Aristotimus had receiued tydings, that Craterus was comming to assist him with a great power of Souldiers, and that hee was already set forth from Olympia. Which news were not a little welcome to him, so that seeming now free from all feare, he walked abroad to take the aire, some small distance from the Pallace, accompanied onely with Chilon, not attending for any more, although they came dropping after one by one. Which Hellanicus well obseruing, thought it now a fit time to execute the enterprise, and without giuing any fig-nall to the rest of the confederacie, he lifted vp his hands to Heauen, speaking aloud; What slay ye for, valiant Gentleman? Why make ye not now the goodliest spectacle that euer yet was seene?

Chilon was the first that drew his weapon, and killing one that came last from the Pallace, who offered to steppe in the tyrants defence; Aristotimus espied Thrasibulus and Lampidius (two whom hee most trusted) drawing their weapons likewise vpon him. Whereupon, hoping to escape their violence, hee ranne into the Temple of Jupiter, where he was slaine by his owne followers. Afterward, his bodie being throwne forth into the open street, the people cryed out, Libertie, Libertie. The women were the first, that (making way through the throngs) came thither; who ioyfully embraced them, that by the tyrants death) were the happy deliuerers of their Countrey. In the meane while, multitudes flockt to the Pallace, where the wife of Aristotimus (hauing heard of the murder of her husband; and doubting how the people would deale with her) shutting her Chamber doores about her; there with her Chaine shee strangled her selfe.

The Tyrant had two very goodly and beautiful daughters, of yeares apt and able for marriage, who hauing heard of their fathers death, had lockt themselves vp close in a Chamber; from whence they were drawne by the peoples violence, and in their furie they would haue slaine them. But Megeffena, with diuers other of the Ladies, stood in their defence, saying: That it were an euill deed, and illly deferring blame, to kill them: considering, they had not leard so much courage of the Tyrant their father, to exercise cruelty vpon themselves. By these speeches the people were appeased, and a decree was set downe, that they should make election of their death, and performe it on themselves with their owne hands, if they had the heart to do it.

So being sent into their Chamber, Aphasia the eldest sister expressing no appearance, eyther by countenance, or any signe else, that she stood in feare of death, loosed her girdle, and fastening it about a timber-beame, resolved to there to hang her selfe, exhorting her sister (with manly courage) to performe the like vpon upon her selfe; Hillaria the yonger daughter, taking her sister by the hand, desired her to permit, that shee might die first. Whereto shee replied in this manner: As during the time, that Nature permitted vs to live like Sisters, I neuer did willingly deny thee any thing; so farre be it from mee now, to refuse thee in thy latest request; howbeit, nothing can afflict mee more, then to see thee die. No longer were these words spoken, but Hillaria taking the Girdle, strangled her selfe therewith immediately. When shee was dead, Aspasia kneeling by her body; and loosing her girdle from about her necke, turning herselfe to Megestena, & intreating, that their bodies might receiue no shame after death; with the selfe same constancie of courage, she ended her life likewise.

CHAP. III.

The reason why men cannot know and vnderstand the truth of many things, while they remaine in this life.

Three principall causes there are, why a man can not know the truth of diuerse things, during his abiding in this world: which if hee could attaine vnto, he might repute himselfe to be wise indeede.

The first is ignorance of his end, that is, he knows not to what end he was created, for it is a matter most ceterayne, that if he did know that he would labor no lesse to obtayne it, then he doth to get dignities & riches: wherein (because they best agree with his appetite) they make him to imagine, that all his happines consists in them. But in this case it fareth with him, as with a kings son in his child-hood. For, if it be demaied of him, whether he doth more affect the succession in his Fathers kingdom, then Apples, Cherries, or some other fruites, presented instantly to him: questionlesse, hee will rather accept the Apples or Cherries, then the kingdom, because he finds them suitable to his yong desires, as hauing both sight and knowledge of them in taste and apprehension.

Even so it happeneth to a man, for if it were demaied of him, whether he best liked to make choice of, Riches or Vile-dom: his election would stand on wealth and power, being meere ignorant, that Wisedome onely is the chiefest wealthy, and that the Wife man only ought to ordaine and gouerne. For, without Wisedome and Knowledge, power is not power, but weaknes; and vnder deprivation of power indeede: And riches without knowledge, is but a bestiall possession, an abundance of presumption, and a kind of sottish substance. Whereas on the contrary, a wise man hath alwayes sufficient for himselfe; & others besides; hauing in him that truly abounding treasure, that can neuer faile or deceiue him: And all this ensueth to a man, because he is ignorant in his true end.

The second cause, is the vse of corporal elections, voluntary and sensible; which ouerwhelme and drowne, not onely the senses of the body, but also those of the spirit and intellect. So that a man, being thus wrapp'd vppe in the mire of this world, is like the beautifull daughter of a King, to whom appetiteth the inheritance of her fathers Kingdom; but hauing committed adultery with some blacke deformed slaue, loseth the right of her succession thereby.

The third cause ensueth by the indisposition of such matter, as many times maketh a man vn capable of learning and knowledge: which commeth often so to passe, in regarde that the region or place of his birth, is vterly disagreeable, and causeth him to receiue a bad complexion. As in some of the Easterne parts, and of Africa, where men are borne so beastly, by reason of the heates extremitie; that they are not capable of any reason: And contrariwise, some places in the northern parts are so colde, that verie furious men are there borne & bred; such as the Goths and Ostrogoths: some whereof feede on humane flesh. And these people may aptly be compared to an Eagle, that hath a stone fastened to her foote, to keep her from ouer-violent flight, which commonly is naturall vnto this Bird, causing her to soare aboue the cloudes.

The fourth is, difficulty in the Sciences. For, although a man doe plainly discern, that the desire of his soule is to seeke attentively, as consering to know the truth of high and deepe causes: yet notwithstanding, he findes them too hard to

There can be no greater treasure or wealth in the world than this.

1. The vse of bodily delights & pleasures, which are the loue, throwes both of body and soule.

2. The indisposition or vncapability of the Country where a man is borne, by two extremities of heat or colde.

3. Difficulty in the Sciences.

to be vnderstoode that he retreates, and quite giueth ouer his enterprife. Wherein he resembelth his owne eye, which fixing respectiue to beholde the Sunne: the splendour thereof prooueth so piercing, that it eclipseth and troubleth his sight, as he is not able to endure it.

The last and strangest of all, is an affection taken by a man in his youth, vnto things wherein he hath beene instructed, and especially when his desire hath lasted of some long continuance thereto. For then, Custome conuerteth it selfe into Nature, and therefore worketh a seled feare in the mans soule, and a singular loue to those things embraced, hauing all other contrary to them, and the whole world (almost) is swallowed vp in this error. Do we not obserue that children among the Turkes, before they can reach to the yeares of reason: doe vterly abhorre our Faith and Religion; and to the Iewes in like manner? Wee see also, that country people, by being inured and accustomed to field-dwelling, do liue grossely, disdayning conuersation with Courtiers, or such as inhabit ciuile Cities. From whence ensued the Prouerbe; Vul-luckie is the Bird, that is bred in a bad vulture. For, by vse and conuersation receiued there, he cannot part thence, though he beholde a much better place for him. And not onely heerein is knowne the power of this habitude: for we our selues do despise them of another countrey (except fight or frequentation haue begot more familiaritie) and only through some bad and abusive relations of them. This error hath also preuayled with women, with whom, matters of long vse beare so high a priuilege, that bee they neuer so bad; yet they despise the contrary, bethey neuer so good.

Finally, this affection to continued vse, and detestation of such things as we know not; extendeth it selfe to all matters in our election. Wherefore, it were good to expell those hinderances out of our hearts, to the end we may (if possibly wee can) know the veritie and truth of things indeed. For, in the knowledge of them, consisteth all contentment in this world, and the way to all felicitie in that hereafter: imitating the good husbandman, that intending to prepare his grounds for the best aduantage, doth first roote vp the thornes and weeds, because his graine will bee the better borne. So, when the Physitian would giue a sicke man health, he first purgeth his stomacke from all corrupt humors; because in matter ill disposed, the former cannot induit it selfe. Let vs then contend against all these impediments; for the reasonable man, that will not yeelde to reason, but onely leane to his owne appetite: is like to him that will sayle ouer Mountaynes, or builde his dwelling in the Sea: for the effect both of the one and the other, are deprived of their proper ends.

Comparisons aptly answering to the purpose.

CHAP. V.

Of diuers Accidents (monstrous in nature) which serued as diuining Auguries, or coniectures of things to come, in olde and ancient times.

In precedent times, whē by permission of the true GOD, sundry Oracles, which were spites of illusion & falshood, hidden in Idolles and Images, gaue answer to Idolaters: many prodigious fights were scene in the Ayre and on the earth.

And because that in these latter dayes of ours (we liuing in the light and truth of faith) none such are now to be scene: it is a matter of some difficultie, to credit what learned Authours haue written, concerning those which hapned in their times.

Yet (mee thinketh) there needeth no distrust at all; for they hauing written Histories of warres, and other occasions happening in those dayes: by inserting the memorie of prodigious Accidents, we ought not to make any scrupulous doubt of them; but rather to rest perswaded; that as they dealt faithfully in the one, they vsed the like iustice in the other; especially, when they are likewise confirmed by many and sundry other Authours.

Oracles of lyres & glosse illusions.

Grave Authours of great credit, deserve not to be distrusted in their writings.

Pliny, in his ninth booke, and in the fifteenth chapter, likewise relateth in the same place, saying, that in his time, and vnder the same Empire of Nero, Vesfius Marcellus, a Romaine Knight, whome the Emperour had sent (on his behalfe) into the kingdome of Naples: had (there in the maritime territorie) two fields, each distant from the other, the one being a fayre meadow, and the other verie thickly planted with Oliue trees.

By an admirable accident, but how, I know not, these two fields chaunged into each others place : for the Oliues field was transported where the meadow stood, and the meadow into the Oliue plottes place; and this was conceyued to be done by an Earthquake. This is not onely reported by Plinie, but also is auouched in the Chronicles of manie learned men, as also in the Booke of the Mountains warre.

And although hee cannot be induced to credite, that men may be metamorphosed into Woolles; yet neuer-theless hee declareth, that Emanthes, a Author of no meane authoritie among the Grecians, recordeth the Arabians to haue written, that in Arcadia there is a great standing Poole, whereto men are brought at certayne times to passe thro-row it: and as they sincke into the sand, they are instantly transformed into the shape of Woolles; and hauing continued so for the space and terme of nine yeares: they doo recover their former formes agayne, according as Fabius Pi-stor in his second booke and in the ninth chapter; who addeth also, that Scopas, who wrote the Olympiades, speaketh of one, named Demarchus, had eaten the bowelles of a young Boy, which they of Arabia had sacrificed to Iupiter Lyceus, and presently hee was transformed into a Wolfe, in which forme he continued the space of tenne yeares, and afterwards recouering the shape of man againe, he wonne the victorie for Lute playing at the Mount of Olympus. Sente Augustine in his fourteenth booke De Civitate Dei, and the third chapter faith, that Varro also recordeth the same. In mine opinion these transformations could not thus happen, but rather were performed by diabolical Ares.

Now, concerning these things of wonder written by Pliny, they are not to be wondered at, because he setteth downe many matters, reputed vterly impossible, as the transformation of a woman into man, and yet himselfe will not credit the like things, or offesse impossibilitie, and which haue beene apparant to his owne iudgement. Notwithstanding, such as consider well the Scriptures, need not meruaile at transformations, happening really, and not feigned. For we know what is written in the seuenth chapter of Exodus and twelfth verse, That the Rods of the Nations were (not in apparence, but in effect, by secret charmes) turned into Serpents. Now, which thing is more easie, to change a Rodde into a Serpent, or the true body of a man (I doe not say his spirit) transformed into a beaust. The opinion of Saint Augustine is heerein auailable, where he sayth; A certayn man conceiued in his minde, that his daughter was turned into a young Mare. And bringing her to an holy man, named Hellarion, the graue olde man looking on her, said; I see a young Maid, but no Mare; for it appeared that by his deuoute prayers, she had recovered her former shape againe. Wherefore we may iudge, that some things are shewne to men, which are not indeede; and such a thing may be apparant, and yet not existent.

But returne wee now againe to our Auguries. It hath bene obserued thre times, that in the opening of a beast, there no heart hath bene found in him : as it happened at the first time, when Caspar
the Dictatour sat in his golden Chaire, and then it was disputed among the Au-ruspices, if a beast were to be found without a heart.

Plinie in his foureteenth booke and the seauenth chapter reporteth; so doth Gi-cero in his Diuinations, that Catus Marius, offering Sacrifice at Pites: euen in the same manner, there was not any heare found in the beast. But it might be there well obserued, that it chanced not thus by nature: but rather was rightly to bee presumed, that false spirits did thus de-lude and abuse the people, taking away
the beastes heart in the Sacrifice time, knowing well thereby what was to happen after.

Ofentimes likewise hath beene observed, that two hearts haue bene found in one beaste. For, wee readeth that in the Sacrifices, which Marcus Marcellus made before hee dyed in the battaile against Hanniball: the first day he found no heart in the beaste he sacrificed; and the next day following, hee found two. Pliny writeth in the place before alleaged, that in Papilagonia, the Partridge hath two hearts: so likewise faith Theophrastus, the most expert (among Philosophers) in naturall things, as Aulus Gellius declareth. Theophrastus sayth, that in * Bifidus, each Hare hath two Livers. And in some places (as in Enbosa) the beastes haue no gawles.

In Nassa it is quite contrary, for there they are very great, and double in diuers. And Frogs, which are there called Ru-bettes, haue two liuers, the one venemous, the other medicinable: so that when they are dead, the Ants make search for them, and feede on that which is Physicall.

Wee reade, that on the day when Pyrrhus dyed, they sacrificed the heads of dead beastes, that licked their owne blood vpon the ground.

The same yeare, when Hanniball was vanquished by the Romaines, vnder Pub-lius Aelins, and Cneus Cornelius, Confulls, Wheate was seene to growe vppon trees.

Arilander (a learned Greeke Author) declareth in his Booke of Prodigies, and in the third chapter (and it is also confirmed by Cneus Epidius, the Romaine, in his Commentaries) that some Trees have beene changed into another kinde of Trees.

We reade also, that in the warre of the Cimbrians, a great noyse was heard in the Ayre, like vnto the sounding of Trumpets, and clathing of weapons. And in the third yeare of the Consulship of Marius, two Armies were seene in the heauens, that went from the East, to meete in the West: besides many other thelike Prodiges, whereof Saint Augustine maketh mention in his Booke of the Citie of God.

Whoſoeuer ſhall reade ancient Hiſtories, needeth not wonder at ſome things, happening in thoſe times, or elſe related by ſuch as haue ſcene them : for ſometimes it hath beene obſerued, that either the ſame accident, or elſe but little differing, hath chaunced in one place as well as another. Among the admirable Accidents, which I haue read in ancient or moderne Hiſtories : I finde that to be very ſingular, and well deſerving memorie, which happened to Agathocles (the Tyrant of Sicilie) in Affrica.

This Agathacles was a man very expert in Armes, whereby (becing but of base condition, to wit, the sonne of a poore Porter) hee made himselfe Lord of the whole Ile of Sicilie. Having had long warre against the Carthaginians, and seeing himselfe beseged (both by Land and Sea) in Syracusa, by Amilcar, with a powerfull Armie of Lybians: hee was of such an vndaunted courage, that, leauing the Citie to the garde of his brother Antander, and hauing certain shippes readly prepared, by the helpe of a cunning fraterage, hee got forth at a narrow port, with about teauen thousand footemen, and a small number of horse, and went to Land on the shores of Africa. Having got there in pay sixe thousand Greekes, he went and beseged Carthage, bringing the Citie into such distress that the Senators knew not which part to take.

them, wherein Agathocles proued alwaies victorious; because the time so fauored him, that he had drawn no meane troups of horse to take part with him. The Carthaginians (beside their Citizens, and many mercenary Souldiers (in great number) which they had for defence of the City, being vnable to equall the caualerie of Agathocles) called one of their chiefe Captaines from Lybia, bringing with him a powerfull army into the field, to haue a day of tryall against Agathocles. After diuers skirmishes passing betwene them, vpon a day, Agathocles would needs assault the enemies Campe (for his men wanting victualles, desired nothing more then present fight) but the enemy being very strongly planted, would not issue forth, though they were very hotely set vpon in their Fort; knowing the necessitie of Agathocles, and the desperate condition of his men.

Agathocles maintained the assault till to his owne losse.

The coming of a treble company of Lybians, caused a strange accident in this confusion.

pass on, and to ioyne with the Carthaginians forces, were misl- led, onely throw the darkenesse of the night. On this they went from Agathocles Campe, till they came within hearing of the Guards and Centinells of the Carthaginians, who imagining them to be the Armie of Agathocles, re-assembled againe for a fresh assault; and hoping to finde them in disorder (as indeede they were, through the foes violence) rayed sodainely such a strange noyse themselves, that the whole Campe fell to flight, and was vterly broken. So that few or none remained, but all were disperfed, some running thwart the fieldes, others backe to the City, to saue themselves.

The Citizens hearing this noyse of the people (conceiuing verily, that it was the enemy, who had foiled their Campe, and came now to assault the Citie) were so confounded with feare and amazement, that they left the Citie without any defence, seeking how they might best secure their owne liues. So that if Agathocles had receiued but the least intelligence thereof, and had gone immediately to giue the assault: this night had made him Lord of Carthage, and the whole Kingdome thereto belonging. Fortune, not yet satisfied with blinde-folde confusion, caused the five thousand Lybians (perceiuing what had happened) to turne backe vpon the disordered Campe of Agathocles, who fearing a fresh onset of the enemies, fled, some one way; some another, and fell into such a madding fury among themselves, that thinking their owne people (still as they mette) to be Carthaginians; they slew one another very cruelly, the obscurity of the night not permitting them to see their owne error. So that, through this inaduertence or inconsideration, five thousand were slaine among the Grecians, and as many of the Carthaginians, flying and fighting in this confused manner. By which means, five thousand men (erroniously misl-edde) against their willes, brake three hoatts of Armies, with no meane example, of Fortunes power in actions of Armes.

CHAP.

CHAP. VII.

How indiscreete a thing it is, and greatly to be blamed in Christian Princes, to permit the Duello, or single Combat between man and man.

Like as abuse is growne among all things (well-neare) in the world, by the coldnesse of charitie in men, and their mallice augmented one towards another; Euen so falleth it out in Duells or single fights. For, amongst great Princes, when they lawfully exercised themselves in Armes, it was honourably admitted in certayne cases, and differences of most high importance, which could not otherwise bee terminated or disced. But now it is grown to such corruption, as euery silly and priuate Souldiour, for very small or simple occasion, presumeth, that it is lawfull for him to undertake it. But that which most of all distasteth me, is to see, that Christian Princes onely doe permit it, considering, that in them (more then in any other) the Lawe doth expressly forbidde it; and it is encreased to such an abuse, that, except God amend it, it is to bee feared, that Prelates of the Church will also suffer it.

The Duell or Combate, is denied to a Christian man, to doe it, to graunt it, and to see it, by reason both diuine and humane, as well Canonically as Ciuile. It is prohibited by diuine reason, according to this argument. Euery acte where-by God may be tempted, is prohibited to a Christian by the commaundement of God; For, it is written; Thou shalt not tempt the Lord thy God. That GOD is tempted by the Duell or Combate, I prouoe it in this manner: To make triall of things, which cannot be reduced to an end by naturall means, but onely by the Hand of Heauen: such attempting is to tempt God. As it happeneth in cases of purgation, where it is most notorious and euident, that (by naturall course or disposition) the strongest, active, and most powerfull person euer vanquisheth the weaker, and of lesse abilitie. Contrariwise, that the stronger bodie shall be overcome by the weaker, can not happen but miraculously.

Bringing then two such vnequall persons into the field, victorie is desired for him which hath right and reason on his side, to the end, that the truth may be made apparent. But then God is tempted, in seeking, that he should performe a myracle; which must needs bee so, when the weaker man conquereth the stronger, being (as it were) directly against nature.

I prouoe it further forbidden by Diuine reason, after this argument: when a Law prohibiteth a thing, it forbiddeth also the dooing of it; and a man performeth an ethicall inhibited thing, when hee knoweth (by the Diuine Lawe) that hee is not to kill a man: The Combate then is flatly forbidden, because thereby murder may happen.

I yet prouoe it otherwise thus. The Diuine Lawe forbiddeth euery action, that differeth from the fountaine of charitie, which is the scope and end, of all vertues, and vterly expelleth vice: The acte of Combate is farre off from charitie, leaning vnto vice; because charitie is nothing else, but to loue God and thy neighbour, and he that enters the Combate to kill his neighbor, is out of all obedience to God.

It is likewise prohibited by the Canonically Lawe, because it euermore followeth the diuine Law: and in plaine reason, what the one inhibiteth, the other neuer alloweth. Combat is also forbidden by the Lawe of men, and the prooue is, that euery thing which repugneth and contradicth naturall equitie, is likewise prohibited by the reason of man, because reason is grounded vpon naturall equitie. The reason of equity among men willesh, that he which committeth a crime, should be punished, and the innocent cleared: notwithstanding, by Combate it falleth out many times quite contrary.

It is further proued by this argument. Naturall equitie, whereon (as we haue already sayde) all reason in men is grounded; is entirely for the conseruation and encrease of them. That acte then, which turneth vnto the diminution and destruction of men, is quite forbidden: so ought Combate to be, because thereby

Miracles only appertaine to the power of God.

Murder may happen by combate.

The acte of combate killeth Charitie.

Combate contrary to the common law, and law of men, and naturall equity.

Naturall equity is for the conseruation of mankind, and combate is for his destruction.

The two main precepts of naturall equitie, are broken by the asse combate.

Combate forbidden by the ciuill Law.

men kill one another, and men are of greatest price in the world. Moreouer, euery acte which repugneth the precepts of naturall equitie, is forbidden by mans reason, because it is grounded thereupon. One of the precepts is, that no man shall desire profit or honour, by the prejudice and hinderance of another. The second is, that no man shall wish that to another, which he would not haue done to himselfe. The acte of Combate contradiceth them both, because hee which commeth so prepared into the field, co-ueteth his owne glorie, by the shame and harme of him against whom he fighteth, which is his neighbour, and wisheth that to him, which he would not haue executed on himselfe; for, he would vanquish and kill him.

It is also forbidden by Ciuile reason, and this is the rule. Ciuile right prohibiteth euery acte, whereby Iustice may be denied to men, or iniurie doone them. Now, in the case of Combate, oft times it falleth out quite contrary, for the innocent man dyeth, and the guilty offender remayneth aliue, so that by this meanes, Iustice can not take her due place.

CHAP. VIII.

Of strange and admirable properties in the Asse.

AMongst all the properties in beasts, those of the Asse are most to be admired; for hee is so mecke and domestick, as that Isidore doth say, He taketh his name of seating; for, in elder times, men most on such beasts backe, to saue themselves securely. Or else it cometh of the Greeke diction Asinos, composed of A, which is a Greeke diction priuatiue, signifying Sine, Without, and Cinos, which signifieth Sensus, Wit or Senses; so that coupling these two vocables together, signifieth, without Wit or Senses: Heereupon it is said, that hee is fearefull to goe ouer a Bridge, where water runneth vnderneath it: because hauing a weak braine, hee is (by instinct of nature) fearefull to fall therein. He is timor-ous also to enter water, how shallow soeuer it be; fearing by the current thereof, his braine may be troubled, and he drowned; which proceedeth from a kinde of knowledge that hee hath of his owne imperfection.

This creature is slouthfull and melancholy, because he is colde, drie, without memory, laborious, and apt to carry burdens. By reason of his great frugality, he cannot liue in colde Countries, and if by aduenture he doe liue there: hee affecteth not the generative action, neither can hee there ingender. Hee beareth best vpon his reines, rather then on his backe or shoulders: for, being melancholic, his bones behinde are the more strong and dry, for there is the signe of melancholy, and there is his skinn so thicke and hard, that though he be bearen with great staues, he cannot be killed without much paines. Also, because he consisteth of an earthie nature, hee is hardly disciplinable, and farneth very little. Albertus Magnus sayth, That by the selfe same reason, hee endureth much paine in his head, and dieth, tumbling his head aside, and in regarde of his heads weightinesse, a thicke and viscusous humour falleth on his lights or lungs, which maketh him to breathe with difficulty, and fall downe frowning. He eateth little, and the more he watcheth, so much the more he drinketh beyond other beasts.

In regarde of his great coldenesse and drienesse, hee can not stirre to ingender, at such times as other beasts doe, to wit, before the Winter Equinoctiall, or else vnder the Equinoctiall, but in the month of May, when the Sunne mounteth, almost to the right angle of the Equinoctiall, and then his grosse humiditie beeing depressed and diminished; he is provoked to the acte with such fury, as if hee were a wilde foale, and especially when he is young. The thicknesse of his skinn, is caused (as we haue sayd) by his grosse humours; and he that mendeth his shoes with leather, of that part of the skinn, where the Asse hath longest borne his burdens, can not weare it out at all, but it will long time endure, passing ouer stony or craggy wayes, and will at the last growe to such hardnesse, as the feete can not suffer it: Albertus Magnus speaketh thereof by prooffe.

An obseruation for the engendering of a Mule between an Asse and a Mare.

From this driness it ensueth, that the milke of the Female Asse is subtil, that it cannot curdle: and therefore it is Physicall for such as are in a consumption. Moreouer, the purity of this milke whitenesse maketh the skin of men or women wonderfully faire, and very cleare. Hereupon Pliny reporteth, that Pappas, Cnocubine to Nero, often used to bathe her bodie in the Milke of a shee-Asse. This beast hath a custome to Vrine in the place, where he smelleth that another Asse hath staled before.

He is very much hated by small Birds, because he bites of the bushes & thornes, where they build their nests: and with his crying noise, makes them fall vnto the ground, or frights them away when they sit in the bushes. The Rauens is his naturall enemy, so that when hee hath taken any harme on his skinn; hee mounteth thereon, and pittifully plagues it with his bill. So do the small Birds likewise, onely to be reuenged of him: but the Rauens aboute all the rest, labours to picke out his eyes with his beake; against which cruelty, the hollow concavity of them, doeth serue him as an especial defence, the hardnesse of his hide, and continuall agitation of his eares; for, by closing his eyes, he chafeth them away with his eares stirring. The Bear also is his enemy, wearying him (oftentimes) to kill him, desiring to feede on his raw flesh.

He will not drinke but at such Springs or Welles where he is inured, & where hee may passe without wetting: but that deserveth meruail, is, that if the water be troubled, though hee be neuer so thirsty, he cannot be procured to drinke, vntill such be giuen hint as is pure and cleare. Pliny saith besides, that he will hardly be constrained to drinke, vntill his backe bee disburthened of his load. The shee-Asse so intirely affecteth her young Foale, and is so fearefull of it by Nature: as shee dreads not to passe through fire to find it.

Ariftole saith, that the shee-Asse will remaine so long time from conceiuing, vntill the graines of Barley, sleepe in the blood of a Muler, be giuen her to feede on. For the generation of Mules, the Mare must be of no lesse age then foure yeares, and not aboute tenne. Now in regard that (naturally) no beast will habite with any other then of his owne kinde, such Heardsmen as would haue a Mule engendred by an Asse and a Mare, do vse this kinde of cunning. The young Asse-foale is nourished with Mares milke all his tender time, but in some obscure place, for better taking it. By this meanes, comming to age (as adulterated) he groweth to loue Mares. And in like manner, notwithstanding the Foales of Mares with milke of a shee-Asse; they habite afterwarde willingly with shee-Asse. And if it happen that the Mare be taken, and the Asse hath yer vse of her immediately, her greatnesse will corrupt, through the extreme coldnesse of the Asse. And so it fareth with the shee-Asse, if the horse haue ioyned with her, and by the same reason.

The Mule that is bred of an Asse and a Mare, cannot engender, the cause (according to Ariftole) is, that the seede of the Asse (as we haue already said) being cold, & that ioyning with the seede of the Mare which (hauing respect to the sexe Feminine) is also of cold complexion; & therefore, that engendered is so cold, as it cannot be proper for generation. And albeit Pliny saith, that diuers times they haue young ones: yet (for all that) it is not naturall, but rather as a thing prodigious.

Ariftole granteth that they do engender, but the fruite cannot be reared or brought vp. Theophrastus saith, That in Cappadocia they engender and haue young; Ariftole further saith, that the Asse farneth more by drinking troubled Water, then that which is cleare, and best agreeth with Kine. The Foale of the shee-Asse, is of so short memory, that following the damme, if it be but fure paces behind him, it hath forgot, and followes no further, but stayes and standeth stone still. It is said, that the shee-Asse hath a naturall custome, when she is ready to Foale, shee withdraweth into some obscure place: but the opinion of Albertus Magnus is, she doth so in regard of the weakness of the Foales sight.

It is a thing well approued, according to the iudgement of the same author, that the Liner of an Asse being boyled, and afterwards roasted the same day, is verie fo-ueraigne for the falling sicknesse, prouided, that it be often vied: the like power hath his hooves, being burnt, beaten into powder, and drinking the weight of three

Moreover, the hooues so beaten into powder, and applied vnto an Impostume, quickly breaketh it. The Vine of an Asie, is very auailable for the Disease of the Reines, caused by grosse humidities; and his dung, either burnt, or not, made in an emplaister, restraineth the Flux of blood, and smokes any house with the Lunges of an Asie, it killeth all wormes and mothes.

Againe, his dung steeped in Vinegar, and applied to the nose in a cloth, cealeth the extreme bleeding: making also an emplaister thereof, and binding it to the forehead, it hath the same vertue. Pliny also saith, that both the Milke and blood of an Asie, are very effectuell against the biting of a Scorpion.

His Vine, applied with Spickenard, encrease the and conserue the haire: and his bones being broken, and the powder of them drunke in white Wine, is very soveraigne against poyson. Aristotle, Alberthus Magnus, and Pliny, reporteth infinite other Vertues, abiding in this much despoiled creature, which would require too long a time to relate.

CHAP. IX.

Of the singular vertue and constancie, of the Noble Lady Aretaphila, the enforced Wife to the Tyrant Nicoreon: And her honest policy, for the deliuerance of her Country.

THE vertue and constancie of the Noble Lady Aretaphila the Cyrenean, deserveth to be remembered in all Ages. She was the Daughter of Aglathor, and wife to Fedimo, who for Nobility and riches, was one of the worthiest men in the whole countrey: and in those times she was no lesse endued with singular beauty, then admired wifedom and eloquence in her speaking. It came to pass, that Nicoreon vsurping the government by tiranies, condemned many worthy Citizens to death. And among other cruelties by him committed, hee caused Melanippus (the Priest of Apollo) to be slaine, to make vsurpation of his Priestly Office.

Afterward, hauing treacherously put to death Fedimo, the husband of Aretaphila; constrainedly, and whether she would or no, he married Aretaphila. Continuing on his pride against his people, & day by day encreasing his cruelty, hee furiously put a great number to death. And because they were to be buried without the City, he was entrusted by some of his pickethanks, that many counterfeited themselves to be dead, for their safer escaping out of the City, onely thereby to auoid his cruelty. Hereupon, guards of souldiers kept the gates, with long Iron Pikes and Bodkins, made red hotte in the fire; wherewith they pierced the bodies carried by, to try whether they were dead or no.

These cruelties, were greatly displeasing to his wife Aretaphila, who grieved to see her Countrey thus oppressed; and to such a height grewe her compassion, that hating Nicoreon for her former Husbands death, hee resolved to make adventure of her owne life, to free her country from so bloody a Tyrant. And although Nicoreon affected her extraordinarily, & bestowed infinite fauours on her, onely to please her: yet could shee not quit her thoughts from this magnanimous determination. And, when (through the tyrants power) all hope in the people was vnterly lost, for euery freeing themselves from his tiranny: she onely grew the stronger in her confidence, that shee should compasse the means of his death.

Herein she was still the more encouraged; by remembering the vndaunted resolution of the Thebanes * Phraas, so much renowned thorough the world, counting to imitate her example. But because shee had not the benefite of assisting Friends, as Phraas had; she concluded her enterprise alone by her selfe, purposing to kill the Tyrant by poyson. By which meanes she ranne into great dangers (as you shall reade hereafter) in regard shee failed many times of her attempting; and being surprized at the last; all dissimulations were not sufficient, but shee was conuinc'd by most euident arguments.

At this time, Caluia, Mother to the tyrant (being a Woman of ferie temper, and one that heauily hated Aretaphila) laboured him by earnest perswasions, to put her to death with grievous torments: but the feruent loue of Nicoreon towards her, and her owne courageous spirit, in answering the accusations of her enemies; occasioned the delaying of her death. Nevertheless, after much clamor and constraint, she being conuinc'd by apparant testimonies, and no longer able to denie, but that shee had prepared a breuage for him: In the presence of the Iudges, with an vndanted and cheerefull countenance, thus she spake.

The Speech of Aretaphila, in the presence of the Tyrant, and all her hatefull enemies.

MY Lord and Husband, I freely confesse, that a drinke was prepared by mee to giue thee; yet farre from so much as thought, that poyson, or any harmful thing should therein be compounded: but onely as a drinke, whereby to incite feruent loue and affection. For, seeing my selfe to be enuied by so many Ladies, in regarde of the kinde loue by thee extended to me, and exalting me to wealth and honor, farre beyonde any capacity in them of compassing the like; fearing withall (most worthy Lord) that they would not spare their uttermost endeuour, to kill this louing kindnesse in thee towards me, and quench the true affection so long continued: I made that breuage purposely, to preserve the heat of loue in full power, and rather urge it to a higher reach, then suffer it to quail in the least degree. If therefore hereint I haue offended, Reson (me thinks) should free mee from punishment; in regard that [I] should loue (to confound that foule fiend hatred) thereto procured me. Neuerthelesse, if I shall bee saide to merite chastisement; it cannot urge death, as to an hatefull opposer: but rather such an amiable and fauouring affliction, as such a wife may be thought worthy of, who will not spare to practise any enchanting Potions on her Husband, to con-

uince his Loue in correspondencie, equall vnto hers.

Such was her constant carriage in this ansvver, and appearing of so sound truth in the Tyrants opinion; that by no means he would permit these should bee put to death. Onely, through their diuelliish & violent vrging, he suffered her to be further tryed by Racks and Tortures, as hoping (that way) to extort confession. Caluia causing the extreamest tortures to be prepared, stood by, while they were inflicted on her, euen according to the measure of her monstrous cruelty; and so many violences was done to the poor Lady, that Caluia her selfe, grewe wearie with the very sight of them. So that Aretaphila, not confessing any thing more then shee had done, was deliuered from further tormenting, and adiudged innocent by Nicoreon; repenting that hee had permitted her to bee so cruelly misused, and his loue now growing to farre greater extremity towards her, made him labour by all amorous blandishments, and gifts of extraordinary vauel, to reconcile fauour. & qualifie all conceiued vnkindnesse in her. And the, being a wife and sprightly minded Lady, had her owne discretion so much at command, that shee could seeme as earnest in loue to him as euer: yet carrying an inward vnconquerable remembrance of her Countreys Oppressions, and her owne extreme wrongs, waiting but time and meanes for iust reuendge, which offered it selfe to her in this manner.

Shee had (by Fedimo her husband) a yong daughter, of admirable beauty and vertuous qualities, named Miraguarda; and Nicoreon had a Brother, named Leander; youthfull, gallant, and somewhat disolute in affection to women, which made her the more diligent, to procure liking in him towards her daughter, and easily shee prevailed therein, by the help of amorous enticing drinckes, and other deuices, wherein shee wanted no furtherance of her cunning Physician. Beside, the witty instructions shee had giuen her daughter, for her carriage in the company of Leander; caught fire on the Tinder of his affection, in such violent manner; that (in all hast) he entreated his Brother to graunt his marriage with Miraguarda, wherto he as quickly gaue consent, provided, that he could induce the good liking of Aretaphila thereto, which was not long in obtaining (though excused with some fewe faint and modest doubts) because it was the only mark (he aimed at, to compasse that which she further intended.

Leander, being married to his beloued Miraguarda, their mutuall affections so sweetly sympathized together, as he could neuer be satisfied with her louely embracings, nor shee contented without his company. During the heate of this reciprocal fierie temper on both sides, Miraguarda, ingeniously instructed thereto by her mother (knowing she could craue nothing of her Leander, that eyther hee durst or would deny her) aduised him to the killing of her brother. And so futable were her witty remonstrances to his yielding soule (allegding the acte to be generous, the freeing of his country from tyranny, and a certaine assurance to himself, that in requittall of so blessed a benefite, the people could not chooſe but elect him their King, by whom they enjoyed theyr long desired deliuerance) that he liked the motion extraordinarily. Nor left shee off so, but plyed him still vnto the same purpose, that if hee did make deniall of the dede, the Citizens (in their violent hatred to the Tyrant) would acte this Tragedy themselves, as thereto they were all solemnly sworn; and then there could be no security of his own life.

So preuailing were these persuasions with Leander, that instantly he conspired against Nicoreon, perceiving that Aretaphila did not disallowe it; and imparting his intent to Dannilis, his familiar & very faithfull friend: by his assistance he slew him, sleeping in an Arbor of his Garden, and thereby became Lorde of the Kingdom. The possession whereof made him so proud and powerfull, that, despising Aretaphila and her worthy counsell, the world might plainly perceiue, that hee was rather a murderer of his Brother, then a conspirator for his countries freedom, because hee gouerned by iniustice and improuidence; albeit (afterward) he began to reuerence his mother in Lawe somewhat more respectfully, though the people were still oppressed, by many extreme violences.

Aretaphila perceiuing, that shee had not yet deliuered her country from tyranny, concluded to compasse it by his death likewise. Heereupon, by secret intelligence, she wrought with Anabius, a wise Prince, and a Native of Lybia, to rise in Armes against Leander, wherto he was very easily induced. Hee being at hand with a potent Army, Aretaphila conuersing with Leander, told him, that his Capitaines were not equall in courage and strength, to those braue Warriors that came with Anabius, and therefore it would proue disadvantageous for him, to make hazard of his weake forces against him, being not certaine of his owne subiectes, whom he had too much prouoked by his harsh vsage; and therefore farre vnfit to be trusted in trial of warre. Wherefore she aduised him, to labour by honest & plausible meanes, that a pacification might passe betwene them; promising, to practise such meanes her selfe, that hee should haue a friendly imparlance vwith Anabius.

Leander liked well the Counsell of his mother in law, and praised her to proceed therein; whereupon, shee dealt for the day of their meeting. Preuailing so well (in the meane time) by faithfull Messengers to Anabius, that when Leander should come forth to confer with him: he either should kill him, or take him prisoner, promising a great sum of money for the performance thereof. Leander being fearful by nature (as commonly all Tyrants are) daily deferred the enterparlance: but his mothers pressing him with shame of base cowardise, and saint-hated effminacy, (shee promising to goe along with him in company) procured him to issue forth vnarmed. Anabius coming on to meete him with his traine, Leander made a timorous flay, saying; hee would not passe any further, vntill he had his guard about him. But Aretaphila, one while by faire speeches, another while by foule reproaches, calling him nothing but coward at euery words, still made him to walke on alog with her, and taking him by the arme, as to inspire him with courage, brought him forcibly to Anabius, and deliuered him vp as his prisoner, who safely there kept him, vntill the promised summe of money was sent him.

CHAP. X.

Of the Famous Philosopher Euxinus: And of a Letter sent by the Senate of the Athenians, to the Lacedemonians.

BETWEENE the Athenians and Lacedemonians, a verie cruell warre was waged, about the difference of certaine Confines, and in the field of battle, the Lacedemonians being foyled and discomfited by the Athenians: the vanquished desired truce with the Victors, and for their easier attaining thereto, they sent (as Ambassador) the renowned Philosopher Euxinus, who spake in so eloquent a style to the Senate, and onely in the praise of peace, deliuering such learned and pleasing allegations, as not only truce was granted to them, but also they freely gaue them those Confines, which they pretended was appertaining to the, and (by the chance of warre) hadde lost. Such power had the Oracion, deliuered by Euxinus; and the Senat of Athena back to the, acquainted them with their minds in this maner.

The Senate and People of Athens, send health and peace to the Lacedemonians.

WEE call the Goddess to Witness, that in the late passed battell betwene vs, Wee more greened to see you so bloodily vanquished, then we ioyed in our owne fortune of victory: because the effects of Warre are such, that damage is certaine to the Conqueror, and benefit to the Conquered is doubtfull. Wee could heartily haue wished, that the demand by you now propounded, had bene before in like manner required: but such is the lot false both on you and vs, that you haue lost very much in this warre, and yet wee can boast of no benefit thereby. For the rule is most certaine, that whatsoever is appointed by the Gods, cannot be comprehended by humane iudgement, nor impeached by the power of man.

You require truce for three moneths, to the end, that in that time, an agreement may be concluded betwene vs. Wee returne you answer, that the Senat of Athena neuer vsed to make truce, after they had begun a War: obseruing (as a most ancient Lawe) that either they accept of cruell warre, or else freely condiscend to perpetual peace.

Wee labour and practise in the times of peace, to allure Wise-men into our Schooles, to helpe vs with their counsell in the times of Warre; and now they aduise vs, not to make a truce on suspected conditions: wherein wee thinke they counsell vs well, because a counterfeyte peace is more dangerous then an open waged warre.

The Philosopher Euxinus your Ambassadour, hath spoken so eloquently in the Senate, that we hold it vnreasonable, to deny any thing by him named: and therefore it is a matter more honest, to grant him peace that requires it by kinde words, then him that rudely asks it with the Weapon. Wherefore we tel you, and now giue you to vnderstand, that our Senat (with a franke and free hart) granteth to you Lacedemonians, loyall peace, deliuering you from all suspition of war: And this wee doe, that the world may know, the Athenians are of so great spirit against the audacious, and so woorthie friends to such as are wise, that they both know how to chastise foolish Capitaines, and how to be commanded by discrete Philosophers.

The occasion of the war between the two States.

Well worthee, that all our difference hath growne about possession of Townes feared on the bankes of the Riuer Milina. By this letter we tell ye, and sweare there to also by the immortal Gods, that wee freely renounce all right wee can pretend vnto them, on this condition: that (at our meeting) you shal giue vs your Ambassador Euxinus: for the happy Athenians do more affect a Philosopher in their school, then a whole Province for their Commonwealth. Yet Lacedemonians account it no acte of leuitie in vs, to change townes and territories, to bee gouerned by one onely man: because the Philosopher can teach vs how to liue well, whereas such Countreyes may giue vs occasion of dying ill. And in regard, that (of ancient enemies) we now declare our selues your true louing Friends: We not onely deliuer you from Warre, and send you Peace; but likewise will giue you Counsell how to conferre it; for the Physike that preferueth health, is farre more excellent then that which expelleth diseases. And this is the remedy which wee giue you.

Honourable counsel giuen by the Athenians to the Lacedemonians.

As ye desire, that your yong men shal exercise themselves to Armes, in like manner bee as diligent, that your Children may haue Learning in due time: For, as Warre is made with cruell weapons, so with sweete words is peace soonest obtained. And thinke not (Lacedemonians) that wee heere to aduise yee without cause; for, in leauing the counsell of the Wise, and suffering ydenesse to encrease among the people: it engendred seditions and ciuill Vwarres, onely to make men murder one another. Nor would we haue ye thinke vs friends to busie praters; for our ancient Father Socrates appointed; that the first Lesson read to a Scholler in our Academy; was, that for the space of two yeares, hee should not dare to speake a word; because it is a matter impossible, that any man can be wise in speaking, except he be admirably patient in silence, and knoweth howe to hold his peace.

May it please you then, to permitte Euxinus to remaine with vs, and imagine, that if wee hope for benefite by his presence; you may rest assured, that from such counsell as he giues vs, you cannot receiue any damage. For, it is a very ancient law in Athen, that the Senate may neuer attempt any Warre, vntill our Philosophers haue first made examination, whether the cause bee iust or no. So wee cease, praying both your and our immortal Goddes, to preserue you and vs in perpetuall peace: for that onely is perpetuall, that stands confirmed by the will of the Gods.

A common law for our Christian kingdome.

Many haue written of their properties and qualities; as Aristotle, Pliny, and many more: beside, I find in elder times, that Hiliscus Tatinus was verie inquisitive, to vnderstande the properties of these Creatures, and that he might render the fonder reasons of his knowledge; hee liued in Forests and solitarie places, where best he might attaine to his owne intent.

Men are not born for themselves, but for the commonweale.

None but one King may haue the order of Government.

Mutual loue and charity among the people is no vaine happiness.

And Aristotelmus likewise, for the space offorty yeeres (without attending to any other exercise) gaue himselfe wholly to the same labour: and both of them wrote diuers Bookes very apt and worthy for all posterity.

The first and most notable thing, obserued in the writings of moderne men, is that they haue noted an admirable kinde of Religion in these little Creatures: For, before they will issue forth of their Hives, they bow downe their heads forward in such humble manner, as if they were devoutly at meditation on their knees. Declaring therein (euen by Naturall instinct as it were) to vs, that we should not undertake, or beginne any thing, before wee haue first honoured God, and recommended our endeouours to his gracious goodness, that they be begonne and ended in his name. Very respectiue are they, that by the food they gather from sweet Flowers, they may produce hony, beneficial both for others and themselves; demonstrating thereby, that men should labour (by veruous means) to performe good actions in their life time, auailable both for themselves and others; considering it is a duty required in men, and for which they are born, not to labor for themselves, but also for their Countrey, and their Friends.

They are content to liue in their owne habitation, without intruding for dwelling in anothers house. As a notable example to vs, that (for the peace of the Commonwealth) euery man should rest contented with his owne, without coueting or vsurping ought from any other.

Euery Hie hath his King, and both he and his attendants, doe shun noyses, clamours, and windes. Which teacheth vs, that we ought to haue one cheefe Commander in one Commonwealth, by who all the rest may be well gouerned: & that we should shunne the sinne of Ambition, in being greater one then another in the Commonwealth, to the end, that there may be good discipline. Also, we should flee from all windes of vanities, tumults, partialities, and enmities. Flight, labour, food, and fruite is common alike to euery one; to let vs vnderstand, the mutual loue and charity which ought to be among Citizens, in being helpful one to another: and partaking likewise in others distresses. for by this meanes, mens mindes become linked together in such amity, that the Commonwealth flourisheth in peace and quietnesse, and is a goodly president to other estates.

These creatures liue without lubricitie, although they engender more then any other. Which instructeth vs, that for the peace and repose of the people, men should haue care of childrens generation, to perpetuate their owne kind and the Commonwealth, without lusting after adulteries: but to liue chaste and temperate in pleasures carnall, the libertie wherof doth procure contentions, quarrels, and death.

They doe respect their King with such loue and obsequence, that they account it an honourable deede to die for him. And Saint Ambrose saith thus: They will not flye abroad, until they first see, whether he will flye forth, or no: that they may keepe him company, in finding foode, and other effects for common benefite. Which may minister example vnto men, for honouring their Prince, to whom GOD hath giuen such Authoritie, to be assisted and imitated in those paines, which he taketh for the good of his people, hee being the principall of the Commonwealth.

They endeour continually, to elect such a one for their King, as (in appearance) is most Noble, as also the mildest, not vsing his sting against anie other, which onely is as a punishment for offenders. Aduiſing vs hereby, to elect such for our Gouernors and Magistrates, as are of generous Nature, discrete, wife, and debonnaire. And these small creatures, are of such nature, that they who are of greatest bodie amongst them, are also (commonly) the most humane and gracious. Signifying nothing else to vs, but that he ought to be most milde and courteous, that is exalted vnto the highest dignity, as well in Nobilitie of blood, as in wealth and vertue: which things naturally beget enuy in others, and yet destroy themselves by humanitie, and conuerteth into loue. Most obedient are they to their King; and if any one haue declared disdain, or disobedience, & the same bee discerned: hee neuer attendeth for other correction, but instantly slayeth himselfe with his sting. Whereby we are admonished, to be faithfull and loving to our Prince or Magistrate, and fearefull to offend, even to death it selfe.

No idleness amongst the Bees, but all employed in severall offices, & all for general benefit.

No Bee is slothful or idle in the Hieve; for some flye forth to combate against other in open field: others watch to seeke for fooode; others contemplate times, to foresee when stormes and raines will ensue; others compose the hony Combes; others lay aside the waxe by it selfe, and thereof others make little Lodgets, caries and rounds, in very straunge and wonderfull order. Neuerthelesse, in so many and sundry offices, no one intrudes into anothers businesse, or dare make any stealth or robbery from his companions: but by his owne labor and vertue, hee feedeth abroad on herbes and flowers, and yet brings a part of his pains home, for general good of the Commonwealt. Herein we have a notable instruction, to abhor & banish out of our Cities, slothfull rogues and idle vagabonds, that will not live by their owne labour as they ought to doe. Wherefore through such deboshment & negligence in men, all such vices arise in Cities, as doe corrupt good manners, and overthrow order: for every one shold live upon his owne endeavour, without vsurping ought of others; and what he hath superfluous, is for general aide of the Common-wealt, and to be ministred to others necessities.

The weapons of defence for themselves, & offending enemies to their State.

Nature hath given them stings to defend themselves, and offend such as dare assaile them, or presume into their city or hieve: and although they are not of any great copulencie, yet notwithstanding they have unconquerable courage & prudence. For with the gum of trees, they annoynt the superficies of their hives, to the end, y no beast or other enemy may enter in at any rift or chinke; and if the passage or rift be over large, they labor diligently to restrain and make it lesse. By which example men are admonished, to be stout and courageous for defence of their countrie, and wisely to foresee, that no Vices enter into their Common-wealt, that may infect, corrupt, or poyson it.

By naturall instinct, they are enclined, that each one sties on the first flower hee finds, and parts not thence away, untill hee have taken his refection and nourishment: whereof he wil discharge himselfe, before he seekes out any other. And much they frequent the leaves and flowers of the Olive tree, making there from long abiding: serving vs as an example, what sobriety we should use in the course of our Life. When they feed on the flowers of the Almond tree, their hony is the more sauiour and temperate; whereas contrary-wise, when they feed on bitter herbs or flowers it is far less sweet: notwithstanding, it is thinner, very mundificative, profitable for the opilations of the Liuer, and good for the dropic, as also to heale the biting of a mad dogge.

Such as haue made triall by experience of these creatures, doe iustifie, that when their king cannot fly, he is carried abroad by troops of them; and during the time y he liueth so sickly, the females are separated from the males. But when he is dead, then they conuerse together again: which declareth, what pity and piety wee owe to our Prince and countrey, and that men shold gladly support and suffer for one another. The sting of the female is sharper then the males, & there are many males, that haue no stings at all. Hereby we may vnderstand, that the tongues of women are more piercing then mens, & oftentimes cause very great inconueniences: in which respect, they should be kept short & tempered, that their lauish liberty breed no blame and contention among neighbors. The best Bee is litle, round, closely plump bending in the midst, and least hairy. Some feed on flowers of the mountaines, others on them of Gardens and husbanded places: the first whereof, are much lesse then the other, as also more strong and robust, to endure labor. Beside, according to Pliny they are of far dreadfuller aspect, abiding in the rifts of trees, or in some smal vaults. And what fairer example can nature afford vs, then of their strength and abilitie? For, such people as are not educated in delicacies, but in continuall exercises of mind and body; are most profitable members for the Common-wealt. Closely they ply their worke in their hives, & feed on the superabundance of their Combes, knowing by meere instinct of nature, that if they shold not do so, & giue vigilant attendance: Spiders would get into the hieve, & there kil the. When they haue but smal store of hony, the most of them keeps the entrance, y it may not be taken from them untill they are better provided. A worthy president to men, to banish all superfluous things out of their Common-wealt, least by the means of them, the venome of hatred may be bred among the, which may procure the death of one another. And when death or scarcitie happens in their Cities, vigilancy is needfully required, to preserve such store as they haue; that it may not bee elsewhere transported, & so publike calamity ensue thereon.

There are a kind of Bees which labour not to produce hony, but eate that already made, and they are longer then the other: the good Bees haue continuall war with them, to expell them out of their Commonwealt. Signifying to vs, that slothful persons should be excluded from other mens company: and such as seeke to feed by others sweat. Their King neuer flies abroad, but he is attended round with a great company of Bees, and if it so happen, that they meet with another flight of Bees, that likewise haue their King with them, they leaue their owne, to accompany the new King. And if their owne King contend, to reduce them againe vnder his obedience; they kill him, and follow the other newly made choise of, and him they elect as their king. This excess he hath very sildome, & is one of the two imperfections which these creatures haue in their government: beside it is necessarie, that in every kind there should be some vice. If they chance to sting hard, they put forth the whole length of their sting; whereon themselves die withall, because their bowels issue out thereby.

Their Kings and Governours sting but sildome, although they are thereto provoked; for some say, that they haue no sting at all. And Pliny is not certaine, whether they haue any or no: but notwithstanding, he is well assured that they sting not: Neither care they that the king should be so armed, provided, that he bee of good government, valiant, & maiestically: which proueth, that Princes ought to be benign, milde, and patient: neuer to take any delight in cruelty, but rather to be gentle & mercifull. Such is the cleanliness of these creatures, that they cannot endure any foule or noisome sauiour; & therefore when they returne to their Citie or Castle (for such they account their Hieve to be) they discharge their bellies in the aire, & many times (through bad finelles) they become sickly, and so soone as any one of them dyeth, the rest hurle him out of the Hieve. They grow sicke also thorough idleness, and therefore they will not suffer any to bee slothfull amongst them: and the smell of boiled fish, such as Crenises, Lobsters, and Crab-fish is deadly to them. An excellent example for men to liue cleane & neatly, free from a vicious life, carefully respecting both their soules and bodies.

The winde is very contrary and hurtfull for them; and therefore when it is great, stiffe and boysterous, the hives ought to be carefully covered. VVarme places they affect in winter, as other creatures doe, and in Summer, fresh aires are most fitting for them. It is very necessary to vse diligence, when the hony is taken from the: because, if ouermuch be taken away, they will labour little; and if more likewise be left then is conuenient, they will bee the lesse diligent in making more, & therefore a moderate and reasonable quantity must remain, according to the number whereof they consist. VVhat worthier example to men can there be then this? declaring that in the commonwealth, euery thing ought to be moderately measured; because ouer-great, pompous, and luxurious dyer, do but destroy famous families, abounding in all superfluous things. And yet not to be too niggardly and sparing in provision needfully required. For as by the first children and seruants may become careless and negligent; so by the latter, they may grow wretched and desperate.

Another diligent care is required in the that make vse of Bees, to witte, that when they heare their great swarming noise in the hieve, it is a significatio that they would begone and leaue the hieve: but then if the hieve be gently sprinkled ouer with sweete wine, they will not stir abroad. Such as keepe them may easily take note hereof, because (ordinarily) they make no other noise then when they are flying: Wherein we are instructed, that by sweet language and kind behauiour, we may qualify sterne anger in discontented bretheren. Aristotle further saith, he did wel obserue it by experience, that their feet before are shorter then them behind; which is so giuenthem by nature, for their easier rising from the ground. He saith moreover, that when the hony corrupteth in the hieve, it engendreth certaine wormes, which make webbes like vnto Spiders; whereby they wexe sicke, and dye. A very apt example for men, to bee vigilant and respectiue of themselves, that the sweet daies and prosperitie in the world, doe not so corrupt their soules, as to beget the banefull worm of ambition, which is deadly. In moyste times of raines, they multiply greatly, by reason of the humidity: and contrariwise they decrease in the times of drought, shorow want of moisture. Also in Winter, their strength much faileth them, in regard of cold weather, snowes, and windes out of the North; which hindereth theyr fruitfulness, and therefore they keepe closely hidden. But when the Flowers of Beans begin to sprout, they come abroad to labour: and the first worke they doe at home, is to build their dwelling houses, next to engender, & then to yeeld hony.

They make three feuerall rampiers before their Combes, as their garde and strength: the first crust (being vtmost) they make of bitter; the second (within) somewhat sweeter; and the third, thickest of al, because it ioyneth next to the Combes; & thus is the foundation of their defence. A good instruction for men, how to shape their building in this worlde, to vse diligence in their prouision, so soone as they can, especially of things necessary, then to marry, for encrease of children, and still to keepe employment in naturall exercises. When they flye forth vpon some vrgent occasions, and are preuented by night, so that they cannot returne home vnto their owne habitation, they sleepe topsie turuy, the vpside downe, because cold mists, fogs and raines should not offend their wings, to hinder their flight home to their owne houses, or execution of their other enterprizes and affaires.

Sentinels they haue of their owne appointment, who make a noyse at break of day, by which found they all awake; and turning themselves on their secte, they make a noyse againe to their Sentinels, as a thankfull signe of ioy: but then, vpon another sound from the same Sentinels, they are all silent, as attending what instant charge is to be giuen them. Informing our iudgements, in times of warre to bee very vigilant; well provided, and no way negligent. Excellent experience haue they, when raines and vnseasonable times will ensue, which they foresee by flying abroad in the Euenings, about their owne needfull occasions; and finding it to follow as they feared, they will not by anie means boudge from home.

They haue (beside) a maruellous order among them; namely, that the youngest Bees flye abroad, and bring home the fooode; the elder sort biding at home, to dresse and prepare it. But that which is yet far more admirable is, that when the yong ones arrive, laden with hearbes and flowers laboriously; some of the aged sort do meet them at the entrance, and help to ease them of their burthen. Moreover, such as come so home ouer-charged, seeke the sweetest aires to passe thorow, and where they are calmest: as fearing, least rude winds should make them let fall what they haue carefully gathered, or dry vpe their honey, and therefore they flye lower towards the ground: and such as can bring home no lading, are wont to carrie little stones or grawell, that by the weight of them, they may the better resist impetuous windes.

By this precedent example, yong men are admonished, that they ought to stirre and labour in the Commonwealt; & the more aged, to preserve the fruits of their paines. Yong men also, that do busie their braines in the blusterings of ambition; should take a lower flight, and neerer to the ground, esseeming themselves to bee no more then men: considering vprightly in their soules, that whatsoever benefit ensueth by their paines to the Commonwealt, they stand bound thereto by obligation. Let no man therefore ouer-ween, or strue to ougo or be aboute other, except his contention be honorable, & that his trauell may most aduance the good of the Commonwealt.

While thus these poore creatures are laboring abroad, their King abides at home, hauing a strong court of guard about him wel armed with their stings, for the defence of his person. He goeth abroad but very seldom, and when it is his pleasure to goe forth, he is (in like manner) royally attended. But whic he will haue his army abroad to any expedition; three daies before, loud summons is giuen for orderly preparation. If any troop of them swerue from following him, they find their error, by smelling to the ground where the King hath past, & so pursue in that tract, vntill they ouertake him.

A wonderful order naturally obserued among them, the yong being laboring for the elder.

A notable admonition for the better pointing of the Commonwealt.

The King is wonderfully defended by his Corps de Guard; & flying abroad with his army.

him. It is to be admired, how highly they are comforted in his presence: for if he be lost by their negligence, the army loofeth it selfe, and then they go to ioyne with another King. Pliny also reporteth, that whē their king dieth, they are so full of anguish and sorrow, that they will neither feed nor flye abroad for any prouision: so that if he be not taken away dead from before thē, they will also dye with greefe and hunger. Tutoring vs heerein, that if strifes & variances happen among vs, they should not last of any continuance: also howe the death of our Prince should be irksome to vs, because little benefit cometh by changing Governours. Thus we perceiue, how many good examples may bee deriued from the Bees Commonwealt, not vterly vnecessary for our imitation.

CHAP. XII.

How sinfull and dangerous a thing it is to desire reuelations from the dead, or knowledge of things belonging to future life.

Like as God, who hath created vs without our felues, will not saue vs without our felues: euen so hath he giuen the ground worke of all means for our saluation, which is Faith, with hope of all those blessings, which (in the ancient Law) he hath promised, concerning the life to come, which also he hath reuealed by his owne sonne, and are not to be obtained without beleefe and hope in him. But humane frailty, or to speake more properly, Faith in man is so weake, that when the glorie which God hath ordained for that life is preached to him, he answers, he beleeueth it: But yet notwithstanding (saith he) it is a matter of no meane meruall, that of so many men as haue dyed, not so much as one man is returned back, to tell vs the secrets of that other life.

The very greatest signe of incredulity, that can be in the heart of man (in mine opinion) is this earnest desire, to wish from God a reuelation of the life to come. For seeing that faith consisteth in beleefe, and to hope in such things as are not apparant if they were reuealed to vs: why then faith remaineth no more, and so the singulare meanes of saluation should be taken from vs. I say moreover, that by such manner of reuelation, not onely should faith be destroyed, but also it would bee an occasion in vs, whereby to runne into great error against God, as wee may easily prouue by this argument.

Admit the case, that our father, mother, or brother were raised, and returned again into this world, euen in the same flesh as they parted from vs: and to the end, wee might the more confidently credit theist, to be the very same persons, they did eate, drinke, & conuerse with vs (as our blessed Sauior of the world did with his Apostles, to auoide all scruple of doubt, that they were not shadows or phantasmes) they reuealing to vs, matters belonging to that concealed life: no doubt need to be made but wee would listen, and verily beleeu whatsoeuer they said to bee true. If this were so, all were but man, hauing a bodie and a soul, and we beleue him, whom we credit to be but a man, who is a liar by nature. Hereon then it followeth, that in giuing faith to him, we shal shew our felues rather to beleue a man, naturally a Liar; then God, who is the soueraigne truth indeed, and cannot lie, but hath oftentimes repeated to vs, what rewarde is prepared for the good, and what punishment for the wicked.

I thinke then, there is no man, but he will confesse it a greuous sinne, if hee should lend faith to a reuelation, desired by a reached man, to beleue the creature, rather then the Creator. Let no man then couer that which may redound to his own damnation; considering, what God hath bestowed vpon him, and also what is denied for his saluation, when hee may helpe to worke it with feare and trembling. If all are tyed to this conclusion, so much the more it belongeth to a Christian, whom our Sauior hath taught to beleue, whatsoeuer hee hath reuealed in the Scripture, And faith in the Parable of the Glutton, that to know heavenly things, wee haue the Lawe and the Prophets to instruct vs sufficiently.

An argument to approue the infallibility of the matter alleged of reuelations by the dead.

God onely is true, & al men liars.

The creature ought not to beleue, but the Creator onely.

CHAP. XIII.

Of a Disputation made in Antioche, in the presence of King Ptolomy, by seven severall Ambassadors, to know, which of their kingdomes had the best Lawes and Customes.

King Ptolomy being at Antioche, Ambassadors from the Romanes, Carthaginians, Sicilians, Rhodians, Athenians, Lacedemonians, & Sicyonians, came thither vpon severall occasions to him. And sitting at supper with the King, a disputation chaunced to be moued, concerning the condition of their Countries and Common-weales, which of them was best policied, and provided of good Lawes and commendable Customes. The dispute was long debated & maintained among them, being defended with good and sufficient reasons. Whereupon, King Ptolomy, being desirous to be resolu'd in the truth, commanded each man to speake the customes in their kingdomes: whereby might best be discerned, which of the Prouinces merited most to be commended.

The Ambassador for the Romanes first began, and answered in this manner. We hold our Temples in great and reuerend respect; wee are obedient to our Governours; and greuously we punish wicked and lewd liuers.

He for Carthage next spake, saying. In the Common-wealth of Carthage, our Noblemen fight for vs; our Plebeians & Mechanicks labour for vs; and our Philosophers enstruēt vs.

He for the Sicilians, said. In our Common-wealth, Iustice is intirely kept; our Negotiations are truly managed; and all liue equally togethier.

Hee for the Rhodians, saide. In our Common-wealth, our olde men are honest; our young men bashfully modest; and our women liue solitarily, vsing but few words.

The Athenian Ambassador saide. In our Common-wealth, we neuer consent, that rich men shall be partiall, poore men idle, nor our Governours ignorant.

He for the Lacedemonians, said. In our Common-wealth, enuy cannot reigne, because we are all equal; nor auarice, because all our goods are in common; nor idleness, because all labour.

In our common-wealth (said the Ambassador for the Sicyonians) wee permit none to voyage forth abroad, because at his returning home, hee shal not teach & instruct vs in matters of nouelties; neither do we suffer Physicians, who may kill our healthfull men; nor do we allow Orators, because we couet not quarrelling causes.

When King Ptolomy had heard all the seven Ambassadors, he highly commended all their kingdomes; affirming, that they were all well and iustly gouerned. That each of them had good Customes, worthily deseruing commendation: and that it was hard for him to iudge, which of them was best ruled and ordered. So the Ambassadors taking their leaue of the King, returned home vnto their severall countries, very ioyful and contented, that the king had dealt with them so graciously in iudgement.

Of a very proud and sumptuous Temple (dedicated to Venus) in the City of Corinth, in the seruice whereof, were five hundred Ladies: And of the answer of an Abbess to a great Lord.

In Corinth, the principall City of Achaia, liued a tyrant, famous for wealth & vicious life, firnamed Hieron; who caused a sumptuous Temple to be built in the middle of the City, in the maner of a Monastery, & dedicated it to the Goddesse Venus. ton and lasciuious, were held in greatest estimation, and reputed to be most holie and religious. It was not lawfull for any of them to go out of the Temple; but each one might there sinne, and please her selfe with such as the best liked, and as often as shee would: so that all their Religion consisted not in being honest and vertuous maydens, but they had power to doe what they pleased.

Among them was an other Lawe also, that if any of them had a mind to marrie, shee must giue or wince her dowrie, by the infamy of her body, which was permitted that she might to doe. Moreover, that beside her husband, she might haue an amorous friend: for, in being dedicated to the goddesse of Loue, they intended, not to loose the name of Vanton and Amorous. And no married wife or widdow, might offer in this Temple, but only virgines. And such as were so vnhappy, or wretched in fortune, to come and offer their Oblations there: before a yeare was expired, became a she diuell in this hellish sanctuarie; and of a chaste virgin, a shamelesse and lasciuious strumpet.

All such as had admittance there, were expert in reading; writing, singing, playing on instruments, and dancing. Whereby men were allured thither extraordinarily, and it was no shame for them to bee scene there.

The like Temples are (at this day to be scene) in the Portugall Indias, in the Prouinces of Iapan, where there are about eight hundred Monasteries; the least of which hath more then thirtie Nunnes in it, called there Banzes; whereof there are two sorts: one clothed in blacke, the other in lighter colours.

It is a common fame in those Countries, that these Banzes doe feede on a certayne hearbe, to auoyde conceiuing with childe; but if conception can not be prevented, then they eate another hearbe, to destroy the infant conceived. They enstruēt yong maydens in reading, and such is the foolishnesse of the people, to credit verily, that they can deliuer the soules of their deceased parents from Hell; and therefore (in that respect) they are greatly honoured and reuerenced.

We our selues in these dayes (almost monstrous and miserable) neede not trauaile so farre off, to find out Monasteries, where Religious women or Nunnes (if wee may tearme them Religious) leade their liues as lowly and diffolutely, whereof themselves make no other concealement, but that all commers and goers, finde there exceeding kinde wellcome. Which enueth by ouer-much libertie & ydleness, or else, by being placed there by their parents, contrary to their owne liking. But the good and virtuously disposed (whereof there are many) are not comprehended amongst these deboshed women: And as for the voluptuous and immodest; they regarde not who knows their loosefenesse, and may well say of themselves, as an Abbess did, of whom Nicholas Boyerus maketh mention in his Decisions. She had fortie Nunnes vnder her charge, and there belonged to that Monastery twenty Priests.

It came to passe, that a Prince, whose predecessours had founded that Monastery; passing that way, and visiting the Religious companies: found all (else where) in good order, except the number of Priests, and these Nunnes, whose number he thought not well ordaind; whereupon hee sayde to the Abbess. Truly Madam; me thinkes, that in stead of forty Nunnes, forty Priests had bene better appoynted; and twenty Nunnes onelic had bene sufficient. My Lord (quoth she) perhaps the order is not so ill contriued, as you imagine it to be, neither is it to be condemned: for, of the fortie Nuns heere appoynted, twenty are for the twentie Priests; and the other twenty serue for all comers and goers.

because more answers were returned thence, then from all other Oracles. were nothing else but ydle imaginations, and mere fables proceeding from the diuine, the father of lies. And by good right were such abuses and superstitions condemned, by them that had knowledge of our true eternall God; as Daniel, Baruch, and other holy men, who detested such Idolls and Images of the Gentiles, made of golde, silver, stone, wood, and other matter, and by the hand of man.

CHAP. XVI.

¶ What care our Elders had in ancient times, concerning the performance of their Sacrifices.

N ancient custome (good and commendable) hath euermore bene, not onlie on the behalfe of Christians, but also amongst the Ethnickes: in acknowledging the benefite they received from God; not by wordes alone, but also by effects and exterior Sacrifices. So that there is no Nation so barbarous, but hath confessed his God, by some outward signe. And the Roman Senate did alwayes holde Religion in veneration, that so often as they met together (as Varro reporteth.) Although they had affaires of great importance, and which required hastie diligence: yet the first thing that they propounded to themselves (before decision of any doubts) was religious humiliation to their gods.

At all times, and whensoever the Romaine Conquills or Emperours should go forth to warre, they neuer would prepare for the field, till they had first sacrificed to their gods, saying, All felicitie and prosperitie proceeded from them. And Marcus Aurelius saith; They helde it for an infallible rule, that there can be nothing perfect among mortall men, except it bee perfected by God. Lycurgus, the ancient Law-maker of the Lacedemonians, among other Lawes, ordained: That no man should be so bolde to secke for fauor from a Prince, except he were knowne to serue the Gods diligently. Nor do I alledge these examples, as intending to confirme my saying by Pagans and Idolaters: but onely to make vs blith with shame, by seeing, how farre they exceeded vs in pietie and religion.

For,

For, if wee would reade Histories, we should finde, that Gentiles and Pagans sought carefully, to recouer all their necessities from the gods.

In the time of Quintus Fabius and Publius Decius, they warring against the Saminites and Herrurians, the Roman Matrons performed wonderfull things, neuer ceasing day and night, in offering great Sacrifices to the gods, saying: If they were once appeased, they needed not to stand in feare of their enemies.

But Caue we Idolaters, and let vs seeke what the ancient children of God did, who at all times, and whensoever they were afflicted, had their recourse to Sacrifices, when they would expresse their thankfulness to Almighty God, for benefites received. Noah, after hee came forth of the Arke, erected an Altare, sacrificed thereon, and the sacrifice was so acceptable to God, that he promised him, neuer more to downe the world againe. Good Isaac, being gone from the house of Laban, to giue thanks to God, built an Altare, which hee consecrated to God. The children of Israel, being afflicted in the wilderness, layd: Let vs go on for three dayes, and afterward wee will sacrifice unto our God.

We reade in Esdras, that after the children of Israel were returned, to re-edifie their Temple, that they might sacrifice to God; they were so carefull, that building with one hand, they helde their weapons in the other, to defend them from their enemies.

In Leuiticus, mention is made of innumerable Sacrifices, whereby God pardoned offences committed. Hereupon Daniel being in the captiuitie of Babylon, and seeing the Sacrifices to be forsaken, sayd: In these times, there is heere neither Prince, Governour, nor Prophet, nor Holocaust, nor Sacrifice, nor Oblation, nor Incense, nor place to offer our Firr-fruits on before thee: Reue thee therefore vs, with our soules broken; and our spirits cast downe. Elias also, lamented grievously, because the Altares were ouerthrowne, and in his earnest zeale to God, vnable to suffer such ruine, desired to die. For without all doubt, nothing is more miserable, then when the seruice of Almighty God is despised, and where it faileth, a punishment from God surely followeth.

Aarons sonnes, Nadab and Abihu, were consumed with fire from heauen, before all the people; because they observed not the Lawe ordained for the Sacrifices.

King Balthasar, prophaneing the vessels of gold and silver, dedicated to the Temples seruice, to serue his wifes & concubines for drinking therein at his Table: diuinely sawe a Hand writing on the wall, foretelling his neere approaching ruine; so that he was taken by his enemies, and slayne the same instant. Achab, hauing prophaneed the holy place, erected a Temple to the Idoll Baal: but afterwards, going against the Syrians, he was slayne with an Arrow shot from a bowe.

The Records of Histories doe also tell vs, that Pompey, hauing made a Stable of Gods Temple, after hee had robbed, ransackt, & spoiled Ierusalem, became thereby so abominable to GOD, that thence forward hee was most vnfortunate. And although hee had before vanquished two and twentie Kings, yet at the last, himselfe was miserably overcome. The sonne of Darius was so prowde and presumptuous, that hee would not onely abuse men, but euen the gods also, and sent foure thousand men to beate downe the Temple of Apollo: but to great a hayle and tempest fell from Heauen, that destroyed them euery man. For this cause, the good Emperour Marcus Aurelius, writing a Letter to the King of Trinacria, reprooued him greatly, because he had beate downe a moiety of the temple, to enlarge his house. Thou thinkest (quoth he) that the stones and mortar, wherewith the Temple was built, to be of small value: it is very true; but the Gods to whom they are dedicated, are most mightie. I wish therefore, if thou wouldst have peace with the Romaines, (hauing scandalized Rome, and grieved the Senate) that thou shouldst take as much of thy house to enlarge the Temple, as thou hast taken from it, and build it a great deale higher, and wider then it was; and then thou shalt be happy, in taking nothing from the house of the Gods, but rather that they possess part of thine.

The Athenians, who were alwayes conquered by the Lacedemonians, in many wars which they haue had together: complayned to their God, because they had exceeded in their Sacrifices to him, farre beyond those of the Lacedemonians. But the Oracle of Iupiter made them answer thus:

¶ Of diuers and sundry opinions of the Philosophers, concerning the seate of the Soule in the body of Man; And a contrarie coniecture of the Platonists.

Plato and Democritus say, That the seate of the Soule is in the head. Straton the Philosopher limiteth it; Betweene the eye-browes. Erasistratus within the skinnie or filme of the Braine. Heraclitus placeth it, in the outward agitation. Moschion giues it place, throughout all the body. Xenocrates, in the crowne of the head. Parmenides, Epicurus, the Stincket and Aegyptians, lodge it wholly in the heart: as the like doth Orpheus. Xerxes, King of Persia, thought it to be in the eares. Empedocles in the bespe or pile of the bloud. Philo the Iew, in his Booke of Allegories of the Lawes, saith thus. The reasonable facultie or part of the Soule, is in the head; the irascible, in the heart, and the concupiscible, in the groin, or lower part of the belly.

But we Christians, hold it to be in the heart, whence proceedeth good and euill cogitations. Saint Augustine in his booke concerning the knowledge of true Life, writeth thus; The Soule is dispersed throughout all the body, and keepeth wholly in every part thereof. Very true it is (sayth he also) that it yeldeth far greater effects and actions, in some one place, then other: either by the will, which in that place sendeth out his strength; or else by those instruments, proper and commodious for action.

The Platonists say, That the Soule descendeth by Cancer, and mounteth agayne by Capricorne, and I thinke, that from hence they ground this coniecture. Because Cancer, is the house of the Moone, the vortice whereof gouerneth ouer the vegetable parts, it viuifieth the body; And Capricorne is the house of Saturne, which presideth for contemplation, whereto the Soule being freed from the body it may walke at libertie.

CHAP. XVIII.

¶ How men ought to shunne and auoyde Curiositie; And what penalties and punishments were appointed by our Auncients, for curiouse people.

HE Athenians had a Lawe, which was well obserued among them, whereby euery man was forbidden (of what degree or qualitie soeuer he were) that hee should not dare, to enquire of any stranger, newly arriued in their Cittie: from whence he came, what hee was, nor what he sought for; vnder penaltie for him that demanded such questions, to be well whipt with rodde, and banished his Countrey. The end for which our graue Auncients made such Lawes, was, to keepe men from the vice of curiositie; which is alwayes ouer-ready, to prie into other mens affaires, and be regardlesse of their owne.

Plutarch, Aulus Gellius and Pliny doe thinke, that they can neuer sufficiently commend Marcus Portius the Romaine, because no man did euer heare him, to enquire what newes were at Rome; nor how the people liued in their houses. His talke alwayes was, of such things as hee knew was profitable for the Common-wealth, or else fitted such demands as required necessary answer. Plato, writing of Diomysius the Syracusan, speaketh thus: The curiouse man, that would know the life and actions of another man; is more friend to his enemies, then to himselfe. For, hee will quickly beset with his tongue, in talking of his enemy, and what harme hee knoweth by him; but neuer cares what foule offences himselfe hath committed.

A King of Sparta requested Pindarus to tell him, what was the most difficult thing for a man to doe? Whereunto Pindarus thus replied; Nothing is more easie for a man, then to reprove an others, nor more difficult scuall, then to endure reprehension in himselfe.

Penetres, who among the Thebanes was a Philosopher much renowned, could neuer be numbred among the curious, nor condemned with the malicious. He hauing liued as a Philosopher, for the space of thirtie yeares in the Academies of Thebes; being blamed by some, because hee did not reprehend the finnes which hee sawe committed, answered: When I know that I haue no sinne in my selfe, then will I beginne to reprove sinne in other.

Plato departing from Sicilie, for his returne to Greece, and taking his leaue of Diomysius, the King spake thus vnto him. After thou comest among the Philosophers of Greece: O how ill wilt thou speak of me, and of my tyranny? Plato answered; Doubt not (Diomysius) what I shall speake of thee in the hearing of Philosophers: for their manners are so vertuous, and themselves so employed in their studies, that they haue no time to heare idle talke. Morouer he sayd; Know, O Diomysius, if thou beest ignorant, that such is the height of our Philosophie, as to perswade and counsell men. Then euery one should iudge himselfe, and not to busie his brains, to defame or reprove the liues of other.

Philippides, who was the first inuenter of Comedies, being a great friend to king Lyfistimachus; the King conuersing with him vpon a day, sayd; What dost thou desire of me (O Philippides) and I will freely graunt it thee, whatsoever thou requirest? The greatest grace (quoth Philippides, that thou canst giue me, is, neuer to acquaint mee with any of thy secrets. O wife and worthy answer! read by many, and vnderstood of few: For, if this Philosopher would not know the secrets of a King, much lesse would hee vnderstand them of his neighbours.

CHAP. XIX.

¶ Of the three Conquests of England, by the Saxons, Danes and Normans, occasioned by the finnes, either of the Princes, or of the People, or of both.

IF wee consider the three diuerse Conquests of England, since it receyued the Christian faith, and the state thereof at the same time, together with the iudgement and testimony of the grauest Authors that haue written thereof; we shall easily see, that the same haue proceeded of no other cause, but by the finnes of the Princes, or of the People, or of both. For, although the infirmities of man is such, as there neuer wanteth matter for Gods Iustice to punish in Common-wealths (by reason whereof, we see, that in all Countreys, the people are scourged more or lesse from time to time, not onely particularly euery one in his owne person, with misadventures, sicknesse, losse of goods, death of children, and such like, but also generally, with plagues, famine, inundations and warres) yet the subuersion of Common-wealths neuer chaunceth, but for some great excess of sinne, eyther in the Prince, or in the People, or in both: And commonly, after many warnings & admonitions giuen by gentle and sweete corrections. Such being the longanimity and patience of Almighty God, that he layeth the Axe at the foote of the tree, long before he cutteth it downe, and trieth all means to cure the soares of his seruants, by lenities and fomentations, rather then by cauterisings and incisions, or by cutting off the infected member, which hee neuer doth, but when there is no other remedy.

This course (we see) hee helde with his owne people, for, though hee often chastised them with famine, pestilence, inuasions of enemies, and ciuile wars: yet (after a while) hee euer restored them to tranquillitie, plentie and peace, vntill they proued so incorrigible, that the Prophet Ieremi in the second chapter, and the thirtieth verse, lamented, in the person of God, that all his Fatherly corrections were lost vpon them, saying: Frustra percussisti filios vestros: I haue beaten and chastised your children in vaine. And againe, the aforesayd Prophet in the fifth chapter and in the third verse, saith to Almighty God; Percussisti eos, &c. Thou hast beaten them (O Lord) and they haue not bene sorie; thou hast consumed them, and they haue refused to receiue correction. As who would say; there is no other remedy left, but reprobation, subuersion, and vtter extirpation of them. And therefore Almighty God gaue gaue them ouer into the hands of their enemies; first, the tenne Tribes in Samaria, as in the fourth booke of the Kings the seuenteenth chapter and eightene verse, which were all taken with their King Hosea, and translated into Syria. And afterward also, the other two Tribes in Juda, were carried into captiuitie by Nabuchodonosor king of Babylon, where they remained three score and ten yeares. And though they were afterwards restored to their Country, and their Temple redified; yet at length they were (for their extreme ingratitude, and peruerse obstinacie) vterly ruined.

The like proceeding Almighty God vied with England, in the time of the Brittaines, after they receyued the Christian Faith; for he chastised them, sometimes with dearth and famine, sometimes with pestilence, and other-whiles with incurfions of their enemies, and with ciuill warres amongst themselves: so long as the same sufficed to reduce them vnto repentance, and amendment of their sinfull liues, as sometimes it did; which their famous Countrey-man Beda, and ancient Guildas called, the Sage, doe testifie: Declaring, that the Brittaines, being partly driven by famine, and partly by inuasion of Scottes, and Pictes, eyther to abandon the Country, or to hide themselves in the Mountaines, Woods, and Caves; craued helpe and succour of the Romaines, writing vnto them that lamentable Epistle, whereof Guildas maketh mention; in the which they sayd: Our barbarous enemies doe drue vs to the Sea, and the Sea doth drue vs backe to them agayne: so that of two Kindes of death we haue our choice; that is to say, Whether we will haue our throates cut, or else be drowned. Thus wrote they to the Romaines.

But being not succoured by them, by reason of their great warres at the same time with Attila, they beganne to haue recourse to the mercie of God, and to relie wholly vpon his helpe (as the forsayd Authors haue reported) and so (with his assistance) assailed their enemies out of the Caves and Woods where they lay hidden, and not onely gaue vnto them great ouertrowes, but also droue them out of the Country; and shortly after had such plenty of corne, fruite, and all kinde of victualles, that the like had neuer beene scene, nor heard of before in many ages. Whereuppon followed the effect, which Moses noted and lamented in the children of Israel, Deuteronomie the one and thirtie chapter and the three and twentieth verse; Incrassatus est dilectus (sayeth hee) & recalcitrauit: The beloved people of God was made fatte, and then they beganne to kicke: that is to say, (as hee expoundeth it euen presently after) Incrassatus, impinguatus, dilatatus dereliquit Deum factorem suum. Being become faire and fatte, they forooke their God and Creator; so fell it out with the Brittaines.

For, they prouoed so vngratefull for Gods great mercy towards them, that (as the aforesaid Authors doe affirme) they fell into the extremitie of all mischief and wickednesse. Non solum secularis viri, &c. Not onely Secular men, but also the Ecclesiasticall; giuing themselves wholly to drunkennesse, to animositie and contention, enuy, cruelty, hatred of truth, loue of lies, and all vice. Wherevpon our Lord scourged them with such a pestilent mortalitie, that (within but a while) there were not men enow alieue (as these Authors testifie) to burie the dead.

And when that sufficed not to reuoke them from their vicious liues; Non multo post (saith Beda) acrior gentem peccatricem ultio diri sceleris secuta est. Shortly after, a sharper punishment of such detestable wickednesse followed vpon that sinfull people. For the Pictes and Scots beganne againe to make such irruptions vpon them, that (not being able to withstand them) they were forced to call in the Saxons to assist them. Quod Dominum nra (saith Beda) dispositum esse conitat, &c. Which it is manifest was done by Gods disposition, to the end that their wickednes might receiue due punishment. For, within a while, the Saxons did confederate themselves with their enemies, and picking quarrells against them, destroyed all the Country with fire and sword, burning vp houses, villages, and townes, and killing all sort of people: in so much, that many fledde into forraigne Countries, and others hid themselves amongst the hilles, mountaines and wooddes, vntill acknowledging the iust iudgement of Almighty God vpon them, they called to him

And especially at Blackamore in Yorkeshire (for so was called Mons Badonicus, as saith Polydore Virgil in his third booke) where they made such great slaughter of them: as that (for some certayne yeares) they did not further molest them.

For, being (as Guildas in his booke De Excidi. Britan. reporteth) mindefull of their former calamities, and of afflictions laid on them for their finnes: all sorts of men spirituall and temporall, as well the Princes as their subiects, did euerie one their ducie in his vocation. At illis (saith Guildas) decedentibus, &c. But they being dead, and another Age succeeding, ignorant of the miseries past, and corrupted with present ease and pleasure; All truth and iustice was so subuerted: that there appeared not so much as anie sight thereof, in all the aforesaid states of men; Exceptis paucis, & valde paucis. Excepting a few, and those very few. For, the kings (saith he) were Tyrants, the Iudges most wicked and corrupt; the Priests negligent of their ducie. Rare sacrificantes, & nunquam puro corde inter altaria stantes. Seldome sacrificing, and neuer comming to the Altar with a pure heart. Ignorant, impudent, simoniacall, lasciuious; and all sortes of Lay men loaden with wickednesse, with murder, parricides, pride, adulteries, swearing, periuries, blasphemies, and all Kindes of iniquitie.

And now to shew some particularities of this, and how iustly the vengeance of Almighty GOD was powred out vpon the whole Kingdome: The same Authour, in the place before cited, toucheth briefly the liues of some of the Kings and Princes, which liued in his time: as of Constantinus, Aurelius, Conanus, Vortiporius, Cuneglasus and Maglocunus, taxing them with tyrannie, periurie, sacrilegious murders, and parricides (committed euen before holy Altars) adulteries, horrible incests, breach of vovves, of religion and chastitie; yea, and two of them with beastly Sodomic.

For the which enormities, and the generall corruption and wickednesse of the whole Kingdome, hee threatneth, or rather prophesieth vnto them, vnto ruine and destruction; which (shortly after) worthily fell vpon them, as the Brittish Chronicles by Geoffrey of Monmouth in the twelfth booke of his Historie and the fifteenth chapter, also acknowledged: For hee sayth, That King Cadwalader (who was the last of the Brittaines race) vied these wordes, as hee fledde by Sea into France, with the reliques of the Brittaines nation; Va nobis peccatoribus ob immania scelera nostra, &c. Woe beeto vs sinners, for our grieuous fins, wherewith we neuer ceased to offend God, while we had time of repentance; and therefore now the punishment of God fall's vpon vs, which roots vs out of our native soile. Thus saith K. Cadwallader, and more to that purpose.

Afterward hapned the inuasion of the Danes, who first by piracies, & after by open wars, cruelly infested & troubled the realme at sundry times, for the space of almost 200. yeares. But the good king Alfred, or Alfred, Founder of the famous Vniuersity of Oxford, recovered all formerly lost, & droue the Danes out of England: except such as were content to become Christians, to whom he gaue the kingdomes of Northumberland, and of the East-Angles, who, during his time, neuer moued warre. And they of the Easterne parts, stirring afterward against his sonne, called Edward, were by him vtterly overthrowne; as also the other in Northumberland, in like manner, and vpon the like occasion, were subdued by his Grand-child Alstane, who made England a Monarchie, which so remained and flourished without further infestation of the Danes, during the reigne of four kings, the successors of Adelfane; to wit, his two brethren, Edmond and Elared (who succeeded one another) and the two sons of Edmond, called Edwin and Edgar, which Edgar was (for his excellent vertues, and prosperous reigne) called Honor & delicia Anglorum. The honour and delight of England: or, as Ingulphus termeth him, Honor & Rosa Regum: The Honour and Rose of Kings.

Of whom it is written, that in his time, all Ecclesiasticall Orders flourished, learned and vertuous men were highly esteemed, all ciuill and forraigne warres ceased, and he was called the King of Albion, being no lesse powerfull by Sea, then by Land. No yeare of his reigne passed, wherein hee built not a Monasterie, or else did some great and notable good to his Countrey: And such were his vertues, and great fame for felicity, that there came principall men from out of all the Countreies adioyning, to see, and be acquainted with him.

King Cadwallader flying in to France, acknowledged Gods iustice vpon himselfe and his people for their fins.

Now, whereas the Danes returned againe into England, shortly after Edgar, in the reigne of his sonne Etheldred; and not onely molested it with incursions (as they were wont) but also conquered and possessed it for a time: it may well be presumed, that they were but the instruments of Gods iustice therein; and that this conquest made by the Danes, proceeded of the finnes, partly of the famous King Edgar (though hee were dead before) and partly of his wife Alfreda; and lastly, of their sonne Etheldred, in whose time the Countrey was conquered. For, although King Edgar excelled in all pietie and vertue in his latter dayes; yet hee did an ake in his youth, whereof it may be thought, that his children and posteritie payed the penaltie.

This I say, for that after the death of Alfreda his wife (by whom hee had King Edward the Martyr) hee fell in loue with Alfreda, wife to a Noble man called Ethelwoolfe, whom (with her consent) he caused to be killed, to the end he might marrie her. How grieuous this sinne was in the sight of Almighty GOD, and how iustly punished in his posteritie, wee may well iudge by the like offence of King David, who, to the end he might marry Bathsheba, procured the death of Uriah her husband, for the which, the Prophet Nathan, in the second booke of the Kings, chapter twelue, verse ten, told him from Almighty God; that the sword should neuer depart from his house; and that his sonne in the Cradle, should die therefore. Beside, Almighty God permitted (for punishment of that sinne) that all his other children (except Salomon) died most unfortunately. For Amon, hauing defouled his sister Tamar, was killed by his brother Asholom; and Adonias by Salomon; and lastly, Abelom rebelling and fighting against his owne father King David, was miserably slaine, hanging on a tree by the haire of the head. And therefore no marwell, that the like sinne of King Edgar, was also seuerely punished in his children.

To this purpose, it is to be noted, that his marriage proued most vnfortunate, not only to the fruit that proceeded thereof, and the whole Realme (as shall be declared hereafter) but also to king Edward, his sonne by his former wife, who shortly after was killed, by the meanes of Alfreda his stepmother, for the aduancement of her sonne Etheldred. Wherein I cannot but note (by the way) the seueritie of Gods iustice in punishing sinne, seeing the sayd young Prince, being very holy and innocent of life, could not escape the temporall punishment, due to his Fathers offence.

But to proceede, such was the common opinion of the innocencie and holinesse of this young King Edward, and enormitie of the sinne committed by Alfreda, in the murder of him: that the conceit of most men at that time was (as William of Malmesburie witnesseth) that the Conquest of England by the Danes, was a punishment of God for the fame; which well may be so presumed, especially, if we adde therunto the offence, not onely of his father (whereof I haue already spoken) but also of his brother Etheldred, for whose cause hee was murdered; and in whose time that Conquest hapned. For it may be thought most consonant to the Iustice of Almighty God, that Etheldred (being the sonne of the wicked Alfreda, and fruit of the cursed marriage; yea, and withall, most wicked of himselfe) should beare the penaltie as well of his owne, as of both his parents finnes: As partly was fore-tolde at his coronation, by Dunstan then Archbishop of Canterbury, saying: That for his Mothers sin in the murder of King Edward, both hee and his children should be seuerely punished, and his Kingdome transferred to strangers.

And if wee doe consider the manner of his life, and the nature and qualitie of his offences; we shall find them to be the very same, which the Scriptures affirme to be the cause of the translation of Kingdoms from one nation to another; whereof Ecclesiasticus saith: Regnum de gentem gentem transfertur, &c. Kingdomes are transferred from one nation to another, because of iniustice, iniuries, calumniations and diuers deceits. In which kinde of finnes sinnes King Etheldred greatly exceeded; for he had his eares so open, and shewed such fauour to all kind of accusers and calumniators; that (as Polydore Virgil saith) No mans life was in securitie. Besides, on euery light occasion, spoyld & banished the richest and wealthiest of his subiects, being also addicted to all kinde of riot and dissolution. And therefore William of Malmesburie writeth of him briefly thus: Etus vita cursus sanus in principio, miser in medio, turpis in exitu: The course of his life was cruell in the beginning, miserable in the midst, and shameful in the end.

Furthermore, he was so cowardly and base minded, that hee was no lesse contemptible to strangers abroad, then hateful to his owne subiects at home. Whereupon, the Danes tooke courage to enter England againe, who made him graunt them a yearly tribute, wherewith they were content for a time; and after turning thither agayne, forced him to flie into Normandie, and to leaue his kingdome to Sveno their King, who exercised all kind of cruelty vpon the English, and enioyed the Kingdome as long as he liued. Which was not past five yeares. After whose death, Etheldred recovered it againe, and possessed it two yeares, whilst Canutus sonne to Sveno was held busied at home, with a rebellion of the people of Normandie.

In which meane while, Etheldred returned like the dogge to his olde vomite of cruelty and iniustice, especially against the Danes (who had bene for some yeares planted and marrowed in England) causing many of them to be killed with cruell torments. And amongst others, Sigifred and Morganus, two of the noblest of them) were falli accused of fained crimes, and put to death for the same. Besides, Prince Edmund sonne to Etheldred, rauished the wife of Sigifred, being a woman no lesse admirable for her beautie, then commendable for her chastitie. All which when Canutus vnderstood, being moued with desire, as well to reuenge these iniuries done to his Countrey men, as also to recover the Kingdome of England, conquered by his father: hee passed ouer thither with an Armie, and put all to fire and sword; whereupon Etheldred dyed with sorrow.

And although his sonne, surnamed Ironside after diuers conflicts, and a combat fought hand to hand with Canutus, possessed the one half of England by composition: yet within a yeare, Canutus enioyed the whole by the sodaine death of Edmund, slaine vpon a priuy as he was eating himselfe; and so he remayned absolute King thereof as long as hee did liue, which was about some twentie yeares after.

Herein neuertheless it is to be noted, how the mercie of Almighty God concurred with his Iustice, and moderated the rigour thereof; for that (of his infinite bounty) he determined by this conquest, as it seemed, rather to chastise, correct and redresse England, then to ruine and oppress it. And therefore, after he had somewhat satisfied the seueritie of his iustice, not onely vpon the Realme, by the five yeares cruell reigne of Sveno (who ransacked and spoyled all sorts of men, as well Ecclesiasticall as Temporall) but also vpon the persons of Etheldred, and his sonne Edmund: hee gaue them Canutus, sonne to Sveno, for their King, who, although he was a stranger, yet gouerned with all clemencie and good example of life, doing continually actes of pietie, making good Lawes and wholesome, easing the people of taxes and impositions, and deservuing well of all estates, by the meanes whereof England flourished (in his time) in peace and much plentie. Of whom I can not forbear (this occasion beeing offered) to expresse and declare here (by the way) a notable acte, which I with all Princes would well weigh and consider, in the height of their prosperity and greatest fortune.

It chanced once, as he was walking at Southampton, by the Sea side, some of his noble men flattered him, and extolled (aboue measure) his great power, calling him the most mightie and potent King of all Kings, commanding absolutely ouer men, land & sea. Whereupon, to correct their flatterie, and to shew mans infirmitie, he went to the very Sea side, and sitting downe, said to the waues (as the tide was coming in,) I command yee, that you touch not my feete. And beeing presently after well washed with a waue that came in vpon him; hee arose, and turning himselfe to his noblemen, said vnto them

Howells Hist. Angl. li. 6.

Loe my Lords, you call me King of Kings, and Lord of Land and Sea, though I cannot command one of these little waues: Therefore know yee, that the King of Kings, and hee that commaundeth Land and Sea, is the Father of our Lord Iesus Christ, by whose will and providence all things were governed. And hauing thus saide, hee returned to Winchester, and tooke the Crowne which he vsed to weare vpon his head, and put it (with his owne hands) vpon an Image of CHRIST crucified, which was in the Church of Saint Peter and Saint Paule, and would neuer after weare any crowne so long as he liued.

Though this may seeme a digression from my matter, yet I thought good to recount it heere, as well for the raritie of the example; as also that it may appeare, how mercifully God dealt with the people of England, to giue them such a King, by whose pietie their Conquest turned to comfort. And this his merite appeared much more afterward, when it pleased his diuine Maiestie so sweetly to dispose, that after the death of Canutus, and his two Sonnes Haraldus and Hardicanutus, or (as Polydore calles him) Cunnuus, which two reigned but five yeeres: the Crowne returned agayne to English blood; yea, and to so excellent a Prince, as was King Edward the Confessor, who reigned in all tranquillity, peace and felicitie about three and twenty yeeres.

Now, although learning, religion, and vertue had flourished many yeeres among the English, yet a little before the coming of the Normans, the same was vtterly destroyed and decayed. For (sayth William of Malmesbury, who liued in the same age) the Priests were so vnlerned, that they could scant pronounce truly, the very words of the Sacraments and diuine service. And such was the ignorance generally of all men, that a Grammarian was held for a wonder; Religious men were wholly giuen to delicacie and kept no rules of Religion; the Noblemen and Gentlemen gaue themselves to gluttony and lasciuiousnesse; there was no respect of Religion, nor care of Iustice: in somuch that the common people serued for no other then as a prey to the Nobility, who spoiled and rancked them at their pleasure. It was a common custome when men had got their maid-seruants with childe, ey-ther to send them to the Stewes, or to sell them for Slaues. Drunkennesse, and all the vices which commonly doe accompany the same, or follow thereon, were generally throughout the whole Realme; This reporteth William of Malmesbury in substance.

Also holy King Edward himselfe, declaring a Vision which happened to him, sayd, That the Magistrates, as well spiritual as temporal, were no better then ministers of the diuill; that God was euery where dishonoured, Lawes contemned, truth trodden vnder foote, piety and mercy banished, cruelty helde for a pastime and entertainment. And therefore (sayd he) the wickednesse of the English is now compleate and growne to the height, and the reuenge and punishment thereof is shortly to follow.

This was proued true by the euent, which in a yeare after, when William Duke of Normandie, called the Conquerour, came into England, whom God made the instrument and minister of his Iustice, to chastise them. For, beeing admitted and crowned King (presently after the bloody battell, wherein King Haralde and twentie thousand men were slaine) hee beganne to tyrannize vpon all estates: hee spoiled the Nobilitie of their lands, goods, dignities and offices, to giue the same to the Normans. He oppressed the people with infinite and intollerable taxes and impositions; hee deprivd Citties, Bishopricks and Monasteries of their immunities and priuileges, forcing them to redeeme them of him againe for great summes of money. Hee tooke from Churches and Religious houses, not onely such money as they had in store, but also the holy vessells, dedicated to Gods seruice. He abolished the olde Lawes, and ordained new, causing them to be written in the Norman tongue, which the English vnderstood not: wherevpon there grew great confusion in the exercise thereof in all forties of Actions and Pleas, as well criminall as ciuile, and many men wrongfully lost their lands, and goodes, and many their liues, and a gate was (at that time) opened to all iniustice.

Furthermore, he was not content onlie to spoyle the English of their wealth, but also deprivd them of their pleasures, taking from very many Noble men and Gentlemen, their Parkes and Chales for his owne vse; but also ouerthrowing houses, Churches, Villages and whole Parishes, to make Forrests. In somuch, that (as Polydore Virgil reporteth) to make the Chale, which now is called New Forrest, hee dispeopled and made desert all the Countrey betwixt Salisbury and the Sea side, for thirtie miles space. And when diuys of his Nobilitie (by reason of his tyrannie) rebelled against him; hee tooke occasion therevpon, to vse all kinde of seueritie and cruelty, not onely vpon their persons, when they fell into his hands; but also vpon whole Countreies and Provinces, which hee so spoiled and rancked, that they lay waste for some yeeres after. Finally, his gouernement, during the time of his reigne, seemed to ayme at nothing else, but to extirpate and extinguish the race and name of the English.

Whereto if we adde the frequent wars in England in his time, partly by rebellion of his Subiects, and partly by inuasion of Strangers; wee shall finde, that England had not one yeare, no, not one day of ease and repose, during the one and twentie yeeres of his reigne. Which calamitie also continued, or rather increased for thirteene yeeres after his death, by the succession of his sonne William Rufus, who farre exceeded his father in cruelty, avarice, oppression of his Subiects, and contempt of God and man: by reason whereof, hee was so hated of the people, that when his death was knowne (which was to sodaine, and exemplary, for he was killed by chance with an Arrow, as he was hunting) the people were so transported with ioy, that they went euery where to the Churches, to giue God thanks therefore, as for the happiest newes that euer came to England, in hope, that the last day of his life, would be the first of their libertie. If therefore we consider all this, we shall evidently see, how true the prophecy of holy King Edward proued, when he said; That England should be giuen (for a time) into the hands of euill and wicked spirits, for the sins of the Nobilitie, Cleargie and People.

Heere then I conclude, that whereas the first Conquest seemes to haue proceeded, of the sins as well of the People, as of the Princes; and the second, of the offences, rather of the Princes, then of the People; the last was (as good King Edward testified) in punishment of the peoples sins, rather then of the Princes. Whereby we may see the sympathy in the body politike, no lesse then in the natural body, betwixt the head and the members in the participation for sinne, or reward for vertue. Which may serue for a motive to all Princes and Magistrates, to haue especiall care, to auoyde the offence of God, not onely by their owne liues; but also by punishing and reforming their Subiects; lest negligence in tyther may draw GODS wrath vpon both, to the destruction of the whole Common-wealth.

CHAP. XX.

The Battell of GAZA, fought betwene Synanbasha, Generall for Selym the great Turke; and Gaxelles, Lieutenant of Tomumbeys, the Soldane, or Sultane of Egypt. 1516.

After the death of Campion, Selym intending to inuade Egypt, sent before (from Damascus) his Generall Synanbasha into Iudea, with fiftene thousand horse, and a very strong power of Harquebusers, selected out of the Iannizaries and Asappes; only to suruey that Region, and to open a passage way to Gaza, which indeed was very molestuous & troublesome, in regard of the potent Arabes. The city is seated on the sea-coast, and in the confines of Egypt, neighboring vpon the hote sandy deserts; a very hard and painefull passage, for such as iourney to the remotest Egypt, and to the City of Cayro. The people of Gaza, being destitute of warlike garriisons of souldiers, to stand them in extremitie of armes, entertained Synanbasha at the very first view, although in craftie and dissembling manner, giuing him many thankfull gratulations, for vouchsafing to free them from the Mamelukes intollerable flauerie; in requittall of which benefite, they promised to continue loyall and seruiceable to Selym and his successors for euer.

Now, while Synanbasha lay encamped, within an Arrow reach from the City, in expectation of Selyms coming, and practising his best meanes of vnderstanding the course of the Region and Countrey, that should allow them passage into

A time (in the dead of night) being concluded on, betweene themselves and the Citizens, the Mamlukes should make a sodaine inuasion on the sleeping Turkes, and they likewise (at the same instant) would ysue forth of the City, and ioyning with them, make vnauoidable spoile & hauock of the enemies Campe.

ment to Synanbasba,

This aduise is allowed and embraced, betweene Tommubeyo and the Mamlukes, and Gazelles sent with six thousand horse or Mamlukes, and a strong Armie of the Arabes. Scarcely was hee departed from Cayro, but (by certaine Syrian Spies) Synanbasba had aduertisement thereof, and that (not staying for any carriages) they would be there within two dayes. Now, as these newes preferred the Turkish Army; so was it of no meane moment, for compassing the intire victory of the whol warres. And although Synanbasba had no intelligence at all of the Gazans falsehood, yet (being a man of great wisdom and prouidence) suspecting what Treacheries might circumtent him, and fearing least hee might meddle with two enemies at once: resolved to meet the Mamlukes by the way, and so try the fortune of fight. So, dislodging after the second watch, he silently marched away out of the Cities fight, reaching fiftene miles on the way towards Cayro; arriuing neere to a small village, which had the benefit of a plentiful Spring there arising, and therefore was the reason of Trauellers vsual lodging there.

It fortuneth, that Synanbasba purposed to stay in that Village, and Gazelles had the like intention of breathing there some few houres, to refresh both his men and horses, that he might the sooner galloppe to Gaza in the night time: when, eueral one instant (as it were) both the Generals receiued intelligence (on either side) by their vane-couriers, that if mighty dust was raised, and the enemy neere approached. Gazelles became much perplexed in mind at this strange and vlook for accident; perceiuing apparantly, that fayling of his purposed intent, hee was also vnable to match the enemy, if he should encounter with him, because his horses were halfe spent and weary. Yet had he no display in courage, although he was compelled (vpon such a sodaine) to deuise what instantly might be done, for general safety of the Army. Whereupon, he aduised euerie man to make ready his Weapon; and to consider, that what could not be performed by stealth and ambush, according to a precedent intention, required now courageous resolution, and must be dispatched by manly valour.

On the other side, Synanbasba hauing his men sooner set in order, then Gazelles could doe, hauing formerly aduertised them, what was to be done on the flightes encounter; cheered all the ranks with honourable speeches. And the issue of his Oration, was, That fight must vterly be forgot, because all places round about the would be shut vp, and iniurious to them, except they were victors. Moreover, of one thing to perswade themselves especially, that no man should perish that day, but he whom heaven had destinated vnto death, by the most certaine lawes of Fate; and that with equall perill, the Valiant should finde safety in midst of the enemies swords, and also the fearfull, death in their very safest flight, through the power of inescutible lot.

The Harquebusers were in the wings, & were extended forth in length with a single array, and no man standing nere to another, for handling their Harquebusses the more freely, and to compass the enemy: but the Pikes were placed in the very midst, to sustaine the impression of the Mamlukes. But Gazelles approaching, sent the Arabian troopes before, to disturbe the Wings; and he himself (with a square battaile) charged the middle regiment of the Turkes. The fight was very cruel, and

CHAP. XXI.

Of three severall Battails, fought in the years 1516. and 1517. betweene Selym the Great Turke, and Tommubeyo, the great Sultan of Egypt.

Selym hauing receiued intelligence, that Synanbasba
had surprized Gaza; ouer-throwne Gazelles, and had receiued a fresh supplie of men by Sea, from Constantinople, for his owne further seruice he marched with all his Army towards Gaza, and (within eighth dayes more) recovered so farre as Cayro*, reputed to be the Sultanes cheefe seat, Synanbasba still marching a daies iour-ney before him.

About the distance of fixe miles from the City, there was a final village, named Rhodania, whereto Tommubeyo (the newe made Sultane) had conueyed all his pro-uision and furniture of great Ordnance, hauing made also ditches, crosse thwarting the plaine fieldes, and high wayes:
which ditches were couered ouer with light earth, and small stickes, artificially shadowing them. But himselfe, with his Mamlukes (who were about twelue thousand) and a great number of Arabian horsemen, fitted for the intent, kept in a place better becoming: that when the Turkes Army should drawe neere, they might be there entrapt and beaten downe by the vndiscoverable Ordnance, ere they could come to reach the Egyptians with their Harquebusses; and then this stratagem hauing round engirt them, hee had the aduantage of immediate fight, they being vterly disioynted, and faine into the snare prepared for them.

So cunningly and prouidently were these matters ordered, and perfected with such answerable opportunity, that not a man in the Army could imagine, or vrge any doubt of the dayes victory. And questionlesse, no meane disaster had mette

as (had not the worthy paines of the Mamlukes, bin treacherously disappointed) onely through the meanes of a few perfidious Varlets, plainly had appeared.

Four treacherous Mamlukes defeated Tomumbeys hopes for the ambush.

As in all Armies there neuer wantes Villaines, so in the Sultanes were foure Mamlukes, borne Albanos, who stiffly stomacked, that Tomumbeo (by suffrages of the contrary faction) was advanced to the dignity royall. And they, either impelled by lewd disposition, or adducted by hope of rewarde, and more bountifull respect, foreseeing their owne side to fall on wracke, and wisdom aduising, to seeke for new and more assured Friends: fled to Synanbasba, as to their chiefe Turkish Capitaine and Countiman. By these hoisemen Synanbasba, and (soon after) Selym, vnderstood all the counsels & intents of the enemy, and what an Ambuscado Tomumbeo had prepared for them, with singular subtilty and dexterious Art, vnaioyable from falling into, except they forsooke the high and direct way. Whereupon, being guided by these Fugitives, they fetched a great compasse about on the left hand, and (before breake of day) recovered their old wonted way, having their battels ranged, their Ordnance ready mounted, to auoide the least delay of fight, and so shewed themselves at the enemies reeward, and neuer coming neere the front of their Campe.

Prevention of perill is no meane helpe in accidents of Armes.

When Tomumbeo saw this, he coniectured by his enemies march, that (by his owne mens treason) his provided ambush was discovered. And albeit his mind was afflicted with matchlesse greefe, to see so painfull an employment of his men, and so full of expectation, to be in a moment utterly defeated: yet notwithstanding, he being a man of vnconquerable courage, called all his senses and valour to sodaine counsell, and summoning his Captaines about him, gaue present order for those things which were to be done. And now was Tomumbeo in so narrow a strait and necessity, that all thinges, and at one instant, must receiue order from him. Hee was to giue the signall to his Soldiers, for mounting on horse-backe, vsing their weapons, turning the course of his campe, ranging his battailes, encouraging his men, and conueying his Ordnance to contrary quarters, as the occasion required. All which things, as one Capitaine could not

A disbreffe that would trouble the braine of the best soldier in the world.

performe alone, but very hardly and confusedly; so must they needs be effected as rawly, percuttly, and to haltes, by manie indiscreet vnderakers.

But that which most hindered speedie performance, was the huddling of men together, for removing the Ordnance from place to place, they being ill-faured huge peeces, made of Iron, and sette in great stockes of Wood, with Iron ringes, after the rude and nauall forme of Workmanship, vsed in elder times: and so, by reason of their excessive waight, could not be carried from their places, but by the draught of many beastes; besides, great heauing with iron Crowes and Leauers, requiring greuous labour of men. And the other great Field-peeces, mounted on carriages with wheeles, being drawne by the witlesse and hasty multitude, with great clamor of such as haled and shoued them through all parts of the Campe: the tumultuous passage of them, disordered men mounted on their horses, and the Souldiers repairing to their ensignes: yet two maine helps equalled these hindering difficulties; namely, the chearefulness of the soldiers, and the singular constancy of them all, almost beyond the compasse of mans beleefe: because they had not conceiued so much as a thought of feare, nor failed in their hopefull hearts, as it commonly happeneth in sodaine aduerser chances, whereby old tryed soldiers do manie times forget their ancient valour. For, being twice before vanquished in battel, yet they resumed the greater confidence and courage: perswading themselves, that not valour or skill in fight, but onely fortune fayled them.

Nowe, when Tomumbeo had set his men in good order, and the soldiers (with earnest desire of fight) requested the signall: he commanded the multitude of the Arabians, to bring their winges about on the reere of the enemy, and to beginne the fight first, that the Turkish hoisemen might be troubled and disordered with a doubtfull danger of fight, before himselfe would issue forth with his selected troops. Strait way he commanded the great Ordnance (which by this time was brought about, and directed against the enemies) to bee shot off. And immediately the Turkes did the like; who had once discharged their smaller and greater peeces, when they

they were a iust distance off, and quickly re-charging them, had brought the within an Arrowes shoote of the Egyptians Ordnance, fighting a long time on either side, onely with discharging their Ordnance, while the Armies approached neerer. In which contention, almost all the Egyptians Gunners were slain, and most of their Artillery dismounted from their wheeles, being broken in peeces by violence of the enemies bullets.

The Egyptian Gunners for their great Ordnance almost all slain.

The Turke had very skillfull Gunners in his Campe, whom he had allured (by his great rewardes, and rich entertainment) out of Italy and Germany, and especially many out of the Iewes rable, who being expelled by the piety of King Ferdinand out of the Spaines, brought afterwards such rare and vnsued deadly Artes into all the East, to spice our men withall. The Capitaine or cheefe man of all these Gunners, was one James, borne at Reggio in Lombardie, a man of extraordinary skill in those Artes, who being enticed by Turkish giutes: had (a little before) forsaken the seruice of Christ, and reuolted vnto *Mahomet*s superstition. The fight being brought (on both sides) to handy strokes, the Mamlukes raised a cruel and horrible cry, and in three quarters, charged the Turkes with great valour: For Selym (keeping his old order) so marched, that hee approached in the forme of a Crescent. The Capitaine of the Asians in the right Wing, was Mustapha, and Innubasba of the Europeans in the left: but himselfe gouerned the middle battell, wherin was the Squadron of the Janizaries, with a great multitude of Ordnance.

Synanbasba General of the field, and Innubasba of one.

But Synanbasba being made General of the field, had chosen for himselfe a band of the valiantest men, taken and pickt out of all the companies, to serue for all vncertaine euents of the battaile. Whereto hee added (out of *Selym*s Squadron) five hundred foote of extraordinary valor and swiftnesse, that hee being ready in all places of the battaile, and for all chaunces (were they neuer so sodaine) might succour that part of his fellowes, which was most pressed by the enemy. So that almost at one time, when Tomumbeo had stood in the middle battaile against Selym, and the wings of the Mamlukes, had encountered the Turkish with equall Front, and the Arabians had fought valiantly at their backs, as they had beene commanded; foure fights were very furiously and hotly attached at one time, and in diuers distinct places.

They that were present at this battell, do report; that thorough the cries of the Soldiers, the noise of Drums and Trumpets, the thundering of the Artillery, the clouds of dust, and clashing of Weapons, all mens minds were so amazed and confounded, that they being al on both sides alike blinded with furie, rushed on with such desperate madnesse, that neyther could the voices and watch wordes bee heard or knowne one from another, nor the Ensignes scene, nor commandes of Captaines be regarded; but even (by mutual error) they flew a great number both of their owne fellowes, and also of their enemies, without any respect at all. For neuer before that day, had any armies encountered together, enflamed with greater spleene and hatred; nor euer had two such mighty Emperors, more constantly and feruently declared their valour both of body and minde; nor with lesse care of life and safety: For, when both of them plainly perceiued, that with like danger of themselves and their Armies, they had set their liues and Empires vpon present ruine: they also well vnderstoode, that there would be no other hope left to eyther of them, but that which victory it selfe should bring with it.

Now Gazelles enflamed with desire of honor and reuenge, to returne the Europeans a foile equal to that which liee had receiued at Gaza, charging Innubasba with great violence, had ouer-run the foremost and resisting troopes yad bestrid downe the Gazelles: and the Arabes pursuing on hard at his heeles, had made the vanquishing companies (euen those of the Thracians, Thessalians, and Macedons) to turne their backs, which neuer any enemy had done before.

Then Synanbasba, being ready for all occasions of victory, flew vpon the side of the enemy, with a fresh and powerfull company of his men, re-enforcing the battell, which was much declined & foully scattered. But anon after, Synanbasba, who had discontinued the manifest victory of the enemy, by exercising a supreme acte of prowesse, was slaine, fighting verie valiantly before his men, after that the Mamlukes (vnder their fierce Captayne Bido) had turned themselves proudly on their new enemy. And his horsemen striving to take vp their dead captaines body from the ground, were (a great number of them) slaine and put to flight by Cazelles, who had spread abroad his troupes, that hauing the more spacious roome, they might the more freely vie their swords, in which kinde of fight the Mamlukes doe most excell. And also that noble band of Ianizaries, being enclosed, were ouer-runne & slaine; after that they (being forsaken of the horsemen) had long time resifted very valiantly.

Heyllus Diadarius and Giapall Orcomas, two famous Captaines of the Egyptians.

In another quarter, Mustapha giuing a vehement charge with all his horse, vpon the left wing of the Egyptians (wherin commanded the most renowned captaine Hyllus Diadarius and Giapall Orcomas) very sharply vrged them. A little before they had receiued a notable detriment, by the Ordinance, which (by chaunce) was shot fro Selyms middle battell thwart the field; which Mustapha perceiuing, and being desirous to trample on olde ignominy, they being once disordered, constrained them fiercely, & bringing in his troups freshly vpon them, brake thorow, ouer-ran and beat them downe. And being remarkable all the battell ouer, both by his Armes and voyce: adhorted the Asians to consider, that their ancient martiall honor, they lately lost at the battell of Alepo, must be recovered now by height of manhood, or (at vntermost) by an honourable death.

The vndurable spirit of Tomumbeo in the crack through.

At the same time also, Tomumbeo, hauing broken through the middle regiment of horse, was come to the foot, and being a mighty man both in body and strength, performed infinite actions of worth with his Cemitarie: the Arabians likewise enclosed the outer-wings of the Turkes, forcing them (in many places) to fight with double front. And Selym aduanced forward his foote-squadron, which was his onely and assured helpe in this extremitie, whose charge, neither the fierce barded horse, nor the victors men could abide: because most part of his Souldiers being harquebusiers, and being impaled with pikes, did much mischief, for their invincible force, being closed into the array of one body, bare downe all that they encountered. Yet they fought with variable euēt on both sides, from the fourth houre of the day, till Sun-set, neither was there any part of eyther Arme, but suffered sundry alterations, Fortune being some while prosperous, and then againe aduerser. For, both the vanquished and victors, being maddened with mutual & implacable rage, fought with obstinate & indurate hearts; the Mamlukes disdainig, that victorie should be taken from them, by men (of whom) they had slaine so many: and the Turkes chafing, that they whom they had before foiled in two feuerall battells, should make so long resistance against them. In-fomuch, that their bodies, wearied and tired with wounds, and their armes faintly languishing, yet supported onely by furie & pertinacy of heart, seemed able to haue maintained another daies murdering, but that dark shut vp the violence of so great a slaughter.

Tomumbeo, who (no doubt) was vanquished, distrusting the entire losse of the field, first commanded retreat to be founded, that his men, who now could not match the other Squadron, might seeme not to haue bin beaten backe, but onely to be led backe: which he conceived to be of no meane moment, both for the establishing of his souldiers, & maintenance of his owne authority. As one that being deceived in his first hope, might promise himselfe (as men in misery commonly do) more prosperous successe afterward, provided, that he fainted not in corage. Whereupon, preserving those few powers left him, he intended a fresh reparation of warre. The battell being broken off by the nights counter-mad, the Turks being victors, won the enemies tents and Ordinance, pursued the Mamlukes still very late in the night, albeit (almost in manner of flight) they marched towards Cayro.

In the flight were taken Diadarius, who could make no speed, by reason of his grievous wounds, and with him Bido, hauing one of his knees broke with a falcon-shot, which also slue his horse. But the next day, Selym caused them both to be slain, either in regard they could not be healed, or as thinking them to be acceptable sacrifices for appeasing Synanbasia, for whose losse hee greatly lamented. Now albeit the Turkes had nobly vanquished, yet was their strength mightily empayred, and by the meanes of these fortunate battells, wherein the 4. part of them was spent with sicknesse sicknesse and wounds, and a great number of their Horses utterly soyled, especially through the tediousnesse of this daies seruice.

These were maine motiues, to hinder Selym in his wonted course of expedition, because (as yet) he was ignorant, what deuotion the Egyptian inhabitants of Cayro bare towards him; neither did rumour afford him any intelligence, where Tomumbeo had bestowed himselfe, or what hee further intended. For, till he had deliberately considered on all these occasions, he would not adventure the safety of his owne person, and perill of his whole Arme, to the mercy of innumerable Citizens, and in the greatest Cittie of the world. Wherefore, abiding foure dayes space in his old Campe at Rhodania, causing the wounded to be cured, and his slaine souldiours to be buried: but the bodies of his enemies, he left to be deuoured by Birds and Beasts. And then dislodging thence, and marching towards Cayro; he encamped on a plain, between old Cayro and Bulach: for the City of Cayro is diuided into three Townes; old Cayro, new Cayro, and Bulach, for their more commodious seruice of water.

CHAP. XXII.

Of the second Battell at Cayro, betweene Selym and Tomumbeo.

The valiant courage of Tomumbeo, vnder the withstanding alibi: greuous mistresses & losses.

Tomumbeo, being all this while nothing bruised, notwithstanding so many lamentable losses and disasters; still assembled together the Mamlukes from all parts, and pitched his Campe in a most commodious place, betweene new Cayro and the riuer Nilus, wherein he had eight thousand Ethyopian slaues or bondmen, which kinde of men he had not (till then) made any vse of, in regard of an ancient Rebellion by them committed. Beside, setting open the old Armory, he gaue armor and weapons to the Mamlukes sonnes, and to Moores which were their retainers, as also to the Iewes and Arabians, preparing for farre sharper warre against the Turks, than formerly had bene. But afterward, hauing intended a sodaine camifado vpon the Turkish Campe, and the same againe vnluckily discovered to the Turkes (who being readily prepared for it, repelled (though with some losse) his formost ranks; he by the aduice of all his Captaines, entred the City of Cayro.

The motiue hereto was, because the Mamlukes (hauing bene soyled in all precedent battailes) considered with themselves, that they must now make warre after some other manner of way: & in that regard, aduised him to fortifie the Cittie, placing strong Courts of guard in the most conuenient parts thereof, to hinder euery way their enemies entrance. And being in this lamentable condition, that they must needs fighte for their houses, wiues, and children; they helde it highly honourable, and answerable to the glorie of their ancient valour, to dye fighting in their sight, and euen before their owne doores.

Hereupon, each Mamluke going to his own house, furnished all his household, and the very toppe of his house with all kinde of weapons: instantly also entreating the Egyptians in each ward & streete to take Armes against the common cruell enemy, not suffering themselves to be slaine, and their wiues and children carried away as slaues. For (quoth they) if the sauage and insatiate enemy do winne the victory, as accidents of warre are alwayes doubtfull, no spare will be made, no not of such as beare themselves but indifferently, leaning in help to neither side, because victory swelkes with such insolent licence, as he respects not any man. But such as (without doubtful staggering) run desperately to assist his fortune, when war stands vpon vncertaine firecesse.

Most of the Egyptians that were rich and wealthy, as they did well foresee, that alteration in the State and Empire would be very hurtfull, and bring great losse and hinderance to their wealth and Traffike: so, in deuotion and helpe, they were not failing to the Mamlukes. As on the contrary, most of the poorer Citizens, and no meane multitude of the worser sort (who, being void of danger, do euermore gaine by others losses) remembring all the villanies and extreme oppressions, which they had had suffered (for the space almost of three hundred yeares) vnder the Mamelukes, in very wofull and wretched slauery, they kept themselves within doores, awayting for the fights successe: iocondly hoping, that the time was now come, for punishing their proud oppressors, and that reuenge would be sought by the blood of strangers; the issue sorting so, that they eyes should be satisfied, with a pleasing & long expected spectacle.

Tomumbeo fortified the gates & waies belonging to the City.

In the meane time, Tomumbeo with most indulgent care and labour, fortified the gates, and all the waies of the Cities entrance, appointing Captaines for euery street. In euery market place, Court, and assembly of people, he made very witty and perswasive Orations, permitting no idle loytering in the workes: and finally (which is saide to be the hardest matter in distresse and danger) he carried an vnappalled countenance, deliuering signes of extraordinary hope and valour no way to be daunted. But the Mamelukes, ouer and aboue necessity (which in extremities makes men mad and desperate; yea, kindleth courage in errant Cowards) being stirred vp by emulation: did speedily and courageously execute the duties and offices of worthy Captaines; for euerie one of them, as his wit and inuention best instructed him, made trenches, thwart the most passable streetes, laying also great Logges of Timber crosse vpon them. Others, made priuy pits and holes, with sharpe-pointed stakes surely fastened in them, whereon the enemies vnwarly falling, might gore and split themselves. Others likewise fitted the houses and Windows of euery turning streete, with such plenty of shot as their store and ability afforded; and all these things were performed with such expedition, as no man (not the very Mamelukes) made it nice, or strained courtesie, to take the pickaxe & spade, or to do any seruile seruicable Worke: whereby it appeared, that nothing could be thought deified, but it was as expeditiously effected.

The great City of Cayro was not enclosed with walls.

Now, although the City (being verie great and old) had no wals to enclose it; yet there were Gates, and but certayne wayes for entering into it, one whereof was a direct and very broad street, leading from the East gate to the Castle, and into the midst of the City. The rest of the wayes wer but very narrow streets or passages, somewhat vnslightly and disgracefull, where no Ordinance could be drawn, nor an aranged battell meete with his opposite. Into this maine way or streete had Tomumbeo especially brought a power, because he well perceiued, that their enemy would couer entrance, in regarde of the spacious admittance. But the other quarters of the City further off, hee kept with small guards: yet the inner & middle part, where the Cattle stood, was guarded with a sufficient power, for the better supply of all other places, where the enemies cry, or their owne fellowes perill might call their assistance. For the Citie, being the greatest of all other, with so final a power, could not be defended round about, namely, wayes lying open into it in euery place.

One maine streete in the City, at the rest but slender passage.

When Selym had received certaine intelligence, that Tomumbeo was entred Cayro, and all the Mamelukes (gathering their strength into one maine head) would try the utmost fortune of warre: hee marched with his Army neerer to the Citie. All the way he encouraged his troopes, to consider with themselves aduisely, that now they must intend an entire conquest of those Enemies, whom they had already so often vanquished; and to take a little the more paines, that their victorious rewards, might be answerable vnto their braue endeuour, for which they had formerly coueted with immoderate desires. So pausing a while, and commanding a Trumpet to summon general silence, thus againe he proceeded.

Selym and his army marched on toward the great City.

A brieue Oration of Selym, to his Souldiers.

Friends, and Fellowes in Armes, let mee intreat you to remember, that there remaineth now but a few wretched men, with a forsaken naked King, who, being lately spent with wounds and feare, were not able to endure the field, but flying thence cowardly, haue verily determined, to expect at home (in the sight of their wiues and children) the supreme and last cast of a miserable life.

Moreover the Egyptians (of their owne accord) haue sent for me; for they deadely hating the Mamelukes very name: doe with greedy desire expect their destruction, and promise to fight from their owne houses, vnto to destroy the race of those wicked savage men. Neuertheless, the absolute victory of the whole war, consisteth in utter vanquishing the remnants of the defeated, & thoroughly affrighted Army; because they cannot be accounted as overcome, that are yet hopefull in Armes, and possesse the seat of the Empire, even the greatest Citie thereof.

The souldiers sould were on fire with desire of spoile, and being all readily ranked, wanted but the signal for irruption. When Selym entring at Bassuel gate, sent in his horse troopes at many places at once: but the Ianizaries entred at the broader passage, where the horse (on eyther side) meeting together, a cruell & bloody fight began in the turning streets, and narrow lanes. The foot, haling out their Falcons and Culuerings before them in the front; flanked all the streetes with them as they went along, making them naked of anie defendants. But when they came to the munitions and trenches, labouring to remove the logges and beames, which were great hinderances vnto their passage: the Mamelukes gaue them very valiant resistance, and either side shewed such rare courage and valour: as neuer (in our memory) did men encounter more fiercely & bloodily. For both the Mamelukes and Turkes stoode on their highest tearmes of manhood, vsing all their cunning flights & policies of war, in this one deadly dangerous fight; neither part being ignorant, that this was the last hope of life and Empryre, Fortune equally and indifferently presenting them with honorable rewards for the Conqueror, and shamefull disgrace for the vanquished.

Mighty laughter was made at the munitions, by reason that the Turkes rashly running vpon the couered trenches, pits, and downfalls, were ouerthrowne on heaps one vpon another, the hindmost thrusting them on that were before; others, beeing gored & spitted on sharpe pointed stakes: vpon which advantage, the Mamelukes wiues and children (with man-like hardnesse) hurled and tumbled down tiles and great stones on them thus ouerthrowne and beneath, beating out the braines of verie many. On the contrary side, the Turkes with their Harquebusses, fetcht off such as they saw in the windowes, & on the houses, breaking open the doores where any harmful thing was throwne downe, and fighting in those houses with diuerse events. Also the Egyptians, beholding fortune now on the one side, and then againe turned to the other; assayed both sides alike as equall enemies, leaning where the lot of victory was likeliest to happen, that they might appear onely to haue assisted that part, and thought vnto enemy to the other.

A cunning crafty manner of fighting in the Egyptians.

Many encounters happened in diuers quarters at once, and according to theyr confused running in the streets, now this company, then that, lighting vpon fresh and new troopes of enemies: & they that constrained the victors in the Front, were often intercluded by the aduerser part, and beaten downe in the Rere. It was a wofull sight to beholde, the distances betwene house and house, ouer-flowing with reeking blood, which ranne out of the flaine mens bodies, as there they lay mangled & dismembred on heapes: that the Dust, which rose like a thicke mist or dark cloud before, was now laide therewith, and not to be seene at all. Norwithstanding, the ayre was meerey darkned with the smoake of the Ordinance and lesser Artillerie, as also clouds of Arrows shot from their bowes: and so great was the cry and clamour among the souldiers, the clattering of weapons, and thundering of the Cannons, that the very earth seemed to groan and tremble, and the houses were rent & torne in peeces. They fought continually two dayes and two nights, with doubtfull fortune, and slender appearance of advantage on either side: but only that the Mamelukes (being few in number, and not able to endure labour and watching) had retreated themselves by little and little, into the inner parts of the City, vnto for-faking the most munitions.

The extremity of a thicke rising dust layd by the blood of flaine mens bodies.

They fought two dayes and two nights continually.

The third day, when the Mamelukes were in the very pitch of perill of losing their whole estate, and all that they had, (which caue visually augmenteth supreme enterprizes) chearing vp the hearts and endenours of all men, they renewed the fight with such surpassing valor, that they droue the Turkes a great way backe, and intercepted certaine of their Faulcons. Which accident, made Selym to despair of victory, so that hee commanded to set the houses on fire in all places: iust wrath against the Egyptians, compelling him to that cruell proclamation, because (in his very sight, and but a little before) Innubasha was greivously wounded in the head, by a great stone thrown down from a window.

A sodain successe hapning to Mustapha, against the Mamelukes.

Now were the houses on a flaming fire, now was nothing heard but wayling and weeping of the suppliant entreating Egyptians: and now the Turkes fighting somewhat faintly, expected that retreat should be founded: when sodainly newes was brought by many men together, that in another quarter, the Mamelukes being beaten from their stand, and defeated by enforcing Mustapha, repoted theyr latest refuge in flight. For Mustapha thorough the intimation of certaine Egyptians, and fugitive Mamelukes, came to a very large streete, where the Mamelukes had placed their horses ready bridled and saddled; intending that if any ill hap befell the, their recourse might bee thither, where taking their horses, they might escape to places of further determination. He got al those horses, and led them away, having chased their guides within a part of the citie, nothing suspected, which was very weak, & defended by none but boyes and horsekeepers.

The Mamelukes vanquished and enforced to flight.

Which accident (as commonly it happeneth in serious and vnexpected chances) did wonderfully weaken their valour and resolution, wherefore when they wer thus defeated in their hope of flight, and they so roundly about, that the fight could be maintained by no other helpe or comfort, but only mere manhood: being as men vanquished by their own confession, they turned their backs. Many making hast to Xiilus with Tomumbeyo (who had in vaine tried all Art of valiance, wilddome, and policy, to avoide the foile in this battell) passing over the river by boats, went into the Region of Sciethica. Another multitude hid themselves in the Egyptians houses, and in most shamefull lurking denues. But about 1500. of the valiantest Mamelukes, fled vnto the greatest Temple of the City; where after they had long time defended themselves, as out of a castle, because they would not yeeld but vpon honorable termes: at length, being confounded with thirst, wearines, wounds and the Ordnance violently playing still vpon them, they submitted themselves to the will and pleasure of the Conquerour. Part of them were presently slaine before the Temple, by the angry fouldiers of Selym, he politickly winking thereat; & another part (some few dayes after) were carried downe the river to Alexandria.

The victory thus standing for Selym, he sent two bands to quench the fires, and proclamations were made thorough all parts of the City, that all the Mamelukes which would come in and yeelde themselves, and within the limitation of twelue houres space, should be secured from any further harme. But all such as were found after that time, should dye for their refusal, and large rewards were promised to all the Egyptians, that could disclose the lurking Mamelukes. Contrarywise, such as hid or concealed any of them, were presently to be spitted vpon stakes, & selling their wives and children as slaves, to burn their houses to the ground. Vpon the fame of this Proclamation, a great number of them came abroad, who were instantly put in yrons, & after w^d all most cruellly slaine in prison, because they were said to haue practised an escape. But diuers, who would not violate the rites of faith and friendshipp by betraying their friends, being accused by their neighbors, suffered losse of life, dying very constantly for their friends.

After this, the soldiers encreasing their fury, vpon the pride of this victory, searching all places; drew violently out all such as were hidden, and presently slew them, spoiling also the Egyptians houses where they were found, leaving no place shut or concealed from them. And the very same day it hapned, that Gazelles cam to Cayro, who had bene sent (a little before) into Thebus, to leuy Arabians, & to hire aides. But seeing the case to bee quite changed, and that he was able to do no good either by his person or aduice; hee came with three Arabian Captaines, and many horse with them, and yeelded himselfe to Selym, who entertained him and all his traine very honourably, euery man according to his degree and merit.

CHAP. XXII.

Of the third and last Battell fought at Nilus, betwene Tomumbeyo and Selym, with the ill successe and disgracefull death of Tomumbeyo, and hard fate of his Mamelukes.

Called also Penopolitana, of the five Cities, Beroas, Arbinos, Ptolemais, Apollonia, & Cyrene.

V.T. Tomumbeyo, being fled (as ye haue heard) ouer the River of Nilus, into that region which is called Sciethica, lying towards Cyrenica, although with so many disastrous mischances he had formerly bin vanquished, yet still hee made a couragious reparation of the war. For, there was come to him a potent supply of Mamelukes fro Alexandria, being sent for by letters out of the Cittie Garrisons, and many more also followed him in flight. Beside, the Arabians of Affrica repaired to him, and the Moors likewise which were inhabitants of that country, promising him their vttermost fauour and helpe. Nay more, diuers Egyptians of Cayro, whose houses and people had bin spoiled and dishonested, by the couetous and luxurious Turkes, gaue faith also, that they would raise a tumult and insurrection, if he would speedily come thither in the dead of night, whereby might be compassed, that such Turkes as were lodged in the City houses, might sodainly be destroyed by inuasion of all the people together. For the Citizens, hauing suffered by them all abhominable and enemy-like parts, could no longer endure the iniuries of such proude and malapart oppressors. Further they alledged, that the Turkes, being (before) a potent army, were now reduced to a contemptible number: for, a great part of them were slaine in the batells at Rhodania and Cayro, and well-neere all the rest were spent with woundes and sickness.

The coming of Albuchomar to Selym, discouering to him the intentions of Tomumbeyo.

While Tomumbeyo was thus busied about his needfull preparations, Albuchomar the very greatest man (for authority, lands, & riches) in all Sciethica, came to Selym: eyther to preuent the mischief of imminent warre, to the no meane peril of his coun-tre, or else to win the victors fauour by Treason: and acquainted him not onely with the new collected powers of Tomumbeyo, but also with the practises concluded among the Citizens of Cayro. Which when Selym vnderstood, he caused stricke and strong watch and ward, to bee planted in all parts of the City; commanding also, that the suspected Citizens should be kept in the Castle, which (vpon the Garrisons forsaking it) very easily hee surprized. Furthermore, in diuers places along the river of Nilus, he ordered a great number of vessels, well furnished with Ordnance and soldiers, to defend the further banke of the river.

Selyms provision to winne stand Tomumbeyo.

Neuertheless, considering aduisedly with himselfe, how perillously hee had often fought with most valiant enemies, and how difficult it would be for him to intercept Tomumbeyo, who (by flight) still into waste and vknownne Regions prolonged the Warre, still getting fresh and new supplies. Considering also, that his owne power was so small, and so far from succour, as it might easily bee oppressed in that mighty City, by huge multitudes of men of vncertaine Faith. Vpon these discrete considerations, hee desired rather to conclude the Warre by some honest composition, then by forcible further contending, to entangle himselfe in new dangers.

Selyms serious deliberation concerning his owne dangerous condition.

And so much the rather, because hee had intelligence by them of Sciethica, that fresh Companies of Horse were leuyed from all partes by the Mamelukes, which had fledde into diuers Regions: and the Naue likewise, which was sent into the streights of the Red Sea, in the Arabian Gulfe against the Portugals, stood now vpon the hopefull expectation at Porte Suezia.

Fresh companies of Horse leuyed by the Mamelukes.

In the Nauy were about three thousand Mamelukes, and Amyrasser, and Ray Salomon, all very expert Captaines: and a great number of brasse Peeces: whereby it appeared, that Tomumbeyo might gather ability, to repaire his former receiued injuries, and so returne againe to the Cittie, being sent for thither by his friends.

But the maine motive of all, was his care of the Persian affairs, lest Hunbracosfa (whom he had sent before to the mountaine Taurus) should not prooue able to match the Persian power, whereby hee should be excluded out of the lesser Asia and Syria, before the Fleet from Constantinople could come to Alexandria, with new supply of Victuals and soldiers. Hereupon, he sent very honorable men of the Clergy, and likewise certaine Egyptians of great estimation amongst them, as Ambassadors from him vnto Tomumbeyo. The effect of their Commission was briefly thus. To counsell him for a cessation from Armes, and now (at length) to acknowledge the Victors great fortune, engaging their faith to him, that if (in suppliant manner) he would come to Selym; by humanity and fauour of the Conqueror, he should quietly enjoy the kingdom, which he was not able to hold by power. But if hee would proceede and continue Warre, carelessly forgetting his owne weakness: then, when warres fortune was thorowly found and determined; according to his iust desert, he should expect no condition of dignity or life, at displeased Selyms hands. These Ambassadors being come into Scietica, were (with frantick and barbarous cruelty) all slaine by certaine Mamelukes, before they had any audience.

Which proud and cruell deede, brake off all further patience in Selym, who was a man by nature (though not otherwise moued) extraordinarily vehement and fierce. Immediately he proclaimed a voyage into Scietica against Tomumbeyo, commanding victuals and other prouision for it. Moreouer, he gathered Boats from all parts, causing a sure and a very broad bridge to be built ouer Nilus riuer: as allowing it neyther answerable vnto his dignity, nor fitting with the vrgent occasion, to make his passage ouer with Boats.

When Tomumbeyo had intelligence by his Spies, as also from the Citizens of Cayro, that such an intention was prepared against him, and so strong a Bridge made ouer Nilus; hee (doubting the vnfaihsfullnesse of the Prouincialls, whose hearts he feared to be reuolted from him, by the treacherous departure of Albuchemar) determined to try the selfe-same fortune of battell, which had so oftentimes deceived his hopes. For, he being inferior in all things, could not now lengthen out the war, nor make expectation of his enemy: neither did he hold it good for him, to fly againe with losse of his dignity, and thorough farther wildernes of hazardous aduenture, and dangerous successe.

Wherefore, consulting with his Captaines & Commanders, concerning this last attempt, which he and his Mamelukes were to make; by breake of day he departed fro Scietica, accompanied with 4000. horse, and twice so many Moores and Arabes foot, continuing trauel night & day till they came to Nilus, that (by a bolde and sodain aduenture) he might deceyue the Turkes, who (as he vnderstood) suspected no such forwardnes, in weake, vanquished, & more then halfe dismayed men, whereas celerity would forstall any fame of his vnluck for comming; so to destroy y^e part of the Turkish power, which first had aduentured ouer the riuer, before they could receive succour by their following Fellowes. Nor did the space of time beguile his opinion, because the hours (being truly accounted) made iust agreement with his speedy march thither; and euen as hee formerly coniectured so fel it out, that the vaw-ward of the Asians had alreadye past the Riuer. But the Muleters and boyes of Selyms Camp, seeking for the pleasantest places for pitching their Tents, ranging ouer farre, were the first that descried the dust of the approaching enemy: whereof Mustapha being certified, the allarum was presently giuen.

This rumour so danted all hearts with feare, both of them that had alreadye passed the riuer, and theirs also which stood ready to follow after them: that Tomumbeyo charging the Asians with incomparable valour, while they were making themselves ready, and resorting vnto their Ensignes, slew them in the Front, that durst endure the shooke of the assailants) dispersed the rest, and forced them to flight; and all the vanguard was wel-neere ouer-run, and trodden downe, beside the disorder of the rest: before Mustapha (albeit hee fought fearlesse in the van, & very cheerfully encouraged his souldiers) was able to retaine them that fledde, or to repayre the other in array. For, in this sodaine and vnexpected chance, euery place was full of the peoples confused hudlings together, slaughter, flight, and feare: and all along the riuer-banke both aboue and below the newe made Bridge, were diuers companies of men discerned, looking ru-fully behind them, and crying out to their fellowes for succour. Many also being enforced (by the vrging troope of the Enemy) to the very brinke of the banke, fell headlong downe into the riuer; and many also perished at the end or heade of the bridge, by reason they could not passe ouer it, being hindred by them that were continually sent from the further side; beside, many that would haue ascended the bridge, being impeached by fear, & thrust backe by their owne fellowes, were drowned in the riuer.

The bridge was so broad, that 4. horse in rank might well passe ouer together, & a great number sent ouer in an houres space. But because the Ordnance was to be drawne ouer, fewer horse were sent, then either the greatnesse of the danger, or sodainnesse of such a chance did vrgent ly require. Nor was there any helpe in the Ordnance, which could not speedily be drawne ouer, or shot off from the hither banke to the other against the Enemy, without great danger to themselves, by reason that their owne men stood in the way. In the meane time, Selym who ranne downe to the riuers side, at the beginning of this hurly burly, filled small boates with Janizaries Harquebussiers, & sent them ouer to succour their distressed fellowes; commading the horse also to make what hast they could ouer the bridge, the nimble Marriners vsing their best pains, in often passing and returning with fresh supplies; so that within a short space they had conueyed ouer many bands of Janizaries, whose comming confirmed the disordered Asians, and now boldly they endured the enemies violence.

Also Canoglus, son to a Tartar king, encouraging his roopes of Tartares to take the riuer with their horses; attained to the further bank of the riuer, to the admiration of all men, and losing but fewe of his men: for the Tartares hauing learned to swim ouer the violent and mightie Riuer of Tanis and Volga with their horses, were the more apt for passage here. At the same instant also, Tomumbeyo fore-seeing, that the speedy victory consisted therein, endeouored with his thickest troopes, to win the head of the bridge, that pulling away the foremost boats, and cutting in sunder the cables, which fastened the rest together, & to the banks: the whole bridge being so let loose at liberty, might be carried away with the streames violence, & all the Turkes that were vpon it. This caused a very dangerous conflict, for the chosen and best armed Mamelukes constraining the front, fought with singular valor. And on the other side, Mustapha perceiving the present perill, brought vp the colours, and all the valiantest of his foldiours, to make good that place: so that both sides contended with such surpassing manhood as the weightinesse of the case required. For, the Mamelukes saw manifestly, that if they could winne that place, they should (with very short worke) ouerthrow all the enemies former victories: and the Turkes as plainly perceived, that except they kept and preserved the bridge, the safety of themselves, the whole estate of the army, yea & the ruine of their Emperor, lay now at the stake, and all brought to vtter despair.

Hereupon, Mustapha so prevailed by his Harquebussiers, & troops of Greek horse, which in sundry companies had passed the bridge: that the enemies were repulsed & forced to retire a great way backe. Now Tomumbeyo that he might giue some respite to his Mamelukes to breathe themselves a while, being not able to fight fiercely, because their horse were spent and tired, & that after a fresh repainging of their strength he might aduenture the extreme & latest fortune of the battell, encouraged the Moores and Arabians to maintaine the fight, vntill the Mamelukes had breathed a little. Which when they had valiantly performed, and the Mamelukes (hauing somewhat comforted their own bodies & horses) making good their place, the battell was againe renewed with such rigour on their behalfe, that Selym (distrusting the victory) doubted not, to ascend the bridge, and runne to succour his men, although his friends earnestly labored him to the contrary.

His coming (which brought fresh hope into his Souldiers hearts, they conueting to win reward and praise, by doing some seruicable action in their Emperours fight) repressed all the enemies best endeavour, and were forced vnto flight, onely through the valiance of the Janizaries. Pursued were they ouer all the Fieldes, by those Horse which had bene at the fight, and likewise by the Tartares, who gaunted them very greuously with their Arrowes. But afterward, Mu-Hapha, Cayerbey, and Gazelles, were sent with a company of fresh and swift horse, to follow them that fled, and not to suffer Tomumbeyo to escape: who the third day after, was found by certaine Peazants, standing in a Marshy vpp to the waste in Water, among Bull-rushes and Reedes; and they (for feare of death) deliuered him to the Captaines, who brought him to Selym, who would not vouchsafe to see him.

After he had caused him to bee a long time in vaine tormented, to disclose the treasures of Campan; at last he gaue command, that he should be carried about all the famous streets of the City, riding on a vile Camels backe, and in poore ragged Garments, with his hands bound behind him; and then to bee hanged vp with an halter, for the murdering (as hee pretended) of his Ambassadors, although the Noble Prince was altogether guiltlesse thereof. The like fate also befell to all the Mamaluks that were in prison, or could be taken. After the shamefull death of Tomumbeyo, who was executed the thirteenth day of Aprill, Anno 1517. all the whole Empire of the Soldan yielded, and likewise all the Princes that had bene tributaries to the Soldan, euen vnto the dominions of Presire Iohn.

CHAP. XXIII.

Of the first inuention of wearing Ringes: to what end it was. And of many ancient and admirable things, tending vnto the same purpose.

Mong all other Jewels and Ornaments, inuened by the spirite and industry, or rather by the vanity of man, to embellish & beautify himselfe withall: there is not any comparable to that of Rings: bee it for riches, or curiosity in workmanship. For, ouer and beside that they are made in a round and circular figure, which is the most perfect of all other: they are beside so subiect and light, that they may be worne on the least finger of the hand. Neuerthelesse, they are alwayes made of the very richest metall of all, and accompanied with stones, the most precious and exquisite that are to be had, and valewed to bee the onely esteemed things in the world. Behold then, what meanes the ambition of men found out, to wear a ring vpon one finger, valewing in price the worth of a City: for, it is not vnknowne, there are some such precious stones, that are esteemed as a world of Gold, and yet notwithstanding, they hinder not the hand from the vse of any exercise whatsoever. And albeit that Rings haue serued, and yet do, to some other more necessary ends & effects, then those before related: yet the very principall point which brought them into vse, was to glad and delight the eye, and to deliuer an outward testimonie of Nobility, and shew the persons estimation. But because they are now grown very common, and yet much esteemed, I will set downe certaine ancient Histories, incident to our present purpose, not greatly irksome to reade or heare.

In the first place, it is not resolutely determined, who was the prime inuenter of Rings: and yet some do say, that the first Rings knowne to be worne, was in the remembrance of Prometheus, who (as the Poets faigned) being chained to a rocke by the appointment of Iupiter, was deliuered by Hercules, with the permission of Iupiter; with this condition neuerthelesse, that in perpetual memory of his imprisonment, the saide Prometheus stood obliged, to wear incessantly a ring of gold, enchaisted with a stone of the rocke whereto hee was prisoner; and thereby some hold, that the vse of rings tooke thence the first beginning. Pliny and many other authors reputed this discourse for a fable, as all Christians ought to do: and because it is a leasing, and frivolously feigned, I meane to insist thereon no further.

Concerning mine owne opinion, I am of the mind, that the inuention of Ringes came not by one man only, but from many, and in diuers times; considering, it neuer was any note of great cunning, to take the fingers bignesse by a thred, and with that measure to make a Ring of Golde or Iron: such as aunciently were worne by the very cheefest Lordes of Lacedemon and and Rome, before they gaue themselves ouer to the superfluities and dissolutions, which afterwards reigned in all things. And vndoubtedly, the custome and ceremonie continued long time amongst the Romaines, that the Ring of Honour, which the husband sent to his spouse on the marriage day, was made of yron. Plinie discoursing on the antiquitie of Rings, saith, That they were not in vse in the war time betwene the Greekes and Troians: considering that Homer (who wrote thereof very amply) maketh no mention at all of Rings, much lesse, that they sealed then with Rings. And yet notwithstanding, he speaketh sufficiently of Chains and Bracelets, which were at that time worne, and of the manner of closing and sealing Letters: so that if Rings had then bin in vse, Homer would neuer haue let it sleepe in silence.

But the good olde man Plinie, cannot ouer-reach vs with his idle arguments and coniectures; for we reade in Genesis, that Ioseph (who liued about fise hundred and fifty yeares before the warres of Troy) hauing expounded the dreame of Pharaoh, King of Aegypt, was by the sayde Prince made Superintendent ouer his kingdom, and for his safer possession in that estate, he tooke off his Ring from his hand, and put it vpon Iosephs hand. And surely, kings did not onely wear Rings in those times, because we reade that Thamar, desiring to haue issue by the race of Iudah her father in lawe (who was brother to Ioseph) had his company, vnder colour of being a common whoore, and received as presents from him, his Staffe and his Ring. In Moses time, which was more then foure hundred yeares before Troy warres, we find Rings to be then in vse; for we reade that they were comprehended in the ornaments, which Aaron the High-Priest should wear, and they of his posteritie afterward, as also it was auouched by Iosephus.

Whereby appeareth plainly, that the vse of Rings was much more ancient then Pliny reporteth them in his Coniectures: but as he was a Pagan, and ignorant in sacred writings, so it is no marvell, if these things went beyond his knowledge. According as himselfe apparently manifesteth, speaking of them of his owne Countrey: for hee saith, the vse of Rings were anciently so rare in Rome, & specially such as were of gold; that there was no auncient Statue to be seen ringed, except those of the Kings, Numa, and Sernius Tullius, for all other Statues were without Rings. Hee saith moreover, that (ordinarily) no other Rings were worne in Rome, but of yron, and that the custome of the Romans was, to giue Rings of gold (by way of prerogative) to Ambassadors, which they sent to any King, or to some strange Nation. And yet notwithstanding, they that entred Rome triumphantly, wore no other Rings then of yron, although crownes of gold were allowed for their heads, & long time did this custome continue.

Afterward, when the Romaines became more braue and sumptuous, yet did they expressly prohibite in Rome, to all mechanickall persons, and men of meane condition, to wear Rings of golde: except they were ranked with the Souldiers, or Romain Cauallerie, which was a third estate, betwene the Order of the Senators, and the common popularitie; as now-a-days is our Nobilitie. Whereuppon, Rings were so priuiledged, that in giuing licence to any one to wear a ring of gold, it was as much as to ennoble him, and to passe him for a Gentleman. For, as Pliny, Dion, and many other haue left in their writings, the Roman Knights were known, and those of the Military Order, amongst the common people, and distinguished from them by Rings, which they wore on their fingers: euen as euidently as Senators were knowne by their long Purple Roabes, embroidered with large headed nailes. For this cause, the Poet Horace attributed Rings to the Cauallerie, bestowing on them the name of Knights, or Gentlemen.

This priuiledge then of wearing Rings of golde, might not be graunted, but to such as had accomplished some high enterprise, or that were men of power, and worthily deserved. And assuredly, this prerogative was so affected generally, that Julius Caesar, counting to embolden his Souldiours by remunerations and promises: after a long Oration made to them, hee would lift vp his finger, in signe, that they should enioy whatsoever he promised. And all his Army conceiuing, that by this signe, hee would permit them to wear Rings of golde, which inuimared asmuch, as that they should all be knights, were the more sprightly encouraged, and serued him with most chearfull dispositiō.

Very true it is, that in the time of Emperours, this preheminence was giuen to many that desired it not, as we may see in Iuuenall and Suetonius, as also in the Commentaries or Chronicles of Iulius Cæsar, and of Pitellius. Neuertheless, the Edi&, whereby it was inhibited to Mechanickes to weare Rings of golde, was not in force at the second warre against the Carthaginians, and the ouerthrow of the Romaines which happened at Cannas; for, according as Pliny and Titus Linius doe report, three bushells of Ringd (belonging to the Romaines slaine in the battell of Cannas) were found among the slaughtered bodies. In like manner, as Cicero alleadged in his fift pleading against Verres, he viued the very words, When a Generall of the Romaine Army, obtained any victorie, hee ordinarily gaue a Ring to his Secretarie, as a reward for his faithfulness. Many other things were also in custome then, which wee will hereafter more at large discusse: after we haue proued by Examples and Histories, to what end Rings were worne in elder times, and in what manner.

First then, our reuerend predeceffours vied to weare their Rings, on the next finger to the least vpon the left hand, according as it was obserued by the Statues of Numa, and Servius Tullius, Romain kings;

because that finger was called Digitus Anularis, The Ring finger. And certainly (as Plinie faith in his seauenth Booke and eighteenth chapter) the Ring worne vpon the left hand, was a meere exprefion of modesty: the Romaines imagining, that it was a matter ouer-curious and superfluous, to weare any Rings at all: and therefore, to make the lesser shew of them, they did euer weare them on the left hand. Nor can we say (according to Plinie) that this was done to any other end, but because the left hand was more at liberty then the right in the manning of Armes, it seruening then, but as a defence to the bodie, in carrying onely Shields and Targets, as Souldiers vied then to doe, the right hand hauing no such ease.

Neuertheless, some do say, that Rings were worne on the left hand, for the more safetie and assurance, considering that it is the hand least employed; and that the Ring-finger was elected for the same respect: For it is least set to labour of all the fingers, as Macrobius faith. Pursuing the same case, and alleging Pliny for the point, he addeth these words, There is a veine or nerue, coming from the heart, which taketh his ending in the Ring-finger for which cause and reason, that finger deserueth to be crowned with golde. Aulus Gellius also is of the same opinion. Others affirme, that Rings are worne vpon that finger, for phylick, or phyfically: and that the vertue of precious stones enchafted in them, doe penetrate to the heart, by meanes of the fore-named veine. Macrobius, grounding his conceit vpon the Pythagorian numbers, whereof the Egyptians made vse; alleageth many other reasons concerning Rings, which I passe the lightier ouer, as seeming to be matters of small importance. We will resolue then on the last opinion, appearing to bee the most receivable: although we see rings to be worne indifferently, vpon all the fingers that are on the hand.

Macrobius doth auouch, that the most principall cause of inuenting or finding rings, was to serue as Seales: for in former times, euerie man caused to be engrauen in Stones so enchafted in Rings, what did best please his owne minde and affection, and wherewith to seale vp his Letters.

This was then the reason of bringing Rings in vse, although now-a-days they are that way least employed: and assuredly, men (in elder dayes) were so curious for well keeping their Rings and Signets, that they would seale with them verie fel-dome. Which I thinke not to be so vied amongst the Romaines, because they were so neare-handed, as not onely they sealed their Letters with their Signets, but also sealed therewith their Chests, Coffers, Ambries, Cub-boords and purses, that kept the houtholde keyes; yea, and sealed their Cellers, wherein were their stored wines, for feare lest they should be stolen away from them; and Marcus Tullius Cicero himselfe sayth, that his mother did the same.

Now concerning the vse of sealing with Rings, it is very ancient, according as we may reade in many Examples and Histories, especially in the sacred Scriptures; where where it is said, That Queene Isahel, wife to Achab King of Samaria, sealed with the Kings Ring, the Commaund whereby she sent to haue Naboth put to death: and yet notwithstanding, this was fiftene hundred yeares before the foundation of the Cittie of Rome.

Moreover, when the Prophet Daniel (by the Kings commaundement) was put into the Denne of Lions; the stone which closed the mouth of the sayde denne, was sealed with the Kings Ring, and the rings of all the Princes in the kingdom: where-by appeareth, that Rings serued them to seale withall, as now they are vied in any Kingdom, when the King confirmeth any especial priuilege.

And in these venerable elder times, Stones were enchafted and fixed in Rings, vpon which stones were cut and engrauen diuers formes and figures, deuised onely to seale withall. Heereupon did the Poet write:

I knew the Letter, and the faithfully stone.

As much to say, as he knew the partie from whence the Letter came, by the figure engrauen vpon the stone in the ring, implying, that he knew the Seale. In regard wherof, when men made their rings, they studied to exceede one another in riches and costlinesse, especially Kings and other great Lords; witnesse the so much renowned Seale-ring of Polycrates a Tyrant in the Isle of Samos. And although many did suspect the narration of that Seale, as a matter meereley fabulous; yet notwithstanding, Cicero, Plinie, Strabo and Herodotus, doe holde it for a true historie, affirming it to be an Emerald engrauen, wherewith this Prince vied to seale his Missiues and Patents, as briefly wee will say somewhat of the discourse.

This Prince, hauing long time liued in great prosperitie, neuer finding Fortune any way contrary to him, knowing also in others her instabilitie to be such, as it was impossible for a man to passe through the courses of this life, without experiencing her variable traueses; was willing to fall into a voluntary misfortune, as hoping (by that meanes) to satisfie whatsoeuer Fortune could inflict vpon him. Hereupon, taking the Ring which he so highly esteemed, he threw it into the very deepest place of the Sea, to haue the lesse hope for euer finding it againe; which yet he did, as Herodotus maintaineth, by the aduice of Amasis King of Aegypt, and his confederate. It hapned, that within some few dayes after, a Fisher-man presented him with a fish caught in the Sea, which was very great, and much remarkable. As the Cooke belonging to Polycrates was in dressing the same fish, he found in the bowels thereof, the Ring which his Lord had throwne into the Seagane accident very admirable, and fortunate to Polycrates. When King Amasis heard thereof, hee departed from the league of friendship which hee had long continued with Polycrates, sending him expresse word by his Ambassadors; that it was impossible for a man to be so fortunate, but ere long he must fall into farre greater misfortune, euen to the pitying of his best friends. As it hapned to him in short time after: For, King Darius making war against him, was taken in the said war by Orandus, Lieutenant generall to Darius, who caused him to be hanged and strangled. This came thus to passe, two hundred & thirty yeeres before the foundation of the Cittie of Rome.

Plinie sayth, that the Stone enchafted in this costly Ring, was a Cornalline: yet Herodotus affirmeth it to be an Emerald, but there appeareth some defect herein, because Plinie sayth, How was it possible in those times, that an Emerald could bee engrauen? In briefe, it was an ordinarie matter among Princes, to seale Letters with their Rings. As we may obserue by Alexander the Great, who (according as Quintus Curtius, and many more beside doe auouch) being willing to acquaint Hephestion, his choice favourite, with a secret which he had set downe in a Letter, shewing it to him, he tooke the Ring from his finger, and set it to Hephestions lippes, as a signe of sealing them vp with silence.

Suetonius sayth, that Octavius the Emperour vied the forme of a * Sphinx in his Seale; whereupon the Poets fained, that the Sphinx was a monster like to a * Harpyia, which demanded many doubtfull questions of passengers, ouerthrowing and also killing such, as could not resolue their Riddles. Whereupon the Romaines emblazoning the Seale of Octavius, vied as a comon saying; that his Sphinx might raise forme such doubtfull cause, as would be very difficult to resolue. And this made Octavius to alter his Seale, engraving therein the Image of Alexander the great. Mecenas, a great fauourite of the layde Octavius, had a Frogge engrauen in his Seale; and although that creature is naturally very timorous: yet notwithstanding, the Romans greatly feared the Frog of Mecenas, because by vertue of the Mandatons sent vnder that Seale, they payed great subsidies and tributes. Pompey the Great had a Lion in his Signet.

In briefe, Signets were so much respected, as it is well remembered, that the Signet Ring of Silla, moued that most cruell warre, which happened betweene him and Marius. In that Ring was engrauen the Image of Bocchus, King of Carthay or Mauritania, whom Silla tooke with King Jugurthe; which was so highly displeasing to Marius, to whom Silla was Lieutenant; as hee tooke occasion thereby, to enter open Armes against him. Plinie also saith, that the Sociall warre, which the Romans waged against their confederates, was moued by the meanes of a Signet, which procured the enmitie betweene * Drusus and Scipio.

But passing from these particular Signets of diuers Princes, we are to obserue, that the Romans caused their owne proper figures to be engrauen in their Rings. As is well deliuered by Plautus, who introduceth a Bowde in one of his Comedies, that by the impression of a Ring, knew the iests and countenance of a souldier her friend. Neuerthelesse, when the Emperours reigned in Rome, such as then were pleasing to them, carried their Images engrauen in their Signets. It may then be helde for certaine, that (almost) from the beginning of the world (by that which hath already beene said) Rings were in vse to bee worne, euen as nowadays they are in many Countries, where Armes and other deuices, are ordinarily carried in Rings.

Vve may conclude then, that Rings were made (at the first) for brauerie, and onely to giue delight to the eye; as also for some other reasons, whercof wee shall speake hereafter. And vndoubtedly, the custome of wearing Rings hath bene of long continuance; for, beside the Histories and Examples before related, wee reade of that couragious woman Iudith, who hauing sworn the death of Holo-

phernes, shee put off her mourning garments, and to execute her intention, shee clothed herselfe with goodly habites, enriching hir comely person with Bracelets, Rings and eare-rings. The Romans likewise wore Iewelles, and Rings on all fingers of the hand, except on the middle finger, which is the greatest about all the other, and which they holde to bee infamous; for a reason, whercof I purpose not now to speake.

Plinie saith, that after the victory which Pompey obtayned in Asia, the Romans greatly inured themselves to wear rings; and brauery grew then into such request, that in Winter they vied to wear bigger rings: but those appoynted for Summer, were much more light, subtil and ingeniously made. Also, they named their Rings according to the fingers whereon they wore them, as is affirmed by Iulius Pelagius. Plinie saith, that the second finger, or that whereon the Romans beganne to wear their rings, next vnto the Ring-finger, was the first finger, which is nearest to the pulle; and then afterwards they wore them on the little finger. Moreover he saith, that many (in his time) wore three Rings on each finger: neuerthelesse, such as were most dainty and curious, would wear but one Ring only vpon the whole hand.

From hence it ensued, that every Nation beganne to seeke very diligently for stones that were of greatest price and value; onely to serue in Rings as Signets, and thereon to engrave their deuices. Notwithstanding, among the stones of choicest esteeme, that of Pyrrhus (who waged warre against the Romans) in ancient times was accounted to be most excellent. For, in that precious stone, (without any helpe, inuention or arte of man) was naturally discerned, the figures of nine goddesses, and a yong naked child standing by them: so that they were censured, by graue opinion, to bee the portraits of the nine Muses, and of Apollo. A matter very strange, and somewhat difficult to be credited: neuerthelesse, many Authors (worthy beliefe) doe aouuch it for a true historie, especially Plinie. And questionles, according to the iudgement of Philosophers, this might happen thus naturally, by the great and immeasurable heate of matter consisting in the syde stone; or else by some correspondencie, or celestiall influence, with the Stars and Planets, euen as a woman may produce a monster, wholly different from humane kind, and by the selfe same influences.

Albertus Magnus saith, that he sawe at Colten, in the chappell of the three Kings, a Stone, wherein was naturally figured and discerned two mens heads, placed vpon a Serpent. Leonardus Camillus, in his Mirrour of precious Stones sayth, that this may be so, naturally, affirming moreover, to haue seene seauen trees, all of one forme, naturally portrayed in a Stone. And not to tie my selfe to other mens testimonies, I haue obserued in Columns of Marble and Iasper, men naturally figured, and many other shapcs beside, very remarkable, both for the diuersitie of colours, and singulartie of shadowes naturally thereto belonging. And therefore, seeing so manie credible persons haue written, concerning the precious Ring-stone of King Pyrrhus: it might very well be, that the Nine Muses were therein naturally figured, and appearing to the life.

Now, for that which is reported, as touching the Ring of Gyges, King of Lydia, (which Plinie attributeth to King Midus) it seemes a matter strange and incredible. This Ring had such a property, that being on the finger, and turned to the in-side of the hand, the wearer went inuisible; but turning it to the out-side, then he was visible againe, and to be seene of all men as before; all which was made so publickely knowne, that men tooke it offensively, when they were demanded, if they had seene Gyges Ring, or no. Plato the diuine Philosopher sayth in his Booke of Common-wealth, that by reason of a certaine tempest and earthquake, the ground opened, and a great deepe gulfe was publickely discerned. Gyges, being then a Sheepeheard, but a man of bolde spirit, descended downe into the gulfe, and found there a great horffe, which was of Brasse, and hollow; within which horffe was a dead Body; of a Giant-like and prodigious stature. He looking considerably on the huge body, espied a Ring vpon his finger, which he tooke off, and hauing put it vpon his owne, found himselfe sodainly returned to his fellowes: where they (as then) were keeping Cattell.

It came to passe, that Gyges (accidentally) turned the stone in the Ring toward the palme of his hand, and then heard his companions talking of him; as if hee was absent from their company: whereupon, being wise and ingenious, hee presently conceiued, that this proceeded from some hidden vertue in the Ring. So, finding it to be true; and trusting to the secret vertue thereof, he went to the Court of Candaules King of Lydia; where hee preyayled so fortunately, that he obtained the loue of the Queene. Afterward, hauing slaine the King, by meanes of his wife, he possessed himselfe of the kingdom; and so became King of Lydia. Cicero taketh this narration of Plato; no otherwise then as a morall Fable, applied by him to colour what he sayd. Philostratus, discounting of Serpents and dragons in the Indies, saith, That in certaine Stones, the heads of Serpents and Dragons are to be seene; naturally figured; and that this may be proued by the Ring of Gyges. Seeing then, that so many famous Writers make mention of Gyges Ring, we may well allow it to be a true Historie, and no Fable.

CHAP. XXIII.

Of the properties and vertues, secretly concealed in precious Stones: And whence the vertue proceedeth, which is sayd to be in Magickall Rings.

Touching the before remembered Ring of Gyges, albeit I will not resolutely affirme, that it had (indeede) any such propertie (as elsely where in other places, according as hath bene obserued by experience, and as may be gathered by the writings of diuers credible authors, concerning precious stones, hauing wonderful and vnspokeable qualities and vertues;) yet notwithstanding, making no such strange reckoning of that Ring, Magicians haue promised to execute far greater matters, then the ring of Gyges was able to do. Therefore, if that which is written of Gyges be true, I am of the mind, that he did it by the Art of Magicke, rather then any other vertue else: as all they doe, that that compasse all their intentions, by the power of Astrologie, observing times, as also the aspects and influences of Starrs and Planets, whereunto they ascribe peculiar rules, whereof we purpose to speake somewhat.

But, returning to the vertues and properties of precious stones; It is very certayne, that our graue Ancients did place such stones in their Rings, and wore them vpon their fingers, onely to be sensible of their properties. Neuerthelesse, although they should be indued with great vertues, yet I am perswaded, that their qualities are not so precious, as proclamation is made of them. Wherefore, not to stand on deciphering their vertues particularly, I will direct my Readers to such Bookes, where their natures are at large described; contenting my selfe, to speake of some few, as they haue beene (in some measure) related to me.

First then, it is saide of the Diamond, that it is very singular against forcerie, charmes and enchauntments, naturally strengthening the heart by his vertues; but especially against illusions of phantasies and spirits, which terrifie by sodaine affrightings. Also I reade, that it is exceeding good for women with child, for the conseruation of their fruit. The Amethyst serueth as a counter-poyson, and likewise is a defensatiue against drunkennesse. The Balais or Ruby, restraineth the inordinate appetites of the flesh, and is a soueraigne help to the health of any body. The Carbuncle is very preferatiue against pestilentiall and infecting ayres, and asswaging luxurious or carnall desires, doth greatly comfort and delight the heart. The Corall containeth in it diuers especiall properties; for it stencheth or stayeth bleeding; it is a preferatiue against gasty visions, and dreadfull dreames; it is likewise very chearefull to the heart and vitall spirits.

As concerning the Cryftall, it is soueraigne against such persons or things, as can enchaunt or charme by their looks or sight; and it also is a restriction and defence, from dreaming of offensive matters. The Iacynth, is cordiall and comfortable to the heart, in like manner as the Corall is; and is also a soueraigne preferatiue against the pestilence.

It is credibly reported and written, that wearing an Emeraude on the finger, it maketh the partie chaste and continent, as hating and despising the lusts of the flesh. And some holde it for certaine, that if it be worn on the finger of a Maide, that hath lost her virgin honour, it will break immediately. It is also greatly auailable against euill spirits, against tempests, and against the falling sickenes. The Cornaline moderateth all wanton appetites, and glads the heart wonderfully: this stone is the best of all other to seale withall, because waxe will neuer cleaue vnto it. The Topaze doth appease the passions of the mind, asswageth the impetuous tempests of choller and phrensies, quite ouerthroweth the melancholy humour, and finally, it purifieth the blood. Behold what seuerall vertues remayne in the fore-remembered Stones.

Many other there are, of great and extraordinary vertue, which I let passe the lighter, referring the Reader to Aristotle (although the booke of Stones, and bearing his name, was none of his worke, by plaine appearance) and to Albertus Magnus, in his Treatise of Minerall matters; to the Poet Marbodens, in his Booke of precious Stones; to Serapion, in his Booke of Simples; to Isidorus, in his sixt Booke of Etymologies; to Bartholomew the Englishman, in his Tract of the Properties of naturall things; and (about all) to Leonardus Camillus, in his Mitrouer or Glasse of precious Stones. Plinie also hath written of them in many places; likewise Plincentius, and many other, whom I spare to name for breuitie sake.

But I pray you, let vs bestow a little consideration, on the persequicacie and ready apprehension of mans spirit, in finding out the maner and meanes to fet and enchaîne precious Stones in Rings, thereby to enioy their proprieties and vertues. Nay, there were some that conueighed poison into their rings, to compasse their owne speedy death, if any misfortune did throw them into any dangerous disaster: notwithstanding it ensued from the infection of the diuill, inducing diuers ancient Pagans to despair, as may be obserued in sundry olde Histories. Especially renowned Hanniball, who vitiually carried poyson in his Ring, whereof he dyed in Bythinia, because he would not fall into the hands of Titus Flaminius (Ambassador from the Romaines) his capitall enemies; he

he hauing slaine (before) the father of Flaminius in Italy: to whom Prusias King of Bythinia, would haue deliuered Hanniball, thereby to winne grace with the Romanes. Plinie sayth, that the great Athenian Orator Demosthenes, imitated the very same example.

Heliogabalus, a very vile conditioned prince, ordinarily carried poyson in his Ring, and to the same end: albeit as Lampridius sayth, in reporting his life, he deserved not so honourable a death, as impoysoning. Plinie speaks of this matter, and maner of carrying poysons in rings, to be an ordinary obseruation, and very common in his time.

Moreover, those ancient fore-goers did singularly obserue the aspects, & influences of Starrs, as well by forging them into their rings, as also by engraving them in stones, when they were to be enchaîned, by those meanes to giue them vertue: a most wicked, vile & vnworthy action, not meet to be remembered among Christians. And assuredly there are many Authours, which discourse on those Images & Characters, made by obseruation of Astronomical Constellations, and which made promise of mountaines and meruailes by those meanes. Affirming, that ouer and beside the naturall vertue of the stone; it attained to a new strength and quality, by the Image engrauen thereon, as also by the alliance and propinquity, which it had with the metall wherein it was placed. And they would maintayne, that those Planets and Starrs gaue influence, and communicated their vertue to those rings, forged in that ceremonious manner; even as to the things subiected to their influences; and so by this means, the naturall vertue of those stones, was fortified by the Magical vertue thus attained vnto.

In this maner, they baptized (by the name of naturall Magicke) this colligation or connexion, which they performed by hearbs, metalls, perfumes and characters, and which they vniued or combined together in one ring, saying: That rings composed in that maner, were soueraigne against the Apoplexie or dead palsie, and anguish in the sides. Some there were made proper to reioyce the heart, to heale and mitigate the rage and fury of a madman, and also that they serued as preferatiues against poyson, and for many other diseases; as to consecrate a man, euen for the encreasing of his naturall strength. In briefe, they attributed many admirable proprieties to these Rings, wherein breuitie constraineth me to be silent. Notwithstanding, whosoever desireth to be better informed, may make his recourse to the Mitrouer of precious Stones, set downe by Leonardus Camillus, and to Cornelius Agrippa, in his Booke of Secret Philosophie; to Albertus Magnus; and Philosophus, a Philosopher highly renowned, discoursing on this Argument; as the like doth Tuissmatius, Sosserinus and diuers other. Neuerthelesse, I doe not greatly rely on what they haue sayd; because I neuer experimented the vertue of Magical Rings.

True it is, that such as make profession hereof, do say and auouch, That by obseruing the Constellations, requisite as well for forging the metall, as for engraving the stone enchaîned in the Ring, and vnder the Planet named Mars; that ring doth fortifie the heart, and hath the retentive vertue, working many other great effects, almost incredible. Likewise, such Rings as are made vnder the influence of Mercurie, doe adorne the speaking of a man; and maketh him a singular Orator, as also apt to deale in merchandise. And so the like may bee sayde of such, as are made vnder the obseruation of other Planets.

Others engraue in their Rings, the characters belonging to the signes of the Zodiacke, and according to their triplicitie, saying: that they of the first triplicitie, as namely, Aries, Leo and Sagittarius, doe serue for colde diseases, for feaures occasioned by phlegme, and for dead Palsies. Also the characters appertaining to the second and ayrie triplicitie, as Gemini, Libra and Aquarius, are singular against corruption and putrefaction of the blood. And so doe they say of other triplicities of the signes, according to their Elementarie qualitie. And indeed, this obseruation is very ancient, and was practised a long time amongst the oldest Philosophers, as well Chaldeans, and Aegyptians, as the Iewes.

Some also affirme, that the seauen fortunate Rings, which King Tirchus gaue to Appolonius Tyrianus (according as Philostrophus sayth) were of the same temper.

Farther affirming, that the sayd Prince did daily weare a Ring, answerable to the Planet that day reigning: by the which meanes, he preferred himselfe for an hundred yeares, being always as in the floure of his age. The grand-father to this King Iarchas, lived an hundred and thirty yeres, by vertue of the afore-sayd Rings, being continually in manly verdure. And hereupon, the Greekes made great vse of these Magickall and sophisticated Rings, as may be seene in the Comedies of Aristophanes, where hee bringeth in a man-Bawde, peremptorily contesting against Disem, who had threatened him, and these are his words: I care not for all the threatening that can be used against me, hauing this Ring vpon my finger, which his Maistrisse sold for a Drachma. And shewing the Ring, he proceeded thus: With this Ring I will keep my selfe from his teeth, and from his barking.

Erasmus, speaking of these Magickall Rings, hath these words: Some daily vse to weare Rings, wherein are certaine characters engrauen, vnder obseruation of constellations and aspects of Starres, and firmly hold, that they serue for diseases in the sides, and are proper (also) for diuerse infirmities. Others imagining this to be true, do counterfeite these Rings, but all is merely abuse. For, to giue them such vertue; the course of the Starres must be diligently obserued, and the constellations when they are made. Notwithstanding, many regarde not the influences of the Starres at all; but onely respect the nature of the stone enchaufed in the Ring, and the character there engrauen. This may be seene in the Bookes of the wings of Rogerius, and in the writings of Leonardus Camillus, as also of Tetellus and Caclius, in those bookes which are attributed to Salomon for their credite, and which amply doe discoufure thereon. For, according as Tetellus sayth, a Iaspur stone enchaufed in a Ring, hauing the Image of a Maiden engrauen thereon: preferueth the wearer from ill spirits, and from water. If a Lambe be engrauen thereon, the Ring defendeth from the Apoplexie, and cureth also the feauer quartane. A Cornalline also, hauing the shape of a man figured thereon, holding in his hand some goodly and respectable thing; doth stench the fluxe of blood. In briefe, they speake of so manie matters, pleasant to heare, and very hard to be credited: as I can say nothing in the case; but let such as please, make their own experience of them.

But returning againe to Rings & Signets, in Spaine they serue in all contracts, instead of full determination: also in matter of marriage, the two parties giue rings to each other, as a signall and confirmation of the mutual promise, which they haue made one to an other. In like manner, when religious women doe vndertake the veile; in signe of their profession, Rings are giuen them, as well from the religious house, as from their Parents, in testimony of this true and chaste marriage. There is yet an other poynt, concerning this case in question, and though of small importance, yet it doth diuers needfull seruices. Many will change their Rings from one finger to another, for better remembering some occasion to be performed, which otherwise might remaine forgotten. Wherefore, if we consider well the vse of rings, they are not so much to be blamed, as Pliny and some others doe: For, (in all times) men of vertue and honour haue vsed them. Hereto we may adde, that God created golde and precious stones, for the seruice of man, and to maintaine him in health; enduing them with such sundrie properties, to the end they might be the more commodious for men. Finally, Rings are particularly attributed vnto Bishopps, in signe of dignitie.

who were named Gentlemen of the kings house, or Gentlemen seruants. And these Gentlemen were descended of great houses in the Kingdome, as well Schollers as Souldiers, and they remained continually in the Court, attending on the King in times of peace and warre. Wherefore, the name of Gentleman, signifies as much as Nobleman, and extracted of a noble linage. Neuertheless, it appeareth not much differing from our purpose, to say somewhat, concerning whence came the name of Gentleman, or of Gentilitie, together, with the custome of bearing Arms in Escutcheions.

As touching the first point, the name of Gentle came from the Latines, who called such men Gentles or Gentiles, as were of one and the same race, and of one selfe same name; being at libertie, and of free condition from all Antiquitie: and those houses also were tearmed Ancient Gentiles, euen as now-adayes wee call them houses of Noble race, houses of Gentlemen. Which Cicero well witnesseth, in his Topickes, speaking thus: We call them Gentiles, that are of one name, and who from all times haue bene of free condition: so that no part or parcell of their race, was euer seruant or slaue, and much lesse, degraded from honour, and of the Romaine Burgeship. And Batius also sayth in his Topickes, we call ancient Gentiles, all such as are issued of one ancient house and race, franke and free: as were the Scipioes, the family of Brutus, & other noble houses of Rome. Cicero likewise taketh this name of Gentle, For one that is of our race, and that beareth the same name and Armes as we doe.

The learned Pudens, speaking of deuoirs or duties of parentage, obserued among the Romaines, sayth: They were three in number: Dutie of consanguinitie, Dutie of blood and linage in direct line, And duty of Gentilitie, as much to say, as when a man is descended of the same name & Armes. The title then of Gentle or Gentility, was and should be attributed onely to Noble houses. And therefore the name of Gentleman among the Romaines, valued as much as a Nobleman among the Castilians and French. And assuredly, the Romaine Gentlemen did (ordinarily) shew the Images and Deuices of their predecessors, that had illustrated their memorie by their worthy decdes: and this representation of Nobility, was highly esteemed among the Romaines, euen as yet to this day, are ancient Armes, and Penons and Standards, belonging to the predecessors of Gentlemen, who would not forget any thing of Antiquitie (concerning their linage) in funeral orations, made at the obsequies of their parents, thereby to haue the man accounted so much the more Noble.

In this respect Cicero reprooued Piso, in the change and pleading he made against him, saying: The honours and estates which thou hast obtained, were giuen thee, onely for respect of the smooke images of thy predecessors, of whom thou carriest the colour onely, so that thou canst not be denied to be a Gentleman. And in another place, speaking of himselfe, he confesseth: To haue no Images of his race, for by his excellent knowledge, admirable wisdom, and highly esteemed eloquence, he so much ennobled himselfe, that he came to be Consul of Rome, enioying other degrees and prerogatives, euen as if hee had bene a Gentleman of race, and issued from the house of a Senator. Which himselfe also further confesseth in his last pleading against Verres, saying: Thou being great Surveyour of Rome, for some speciall cruises done by thee to the Common-wealth, hast a place appointed for thine Image, and enioyest the priuileges of a Gentleman.

I reade, that the Romaines were verie careful of those images, which were called Stemmates: for commonly they were made of waxe, and placed ouer the portalles of their houses, or else proudly kept in aptly contriued boxes, and so preferred in places appointed for their standing, as witnesseth Iuuenal, Martial, Seneca, Plinie, and many more.

And when there was question of some publike ceremony or of funeral pompe, the people of the houses would make a goodly shew of the Images belonging to their Ancestours, with their names fixed vpon them, according as Plinie reporteth. He also declareth in his ninth booke and fift chapter, that the Romaines would place before their houses, the Ensignes, Penons and other Coates of Armes and spoiles, which they had wonne from their enemies in war, and remained there to perpetuallie: so that if the house were folde, it was not lawfull for the buyer to take them away, because they serued for

From hence came the custome of bearing Armes in a Escutchian, as now aduies Gentlemen vse to do. Notwithstanding, it seemes that the emblazoning of Armes, receiued their originall from those deuices, which were on the Banners and Ensignes, as well of the Romaines, as other strange Nations, and carried by them in warre. As at this very day, the Emperors beare an Eagle in their Armes; because Julius Cesar, the first Emperour of Rome, carried an Eagle in his Ensignes. As much may be said concerning the Flowers de Luces, which the Kings of France carrie, and of diuers other.

Now, concerning mine owne opinion, I finde, that long time before the Romains vse, the Armes of Gentlemen were in vse. For, it is said, in the first Booke of the Macchabees, that Simon, Capitaine general of the Jews armie, made a very sumptuous sepulcher for his father, mother and brethren, which was enriched with Pyramids and Pillars, whereon was engrauen Ships, in manner of a Deuice; and thereon were fixed coats of Armes, wherewith he had vanquished his brethren. Messala Coruinus, in the Oration which he made, to honour the linage of the Emperour Octavianus (although the Oration deferred not the title of Messala, alleading Virgil, vpon that he wrote; affirming Antenor the Trojan, to be the founder of Padua) sayth; The Troians Armes were placed by Antenor, on the Temple of new Padua; and that the emblazon of the Armes, was a Swine in a field golde. So that, if Messala do speake truly, the vse of Armes is very auncient. Heereupon I conceiue, that the emblazons of Gentlemen, took name of Armes or Armories, because they were continually engrauen neare to their Armes. For, as Messala saith; Our Auncients, after they had obtained any victorie, ordinarily placed in their Temples, the Armes and Ensignes, wherewith they wonne the victorie from the enemy.

Wherefore we may well say, that the name of Gentleman, and the manner of bearing Armes in Escutchions, is no moderne matter, but very auncient; and that the name of Gentle or Gentile, came from those ordained and appointed for horsemen in the Romaine Cauallerie:

who were of the third estate or degree amongst the common people. And they that wore the long robe or Gowne, were the Order of Senators, and their sonnes aunciently called Patricians; afmuch to say, as issued from fathers. For, in the time of Romulus, according as Titus Livius a-uoucheth: The Senatours were called Fathers, and their sonnes Patricians, and this degree was the most noble and chiefe in Rome. Other Gentlemen, that were not of this rancke, were stiled Knights: from whence infused, that Gentlemen in Spain are called Cheualiers. The like wee say of the long gownned men, who commaund ouer the people, as Senators; and yet notwithstanding, they come after the other. Briefly, the name of Knight is come to such credite, as the very greatest doe holde themselves honoured to bee called Knights: albeit the name of Knight was but the proper title of a Souldier of the ordnances, or of the light horse.

CHAP. XXVI.

¶ Of the Septuagint, or Seauentie Translations of the olde Testament, out of Hebrew into Greeke: At what time it was done, and for what occasion.

Every man is very briefe, concerning the traduction of the Seauentie persons, who translated the Olde Testament out of Hebrew into Greeke; but yet very few do know, whence it came, and wherefore that translation was so appointed: wherein assuredly many Diuines, in their publique preaching, haue declared ouer-much sloath & negligence. First then it is to be obserued, that this Translation of the Seauentie men, hath bene only in the Church holly and religiously respected; but in the time of Pope Damasus, Saint Hierome conuerted it into Latine. And to speake seriously, the traduction of the Septuagint hath bene of such authoritie, that it is alledged for diuine: for so it appeareth by our blessed Saviour and his Apostles, in often alledging Scriptures, according to the saide Translation.

And

And because the historie of that Translation is very worthy and famous, I will set downe that which is sayd by Saint Augustine, in his Booke of the Citie of God, Iosephus the Jew, Eusebius, Irenaeus, Iustinus, Rufinus, and many other.

Here is to be noted, that the five bookes of Moses, the Prophets, and other Histories of the holy Bible, were first of al written in the Hebrew tongue, which was the first vsall tongue among men; before the confusion of Tongues, which happened at the building of the Tower of Babylon. In that tongue and language God spake first to his Prophets; as the like our blessed Lord and Saviour did, when he was conversant among men. This language then being particular to the Jewes, and the mysteries and prophecies (as also the coming of Christ) being concealed therein: it was very requisite, that such mysteries should bee written in a tong more common then the Hebrew: as that was then among the Greekes, who were sole Gouvernours of the wide Vniuers, by the fresh and recent victories of Alexander the Great. So that, by the frequentation and traffique of men, the Greeke tongue had coure generally, and was esteemed the most common of all other Languages whatsoever.

To the end then, that the mysteries of sacred Scripture, might bee vnderstood of euery one, before the coming of Iesus Christ; it was requisite of necessitie, that the Scriptures should be traduced into a common and vulgar tongue; for feared lest the Jewes at the Messias his coming, should suppress them, or else falsifie them (for that race of people was of bolde and most wicked inclination) because it might not be sayd, that the Christians had added or diminished any thing from the Scriptures, according to their owne humour and phantasie. And therefore, about two hundred and seauentie yeares before the Incarnation of Iesus Christ, it pleased the goodnesse of Almighty God, to inspire Protemie Philadelphus King of Egypt, to procure the translation of the holie Bible. But seeing we are fallen into discourse of that Prince; we will reach into his Historie somewhat higher.

After that Alexander the great had subdued Asia (which he performed in small compasse of time) and that he had ranged a great part of Europe and Affrica: he died without any lawfull heire, that might succede him in such great Empires. He being dead, the Princes and Captains of his Court, who were all most valiant and famous men; laboured by force of Armes to possesse themselves of what they possibly could: So that the kingdomes apperaining to Alexander onely, became diuided into many parts: for Antigonius possessed himselfe of Asia, Selenchus of Chaldæa, and of many other Prouinces. By the same means also Protemie, the sonne of Lagus made himselfe King of Egypt, of Phœnicia, of Cyprus, and diuerse other Countries, among which Iudea then was one. Being Lord of Iudea, he made there many great booties, leading away store of Jewes captiues into Egypt, where hee had ordained the chiefe seate of his Kingdome. So that he was the first King of Egypt, that called himselfe Protemie: which name remained hereditary to the successours in the sayd Kingdome; for, before that Cambyses, sonne to Cyrus, King of Persia, had conquered Egypt, all the Egyptian Kings called themselves Pharaohs.

But returning againe to our Protemie, after he had reigned a long time, he dyed, and then succeeded him Protemie Philadelphus, who likewise reigned peaceably in Egypt.

This Prince gaue leaue, and set at libertie all the Jewes, which his father led prisoners into Egypt. And then it came to passe, according to the pleasure of Almighty G.O.D., that this King created a goodly Librarie, in Alexandria the capital Citie of Egypt; by the means of Demetrius Phalarus the Athenian, a man much renowned for his knowledge; and to whome hee gaue full power and commission. So that, by the diligence of Phalarus, hee compassed the finishing of the fairest and most complete Librarie, that euer was seene in the world, as well for number of Bookes, as the qualitie of Authors, and diuersitie of disciplines.

This King, vnderstanding that the Books of the Jewes, contained admirable and vnexpressible mysteries, resolved to haue them reduced into the Greeke language. And to effect this his purpose, he dispatched an Embasie to Elexar, Prince of the Iewish Synagogue, with great presents; intreating him, in memory of fauors by him to those of his Nation, and for the good neighbourhood betweene them, to send him a Bible in Hebrue, as also such learned and skilfull men, as could translate it into the Greeke tongue. Iosephus and Eusebius haue set downe the forme of the Letter, which was as followeth:

The Tenour of the Letter, sent by King Ptolomy Philadelphus, to Eleazar the High-Priest.

Ptolomy a King, to the High-Priest Eleazar, health.

NO man can beignorant, that manie Jewes haue dwelt in this kingdome of Egypt, being brought thither prisoners by the Perfians, at such time as they subiugated Judea. And againe, when the late deceased king my father brought diuers hither also, to whom (neuerthelesse) my said Lord & Father trusted so much, that they did him seruice in his warres: by way, he planted them in strong forts, by sea, he Garrisoned, to keepe the Egyptians in awe & feare. As for my selfe, from such time as I came to the Crowne, I haue alwaies vsed humanity towards your Nation, and haue sent home more then 100000 that were detained here as slaues, paying their ranfome & charges to them that held them prisoners. Such as desired to follow the wars: to them I haue giuen wages, euery one answerable to his worth and merit. Many of them I haue lodged in mine owne house ordinarily, as hoping by this means, to do somewhat acceptable to God, who deliuered this Kingdome into my hands.

And the better to declare the affection I beare in doing all pleasures that I can to you, and all the rest of your nation, aswell for the time present as to come: I haue determined, to cause your Bookes in the Hebrew language, to be translated into the Greek tongue, because I would not haue my newly erected Library, to remaine vnfruitfull any way. And therefore you shall do me a great fauor, to chuse sixe auncient men out of each Tribe, that are expert in your Lawe, and well versed in the Greeke for this intended translation. Not doubting, but that it will redound to our great honour, and ample contentment of mind. For this purpose, I haue sent vnto you An- dreas and Arifteus, who more at large will informe you of mine intention: to them haue I deliuered large summes of gold and siluer, to fulfill the Sacrifices as I haue appointed them, desiring you to send mee by them, such as may further this negotiation. Assuring you, that you cannot doe me a greater pleasure, nor more, to maintaine the friendship begun betweene vs: if (as I intreat you) this may be done with some expedition. Ptolomie.

After that the High-Priest Eleazar had received the Kings Letters, and vnderstood the further trust referred to the Ambassadors; he entertained them very honorably, receiuing (with chearefull looks) the golde and siluer sent by king Ptolomie, which (according to Iosephus) was a mighty quantitie. And hauing assembled the principall men of the twelue Tribes of Israel, hee acquainted them with the Kings intention, and to what end he had sent the Ambassadors. Wherein, to satisfie his desire, they elected out of each Tribe sixe aged men, well experimented in the Lawe, and expert in the Greek language. For the Jewes had a custome to send their people into Asia, to learne the Greek and Latine tongues, as also the Artes and Sciences comprised vnder those languages, euen as yet to this day they obserue the same; so that all the men made choice of, were seuentie two. After they were thus chosen, they were sent with the Ambassadors to King Ptolomie, and the Bookes of the Old Testament with them, written (as Iosephus sayth) in most places all in golden Letters, and vpon such parchment, the most ingeniously made that euer was seene. Moreover, he sent diuers great gifts to the said Prince, returning him answer in maner following.

The Answer of the High-Priest Eleazar, to great king Ptolomy Philadelphus, faire loue and affection, which you beare

people, and to let them fully vnderstand, what holy deuotion you declare towards God; I haue exposed to open view, the

And because the extraordinary great fauours which you haue done to them of vs to vfe or return any condigne requital:

we must make our recourse to solemne

of you, of your Queene, and of the Noble

may best stand with the conseruation of

we send vnto you, with the Bookes of our Bible. But when the Translation shall be

Eleazar, and the people of the Jewes.

When King Ptolomy had receyued
the Letters of Eleazar, with the Bookes of the Bible, and such Presents as were sent by Eleazar, he most royally welcommed
the seuentie two aged men; and (as Iosephus sayth) ioyed not a little for their arri-uall. Their lodgings being prepared, & all things necessary for their employment,

they settled themselves to the Bibles translation: wherein happened an admirable and miraculous case; for the seuentie two men being placed separately, according to the Kings Commission, without any meanes or power of conferring one with another: after they had thus diuinely finished their Translation, they all appeared before the King with their severall labours, and were found therein all to coforme and agreeing, that one man had not a fillable more then another; which doublelesse could not bee done, without the power and especiall grace of the holy Ghost, according to the saying of S. Augustine, Irenus and Tertullian, who aunc-eth in his time, to haue scene at Alexandria in Egypt, the written Bookes of the seuentie two Translators, vnder their own hands, which were in Hebrew and in Grecke.

As much is said and maintained by Tustinus the Philosopher, in the booke of Ad-uertisements, which he wrote to the Gentiles and Pagans, where he speaketh thus.
King Ptolomy caused to bee builded without the City of Alexandria, seuentie two Halls, to lodge therein separately, the seuentie two Translators, and there provided for them all things necessary, in most honourable manner.
In which places the Translators remained,
without seeing one another, until the translation was perfected. Nay more, he affirmeth to haue scene the ruines and olde walls of those buildings, which were esteemed as reliques and sacred things. And although S. Hierome and Ruffinus do disagree concerning the number of those Halls or Chambers: yet notwithstanding, that is no matter of any moment, cosidering (according to S. Augustine, and many other Authors) each Translatour wrote his bookes alone by himselfe, not a way conferring one with another, and yet neuerthelesse, all the Translations were found conformable.

And assuredly, when I consider adui-dedly on this mystery, I hold it for a mighty miracle, that they should agree in such a conformity of stile, order and method, trading matter so long and diuers, although they had bene admitted together, and had begun the worke with their owne agreement, because we see it a matter of no meane moment, to finde two me agreeing vpon one and the same point,

when they are to intermeddle with one argument together. But, after the translation was finished, the Iewes which dwelt in Egypt, and were very learnedly skillfull in their Law, commended the Sacred writings to the King, wherewith hee was most highly pleased. And according as Josephus and Eusebius do maintaine, King Ptolemy, being amazed at those Scriptures, and the holy mysteries in them comprized, demanded of Demetrius Phalarus, who had the charge of his Library, how it hapned, that Lycurgus, Solon, and other Law-makers, were silent in this law of the Iewes? Whereto Demetrius thus answered.

Sir, this Law, as your selfe haue sufficiently seen, came from God; and no Lawyer euer durst be so bold, to meddle with it un-reverently, or misuse any text therein contained. Theopompus was smitten with the hand of heauen, with an extraordinary perturbation in his senses, and mighty paine at his hart: because he medled with the holy Histories of the Hebrews among his owne, beautifying them with borrowed words, and rhetorical phrases. But upon his true repentance and humiliation to God, committing himselfe wholly to his mercy, it was revealed to him in his sleep: that this disaster happened to him, because he durst be so bolde, to embellish and enrich the sincerity of holy Scripture, with curious and adorning words; and thereby to impart them to Pagan and Infidell Nations.

I remember also to haue read, that Theodorus a Tragical Poet, lost his sighte sodainly for taking a place of Scripture to maintaine an argument in his Tragedy: and yes upon his confessed repentance, his sight was restored to him againe.

King Ptolemy wondering at this discourse of Demetrius, placed the translated Bible in his Library, and hauing thankfully respected the ancient Iewes, he licensed their departure, giuing to each man sumptuous gifts; thanking likewise (by his Letters) the Prince Elezazar, to whom he sent Kingly presents. Thus you see, how the translation of the Septuagint was performed, they being men (as S. Augustine and Saint Hierom saide) that then had the spirit of Prophecy: which appeared plainly, in that our blessed Lord and his Euangelists, alledged Scriptures according to their translation. And if perhappes any thing is found in the Hebrew Bible, which is not in the translation of the Septuagint, wee may well say, that the holy Ghost would not reueale it by their means. And contrarywise, if some thing bee in their translation which is not in the Hebrew text: we must verily beleuee, that the blessed Spirit reuealed the passage by their means. For the selfsame Spirit that directed the Prophets, when they set down their Prophecies in writing, governed the seauenty two Translators in translating the holy Bible; so saith S. Augustine, concerning the version of the Old Testament.

This was the first, before the coming of Iesus Christ; for, after our Sauious Passion, Aquila the Iew wrote another. Two other translations were afterwards performed, but by whom it was not known: notwithstanding, they came to the hands of Saint Hierom, as Eusebius maketh mention in the first booke of his Ecclesiastical history. By these translations the Bible was reduced out of Greeke into Latine: but Saint Hierom did his out of Hebrew into Latine, without staying on the Septuagints labour, nor the other Greeke translations. Beside Psalmes and other things are sung and sayde in the Church, wherof no disposition neede to be made, whether they were of S. Hieroms writing or no.

CHAP. XXVII.

¶ Of the admirable vertues and properties, which God and Nature hath given vnto the Ant, Emmet, or Pisse-mire: And what worthy examples haue from it bin deriued.

 You may well say, that it is no difficult matter for mee, to speake of the Nature and properties of Creatures, hauing for my Patroness, Maisters, and Guides, Aristotle, Pliny, Aelianus, and many other, writing on that argument: but because my desire extendeth it selfe beyonde ordinary compass,

Chap. 27.

Of the Ant or Pisse-mire.

counting things curious, and knowne to few people; I purpose to say something of the Ant, Emmet, or Pisse-mire; albeit in regard of the creatures smallnesse, some may thereby take occasion to condemne my discourse. Neuerthelesse, let their humors serue them howsoever, I cannot exclude this creature out of our rich & spacious Forrest: for there is not any garden how warily or closely fouer it bee kept; but the Ant will make his entrance, euen in despite of the Master and Owner. And how little in our iudgement and substance of the creature, it seemeth to vs; yet many renowned Authors haue written wonderful things thereof.

Very true it is, that Pliny sayeth; This creature is unprofitable, and of no worth at all, but onely for it selfe: when contrariwise, the Bee, as little as it is, doeth (neuerthelesse) giue a pleasing taste to our food, by the sweet sauer of his honey, whereas the Ant doeth gnaw and eate them. But yet in another place, he speaketh wonders of the Ant, & extollet it extraordinarily. For, concerning the blamefull imputation hee imposeth on this little creature, it proceedeth from a certaine kinde of Couetousnesse, wherunto man is so inclined for his own particular profit, that he would deriue benefit from all creatures, how small fouer they be, being greatly offended, that our Ant should provide it selfe of one poore graine of Corne. But if we would consider things, in such kinde as duly appertaineth to them, we should finde more profit from the Ant, then from the Bee. For the Ant serueth vs as an example of industry, prouidence and friendship, and of many other vertues beside, related at large by Salomon in his Prouerbes, who sendeth the sluggard to the Ant, to consider what paine and solicitude she taketh, and to learne discipline and direction of her. For, hauing neither guide or Captain, or any to command and direct her: she prepareth her food in the Summer for Winter.

From hence it ensued, that Saint Ambrose (speaking of this silly little creature) vseth these words: The desseignes and enterprises of the Ant, being iustly considered, do farre exceede her power and strength. And although she haue none to incite her to labor: yet notwithstanding, by a certaine kind of dominion or authority, she provideth for after-claps and future necessities. Behold what

Saint Ambrose hath saide, who speaketh much more amply concerning the properties of this little Ant; whereto Cicero likewise discouering, sayeth: That the Ants Commonwealth is to be aduised to euery City. For, not onely they haue vnderstanding like other Animals: but also they haue sense, reason, and memory.

Pliny, Aristotle, and Elianus, are verie stayed in iudgement, for their consideration of the Ant, and not without great reason: for in duly obseruing her forme, her dreadfull aspect, her hardnesse, her lively colour, and her piercing snout; there is not any Lion so fierce as this creature, were it but as great as it is little; it is so strong, bold, and dreadfull.

First, there is not any animal, that can carry the weight of himselfe: but the Ant carrieth and draweth ten times a heavier load then it selfe, so that if this small creature were as great as a horse, it would easily beare the burthen of foure Waggon. Other beasts can hardly defend themselves against her assaults; for, although shee is so small a worme, yet notwithstanding, her teeth are so strong, as the very hardest graine of Corne is not able to withstand them. Nay, she will carry hard stones in her teeth, and howsoever she fasteneth vpon them, shee will squash and bruiseth them, holding them so forcibly: that no picers are able to open her mouth. And so opini-tiue is shee of her power, as shee will rather suffer her selfe to be rent in peeces, then to forsake whatsoeuer shee holdeth: which strength would be farre greater, if her body were equiualent thereto.

But leauing her strength (whereof so small account is made, in regard of her littleness) let vs somewhat consider the natural instinct, together with the vertue & wisdom abiding in her. For nature (throughout the whole wide world) hath not produced any other creature, making more demonstration of vertue, then the Ant: nor such profession of amity, industry, prouidence, and diuers other singular vertues, as wee shall haue occasion to speake of hereafter, in theyr apte places.

In the prime place, Ants haue the form of a Commonwealth among themselves, according as Pliny saith; for they haue neither King, Lord, nor any Commander; as much as is affirmed by Aristotle and Salomon.

mon: And yet their Commonwealth is so well policed and ordered, as they haue neuer any Warre or ciuill contention among them. Likewise they are neuer seen to fight or kill one another, as men doe: but, as hath bene obserued, all labour for the Weale-publike, without laying aside any thing for priuate vse, as other Creatures do, that fight for feeding of their bellies.

How they supply one another's weakness in liking their provision.

Ants haue their dwelling in friendly manner altogether.

Their cause is commonly nere to some Brook or Riuer.

Ants helpe and assist one another, in conducting home their store, and make their provision generally for all together; and if any one be over-loaded or wearie, his fellowe giues his supply, and in such decent manner, as one is no hinderance to another. And if there be any thing over heavy to be carried away with their provision, they take so much thereof as is needfull, and easie to be trained along, going on together so chearfull and dextoriously, that they may well be said, to be creatures fit and apt for portage. Other creatures haue their nestes and retreats a part by themselves, so that (oftentimes) they necessarily war against them of their kinde, for their nestes and lodgings: whereas the like silly Ants haue but one roome or receipt for them all in general, without any diuided chambers or Parlors for particular persons: by which meanes, they maineaineloue and friendship one with another, therein giuing vs a familiar example, to vse the like sociable vertue as they do.

Moreouer, the industry which they declare in their Cae or roome, is a matter maruellous; because if it bee possible for them, they will alwayes make their dwelling nere to a riuer, or some little running brooke, and plant the earth which they bring to the mouth of their caue, to serue as a rampier against rough winter, as fearing least water should winne entrance: & within the entry, they winde and turned diuers wayes, to the end, that their maine abiding should not easly be found, & the mouth or doore is very narrow, in regard of the spacioufnesse within.

Beside, they haue three roomes or stages within their Cae; one whereof is for the males, the second for the Females, where they produce their yong ones, for there are male and female of these small Creatures. In the third stage they make their Garner, wherein they bestow their food and prouision, according as Aristotle affirmeth. Vsing their store so measurably, as they neuer haue any want of vituals. And because the most part of their purveyance is Corn, to preferue it in such sort, that moysture may not make it sprout; they bite and nibble the Graine within the midst, where the sprouting yf-fueth forth; a thing most admirable and miraculous in Nature, notwithstanding, Pliny, Ælianus, and many other good authors, do aouuch it to be certaine & true. If they finde their Come to bee wetre and moistned with winter raines, they haue a naturall vnderstanding, to dry and refresh it againe in the Sunne, to preferue it from putrifying: so that the little poore Ant is neuer idle either day or night, for then she vseth the helpe of the Moone, when the Sunne-shine is denied her, which ensueth from incomparable prudence.

Such as haue written on this argument, and daily experience confirms the same, that the Ants are well inured to these labors; for they dayly come abroad from their Caves, to bring home fresh and new nourishment. And after that such nouell prouisions is brought in, whether theyr knowledge consisteth in the smelling it, or by a naturall instinct giuen from God, enstructing how to order and vse it, all come forth together, to refresh both their olde and new prouision, and following theyr guides in great crowds, conuey their store in all by one way, without the least iniury one to another: because in doing a kinde of courtesie, they make way for each others free passage, and sometimes walk on in couples together.

Now here is a further matter to be obserued, what order they keepe, when they come to the place, where they do charge themselves with their prouision. For some get the Come out of the straw; Others, carry it to the Cae, at the entrance whereof, there stand diuers other readie to receiue it, and so conuey it into the garner, euery one doing his duty according vnto his office and degree. And when they carry a Pease, a Chiche, or some other grain, more weighty then a graine of Wheat; three or foure vndertake the burthen, or so many as the case requireth, pacing on very gently together, without any crowding or disorder.

And if by chance they come vnto any place,

As if in Lib. de anim. 4. 176

The manner of carrying their prouision to the garner, & in what manner all order they are helping one to another.

place, inkefome or offense to their passage, the order is admirable which they obserue therein. For, some raise vp the load aloft, and others labour to thrust it forward, by stepping vnder to ease theyr fellowes: and if any meete them accidentally by the way, they all lay helpe to get home the burthen. And being come vnto the Caves entrance, if the graine be greater then the mouth thereof will admitte: they cut it in quarters, and so carry it into the Granary. In the while of this their busie toile, others are not negligent, in bringing home purveyance beside: so that wee may say (in conclusion of this point) all generally labour for the Weale-publique.

After their prouision is thus made, and their Garner well stored for the season, they fortifie and fast close vp the Cae, against the iniurie of winters stormes and rain: nor shing themselves all the while, with their plenty formerly brought in. Which naturall instinct is denied vnto all other Animals, man onely excepted: and yet there are many men, scarcely provided for a morrowes necessity. Moreouer, that the Ant maketh a double prouision for her age, is very considerable; for, according as Virgil saith: she prouideth for her aged yeeres, which ensueth to her by instinct of Nature, preparing still (euery yeare) for a following Winter, implying the Winter of her age.

This creature, hath also a naturall inclination, quite contrary to all brutish behaviour. For, she seemeth to haue some knowledge of God, and a kinde of religious vnderstanding. For as Pliny and Ælian do both affirme, they obserue Religiously certain festiual daies, as all the new Moones; a matter somewhat hard to bee credited, and yet possible neuertheless. The same authors say also, that they haue a naturall kind of charitie amongst them; because they will bury their dead, euin in meere compassion.

Cleanthes reporteth an admirable history, which by Ælian is maintained to be true. Cleanthes being a learned Philosopher, and sitting one day by an Ant-hillocke, to consider their naturall disposition: he espied two Ants bearing a thirde Ant that was dead, and comming nere to the Caves entrance, which belonged to the other dead; they set downe theyr load, and two other Ants came out of the Cae to them, seeming to confer & talke together by outward action. The last two returned into the caue againe, & brought fourth a little Worme betweene them, which the other receiued of them, as in payment for their paines, and returned backe, leaving the dead Ants bodie, that they of the Cae might giue it buriall, the which they presently did, so soone as the other were departed.

Vndoubtedly, it is a matter maruellous, that these creatures, being so small, as some of them can scarcely be seene, should thus serue as an example to me, to study peace and concord, and to be good house-keepers, laborious, prouident, and charitable; aptly therein enstructing the spirit: & vnderstanding of men; not reputing the Ant to bee so vnbeneficiall, as Plinie did, though it produce no hony or other food. Yet it is greatly auailable for the health of man, especially her Egges, which (as Pliny saith) being incorporated with the milke of a Bitch, healeth all paine and anguish in the ears. If they be beaten in powder, they make an Vnguent, which mixed with salt, taketh away all pimples and pusshes in the face: and Ants beeing eaten, dooth cure all diseases incident vnto the eyes.

Neuertheless, because this poore Animal feeds on graine, herbes, and fruits of trees, onely to conserue her selfe in her being, and to perpetuate her generation, whereby some damage may redounde to the fields: reuengefull man, finding himselfe offended at so little harme, hath inuented a thousand wayes to worke her death. For (as Pliny saith) the power of Origan, incorporated with sulphure, and a little vnkilled Lime, killeth Ants. He saith moreover, that damming vnto the mouth of their Cae with Sea-mud and Althes, they can neuer get forth. Notwithstanding, there is not any thing more proper to kil Ants, then the Hearb called Heliotropium. And beside, Aulicenne studied in a whole Chapter, how to be the death of this poore Creature, taking as much paines therein, as if it had beene to expel the plague, or the feauer quartane.

and the people fear them as they do Lyons, according to the testimony of diuers Authors. And some say, that in digging and turning vp the earth, they throwe vp great quantities of gold; which the country people go to gather, when these dreadful Ants are retired; which they dare not do, if they but sent them in the fields. For sometimes, these Ants hauing windeed those seekers for Gold, rush forth vpon them, and kill as many as they can meete withall.

And they haue no other means to seek for gold with safety, but by comming thither mounted vpon light Camels, for their better expedition in flight. And if (by mischance) these Ants do winde those Gold-finders; they haue some pece of flesh hanging about them, which sodainly they let fall, and so escape away. Finally, it seemeth a thing monstrous, that our Ants should be charged with wings: Neuertheless, there is a common Prouerbe, saying: To the damme of the Ant, wings are proper. Wherby it appeareth, that some further meaning is hid therein: because such creatures as haue Wings, the winds will carrie them whether they please.

CHAP. XXVIII.

From whence it proceedeth, that some men liue long, and others farre lesser while. And what complexion is the best for liuing long. Also how we are to vnderstand the place, where it is said, that The dayes of a man are numbred.

THE Apostle S. Paul sayeth, That all men are subiect once to dye, and therein all men are equal and alike. Notwithstanding, there is a difference in the termes of life; because some liue long, and other lesse space. Neuertheless (as Job saith) The time of our life is compassed, and no man can passe the boundes which God hath limited and determined to our life. These things then standing thus (as in truth they do) it is not ill or amisse, to vnderstand that which causeth the life of man; wherefore one liueth longer then another; what complexion is most proper for long life: and lastly, how it ought to be vnderstood, when it is said, that our dayes are counted and determined, being no way able to passe on further, which are points sufficiently obscure, and comprehended by few people.

To vnderstand therefore the cause of long life, it behooueth vs to presuppose in the first place, that the life of man, and maintenance of this his humane bodie, consisteth in the concord and harmony of the foure Elementary qualities whereof it is composed, as namely heate, colde, moisture, and drinesse. But expressly in the proportionable harmony of heate and moisture, which Aristotle well declareth: who onely maketh mention of the conueniency of these two qualities, for the support and continuance of man. In like manner, we perceiue by experience, that man hath little care of his owne failing, so long as he keepeth his naturall heate: for that heate is the principall instrument, to conserue the vegetatiue soule.

Now, to speake vprightly, the life of man consisteth in nothing else, then in maintaining the instruments and organes of the soule; among which, naturall heat (by right) holdeth the prime place: for this heate is so necessary to support mans body, as whensoever it is failing, the soule is constrained to forsake the body, & giue a period to the life of man. And because this naturall heate holdeth of fire, which (of his owne nature) consumeth whatsoever it meeteth withall: it was truly conuenient, that another contrarie qualitie should be opposed against it, for conseruation of the inferiour bodies. Vpon which occasion, God placed the radicle or naturall humor, with this naturall heate, onely to nourish and maintaine it, euen as fire feedeth it selfe by Oyle. And, in regard that this radicle humor consumeth and diminisheth it selfe daily, to supply & defend it, it was necessary, that all Creatures should browe and feede, and that by means thereof, the humor (being the cause of digestion) should supply the naturall defect.

But seeing that (according to Aristotle) the humor which is cause of digestion, is neuer so perfect as the radicle and naturall, although it serueth much for maintenance: of necessity the radicle humor decayeth cayeth it selfe dayly (for the accidentall humor, cause of digestion, is neuer so perfect as the radicle, which vanishesth away) and by this meanes of intirely vanishing, naturall heate looseth it selfe, and the body takes ending. For, if the humor radicle, and cause of digestion, were so perfect as the naturall humor vanished away, a man should liue infinitely, according as Diuines say. Who maintain, that the propriety of the Tree of life, which God placed in the terrestriall Paradise, consisted in this principally: that eating the fruite thereof, it should re-establish the radicle humor, that else would vanish & be lost. From hence it ensued, that this tree was prohibited to Adam and Eue, after they were excluded out of terrestriall Paradise. For, if our first Parents had kept themselves in their original righteousness; they and their successors, feeding on the fruite of that tree, had liued eternally in the flower of their time, without euer tasting corruption, or old age: vntill such time as God had glorified their bodies, without enduring the passage of death. But seeing that Humane Linage hath lost this prerogative by sinne, which brought death into the world; it is no wonder, if this defect sheweth it selfe in vs all.

Life lasteth longer or lesse, according to the proportion and temperature of the radicle humor.

Life dieth, losing her companion heate and moisture.

Proceeding nowe to our former purpose, I say, that life endureth more or lesse, according as the radicle humor is concordant and proportionable: for they in whom these qualities are most temperate and best proportioned, liue longest, and not such as abound in those qualities. From thence it cometh, that wee see many small animals, who haue least heat and humidity, to liue (neuertheless) longer then they that are of bigger and greater bulke, and abound more in the saide qualities; which likewise cometh so to passe in trees, as well as in men. So that we may say, and say truly, that long life consisteth in the temperature and iust proportion of heate and moisture: which wanting their kind companion life, dissolueth it selfe. For when heate oueraboundeth humidity, it consumeth the body in little time, as may be discerned in cholericke men. Where contrariwise, by excessiue humiditie, heate feedeth it selfe to be quenched, as in Flegmaticke persons it happeneth in the same manner. Neuertheless, we do not by these examples vnderstand, that hee must also faile, who hath as much of the moyst humor as of heat, because it is necessary, that a proportion should be obserued therein: that is to say, heate to exceed humiditie proportionably. For, one thing beeing agent, hath no great vertue in working on the other, if it surmount not the part patient. And this did Aristotle covertly declare, when he said: Among those two qualities before remembered, there ought to be a little coldnes mingled, to moderate the heat of the radicle fire, to the end, it may not wholly consume the humor naturall. And drinesse also is as requisite, to dry up the radicle humor, so that it may not extinguishe the naturall fire. As we often see to happen in young children, that dy by ouermuch humidity; notwithstanding, among these foure qualities, heate and moisture are held for the principall, as being vitall complexions; & causing life. As for the humors cold and dry, although they serue greatly to the conseruation of life: yet neuertheless these two qualities are held for the doore & entrance to death. Because cold is enemy to heate, wherein principally consisteth the point of life: and drinesse is opposite and contrary to moisture, which yet is the nourisher of naturall heat. According as wee see in aged people, who grow to be colde and dry, when they draw nere to death; as chiefly in dead bodies, which ordinarily are dry and cold. A man then (according to the good temperature of heate) ought also to temper his complexion by these foure qualities; and that in such sort: as, to maintaine his heate in the first place, and humidity next after, causing cold and dry to do seruice, according to their offices & quarters. By which meanes, they that finde not themselves thus proportionably tempered, are naturally of short life: thus then you see the causes of long life.

Now remaineth that somewhat should be saide, concerning the best complexion of all other, for the maintenance of long life. First of all then is to be noted, that of the foure complexions, as Choler, flegme Blood, & Melancholy, blood is the best, to help him in the length of life; for blood is hot & moist, which qualities are the aptest to prolong life. But the humidity must not be watry, but airy, being hot & moist, and so the sanguine complexion, participating of some temperate heat and moisture sufficient to nourish the heat, it is most proper of all the complexions to make long life. As for the Cholericke complexion, it is of lesse continuance, because the vivacity and force of his fire, and also of the heate, cannot long endure with his drynesse. The Phlegmaticke & watry complexion, cannot be digested by heate, in regard of his excessive humidity: & therefore falleth easily into corruption, which (in the end) procureth death.

The melancholy complexion, being earthie, abridgeth life by his coldnesse & drought, which are qualities contrary to heate and moisture: and therefore it is not to be wondered at, though they shorten life by over-abounding in some bodies. Notwithstanding, if Choller mingle it self with Phlegme, and that it surmounteth proportionably the Phlegme; that Complexion also is very apt to maintaine long life. When likewise blood surpasseth Melancholy in a good proportion, that complexion is good: for the heate and humidity of the blood do beguile themselves, with the cold and driness of melancholy. Whereby we may gather, that there are compoundd Complexions, which are much better then the Sanguine simple, to preferre and prosper the length of life.

By that which formerly hath bene said, wee may perceiue, that the life of man is limited by power and vertue of his Complexion, and by the proportion of Elementary qualities: so that the diversitie of proportions doe cause the diversitie of termes of life in man. And some hold, that a man may live so long as naturall heate lasteth, and the radical humor giueth maintenance. Also, whereas some say, that the life of man hath his limit, beyond which, it is impossible for him to passe; it is to be noted, that although the complexion and naturall vertue of man, may supply and maintaine vnto the latest point; yet notwithstanding, of a thousand men, hardly one attaineth to that point, because there are so many disasters which happen accidentally, or else by some disorder; that the most part die, before nature faileth in them, either by hunger, pestilence, poison, gourmandize, whoredome, bad victuals, or by diseases, caused thorow infinit excesses in me, by them daily committed, and so the true naturall terme of mans life is, when nature faileth, being the vaterly impossible for them to passe that point.

Thus are we to vnderstand that place in Iob, where it is sayde: Lord, thou hast established the bounds of mans life, which is impossible for him to go beyond. Whereby may clearly be discerned, that a man may verily easily shorten his life, but not lengthen it. So that wee see many of good complexion, and likely to liue a World of years: who neuertheless are of short life, by some exteriour cause, which hastens on the expiration of their daies. Notwithstanding, that passage in Iob may be otherwise vnderstood, in regard of Gods preference or foreknowledge, who giueth to euery one his terme of life, be it by his naturall complexion, or by some other means, which he hath assigned to the life of man. And because there is nothing hidden from the wisdom of God (for, hee knoweth all the causes and accidents that can happen to man) it is impossible for man, to haue any power of lengthening his life, beyond the ordination of God; although there were contingent causes.

In this respect it may be said, that there are two termes in the life of man, one whereof dependeth vpon the harmony & proportion of the Elementary qualities; and the other is according to the preordination and presence of God. Between which termes, there is onely this difference, that a man may come or proceede so farre as the first, and yet without passing it; but all men attaine to the second. And although that (by course of nature) some one may passe on to his second terme: yet notwithstanding, there is not any that can go beyond it; as the like may be sayde of other creatures and plants.

Concerning the naturall hermonie of Elementary qualities, supposing mans body.

peare good to vnderstand, at what times the naturall hermonie of the Elementary qualities (which support the body of man) began to grow into decadence; which, from the beginning of the world, euen to this instant day, hath kept alwayes in diminution, concerning the temperature of Complexions, with the quality of fooode, which do conserve and establish life, and yet mans life daily waxing to be lesse and lesse in continuance.

In the first world, men liued eight hundred and nine hundred yeares, according as we haue already declared in our former volume, and the eight Chapter; where is amply related the yeares of our ancient forefathers, farre differing from ours. Our present intention and purpose, is to speake concerning the decadence of the age of man; a matter very remarkable, & whereof the sacred Scripture doth make mention. For it is written, that the first declining of mans yeares or age, was ruled, and limited to an 120. yeares, immediately after the flood, according as we read in Genesis, where the Lord God himselfe said, The life of man shall be an hundred and twentie yeares. Not that hee saith, that a man cannot out-live six score yeares; but as if that the rest or over-plus of his life, will be but wearisome and insupportable old age.

Abraham, who was long time after the deluge, liued an hundred seuentie and five yeares. Isaac was an hundred and thirty yeares olde, when he went down into Egypt, where hee yet liued ten yeares longer. And so of many other to be alleged, that liued many happy yeares. Since then, the life of man became shortened againe, euen in the time of Dauid, who speaketh thus in one of his Psalmes. The dayes of our age is threescore yeares and ten, & though men be so strong, that they attain to foure score yeares yet is their strength then, but labour and sorrow, so soone it passeth away, and we are gone. Now a dayes wee see, that such as are of feeble Complexion, passe not aboute five and fifty yeares, and (very strong men) but three score & five (I meane in lusty disposition, for operations and actions to be in men) & therefore the life of man in these our daies, lasteth not the twentieth part, of those men liuing in the worlds first Age, and howe much shorter they will be, God onely knoweth.

The ancient Philosophers labored verily seriously, in seeking a reason for this difference and decadence in mens yeares. Some attributed it to: the celestiall influences. Others alleged farre contrarie reasons, as Plinie, and many more besides, that limit the life of man to fixe score yeares. Berosus alloweth no more then an hundred and seauenteene; Petofirus, an hundred twenty six: but Censorinus (following the opinion of the Philosopher Estius) assigneth a man to liue but foure score yeares. Dioscorides, imitating the Egyptians, and speaking of the life of man, saith: It is long or short, according vnto the posse or weight of his heart. Euen as wee haue more at large deliuered, in the precedent part to this Volume, where manie reasons are alleged, making to this purpose, without presuming into any secret, concerning the will and prouidence of God.

In the first place, God ordaind all creatures to eate and drinke, for maintenance of the naturall and radical humor, granting them means also, to perpetuate their feuerall kindes, by the acte of generation. But, as eating & drinking is not sufficient enough, to re-establish the radical humor, which diminisheth and vanishest away of it selfe daily, so that life may likewise be lost as soone as it is: so it is not possible also, to yeeld a body by the act of generation, of such compleat perfection, as others were, that liued in the first age of the world. For the vertue and power of the radical complexion (which is called the principal complexion) is mightily decayed: & from hence it ensueth, that the life of man became abridged and shortened daily more and more.

Another reason, which neuertheless dependeth vpon the former, is this; that the food wherewith man sustaineth himselfe, hath lost, and cometh far short of such vertue, as it had at the beginning of the world. So that it is vterly impossible, to haue mankind in such bodily perfection, as the men of the first world had. And therefore the vertue of complexion failing in man, and the hermonie of the Elementary qualities being adulterated and bastardized, and fooode likewise decayed in goodness; it is no maruel, if our present life be become so much shortened. And though those times then obserued, euen as an ordinarie limitation to the life of man: yet notwithstanding, diuers personnes (among them) haue bene noted to liue longer then some other, by being of a strong and good complexion; and in regard it pleased God that it should be so, whose hand is neuer tied, much lesse subiect to any law or limit. Neuerthelesse, because we may not complain, concerning our little time of life, and also to comfort vs in the breuety thereof: I will set downe certaine examples of some men, that haue exceeded others in length of life, though not speaking of any in the first age, because such as I purpose to discourse on, liued long since that large extent of life came to be thortned.

Arpachshad, Sonne of Sem, and Nephew to Noah, liued two hundred yeares after the flood; and yet notwithstanding, he attained to four hundred and thirty yeares before he dyed. Shelah also his sonne, liued four hundred and three yeares. Heber, the son of Shelah, (of whom the Hebrewes took their name) liued four hundred sixty and seven yeares. In his time happened the confusion of tongues: but he safely preferred the Hebrew which was the first language of the worlde) because he consented not to the proud building of Babels Tower.

Terah, the Father of Abraham, liued two hundred and five yeares, and Abraham liued an hundred, seauentie and five yeares; as also Isaac an hundred seauenty five yeares, after which time, the life time of men beganne greatly to diminish. Neuerthelesse, Moses liued six score yeares, and Aaron six score and three yeares: Sara, that ancient matrone (so much renowned) liued sixe score and feuen yeares, and that valiant woman Indith who smote off the head of Holofernes, liued an hundred and five yeares, as wee may reade in the sacred Scriptures, which render true testimony of all that hath hitherto bin said.

Now, as concerning prophane Histories, many are recorded to liue long time: as Nestor, who liued so faire and large an extent of life, that our reuerend predeceffors, when they desired the long life of any man; they wished, that hee might liue Nestors yeares, hee being three hundred yeares old, when he went with the Greekes to Troy. For Homer sayeth: Prince Nestor being about three hundred yeares of age, went to succour the Greekes against the Trojans, with a potent army by sea.

The same is also auouched by Ouid, Iuuenall, and Tibullus, with many other Authours besides. Arganthonius, King of Andalusia (anciently called Turdania) liued an hundred and fiftie yeares, according as Strabo affirmeth, from the Poet Anachreon: Neuerthelesse Herodotus, and Silius Italicus, a Spanish Poet do auouch, that this Prince liued the space of three hundred yeares.

Valerius Maximus, and Pliny also say, that he reigned fourescore yeares, and liued sixe score yeares. Pliny likewise maketh a large Narration, of certaine Kings in Arabia, and many other (as well men as women) that liued multitudes of yeares: but because matters secht so farre off, may raise doubt and suspition, I will insert other histories, which are maintained to be true and certaine.

Valerius Maximus Cornutus, did liue an hundred yeares, at it is auouched by Valerius Maximus, hauing bene sixe times Consul of Rome: and further saith, That there were sixe and forty yeares betweene his first Consulship, and the last yeare of his honor in the same dignity, and that he liued the rest of his age in abledisposition, so that hee could make good vse of all the dignities and Offices imposed vpon him.

Stephanus the Romane, being farre entered into yeares, serued as dancer before the Emperour Othanius, in those Secular pastimes which he ordained in Rome: and seuentie three yeeres after, hee danced againe in the sports of the Emperour Claudius, and yet liued long time afterwards. Titus Fullinius, borne in Bologna, liued an hundred and fiftie yeeres, as appeared by the numbering and accounts, made from five yeares to five yeares in elder times, & wherein the Emperour Claudius tooke great paines to be informed in the truth, for he was very curious in such matters.

And, not to estrange or barre women, from the benefite of our instant discourse, but to blesse them also with hope of long life; it is obserued that Terentia, the wife of Cicero, liued an hundred and seuenteen yeares. Claudia, the Wife of Offellus, attained to an hundred and fiftene yeares of age, hauing had fiftene male children,

Pliny reporteth a matter very admirable, and yet true, that in the accounts and numberings made by Titus and Pepasian, then Censors, there liued three men at Perma, each of them being aged six score yeares, and two that were sixe score and ten yeares old; beside a woman, that was aged sixe score and twelue yeares. He saith moreover, that in Romania, there were foure and fifty men, each of them being an hundred yeares olde: fifty seauen men being aged an hundred and tenne yeares: foure men, aged an hundred and thirtie yeares: and other foure men, who were severally aged sixe score & fifteen yeares: beside foure men more, each of them being seauen score yeares old, a thing not vsuall, and hardly to be seene in these daies of ours.

But leauing Italy, let vs looke vpon some further strangers, that liued long. Gorgius Leontinus, a Philosopher greatly renowned, who liued (in very healthfull disposition) more then an hundred yeares. Hee hauing attained to an hundred and seuen yeares, was demanded, why he tooke so great delight to abide in the worlde; where to he thus replied, I thanke God, I neuer did any thing, whereby I deserued to bee blamed in mine Age. An answer very excellent and singular, for such as are able to make or speake it truly.

Seneca the Philosopher, borne at Coraduba, liued an hundred & fourteen yeeres. The famous Appollonius Thyaneus hadde passed an hundred yeares before he dyed. Democritus, by the testimony of Diogenes, liued an hundred and nine yeares; and dyed, hauing neuer felt Feauer, nor any other disease. Galen, the Prince of Physitians, liued (in absolute and able disposition) an hundred and forty yeares: and dyed by defect of Nature, without the sence of any sicknesse.

* Attila, King of the Goths, who (in his time) was most cruell, and of great power liued an hundred and foure yeares; seruing as a scourge to mankind, and making lamentable waste and spoile by his warres, and infinite cruelties. Masmissa, King of Guinea, liued fourescore and seauentene yeares, hauing reigned threescore. This Prince neuer had his head couered, neither from the Sun, winds, or raines; or greatest Tempests, but continued so (bare-headed) to his very latest dayes: marching alwayes on foote in his Armour, and as lightly as the youngest souldier in his Armie. When hee was fourescore yeeres of age, he begate a Son, and left (after his death) foure and forty sonnes, by him begotten.

As for Hermites and ancient Fathers, many are recorded to liue long, onely by their abstinence; as Saint Paule, the first Hermit, who liued sixe score yeares; Saint Anthony the Egyptian Hermit, who liued an hundred and fifty yeeres; and Creonius (his Companion) an hundred. Now a dayes, wee finde few, or none at all, to liue so long, for (day by day) the life time of man groweth shorter and shorter; whereby it appeareth, that the end of the world approacheth neere. Neuerthelesse God hath declared his wonderful workes in all times; for in the life of the Emperour Conrade, which was in the yeare one thousand, one hundred, and forty, or nere thereabout, a man dyed, who had serued the Emperour Charlemaigne in his warres, so large a time, that this man was founde to haue liued three hundred and threescore yeares, and was called Iohn of Time. Which name was given him (as I thinke) in regard of his great age; and I am halfe perswaded also, that of him was raised the old Prouerbe, when men commonly saide, Iohn Iohn, frust thou in God.

For these two Princes, being too extreemly pursued by the hatred of a Stepmother, and no way pittied or supported by the King their father (escaping many traines and machinations, of poisoning, murdering, and diuers other dangers by her daily deuised and put in practise against the) were forced to forsake their native abiding, & fly to an Island within the Rhine: where Battus determining to make his stay, called it Battania, after his owne Name; and that is (in plainer vnderstanding) Holland.

Battania is Holland.

Zelandus, not liking to liue so neere, or with his brother (least pursue should surprize them both, and reuenge there fasten which in more desperate place they had auoyded) he trauelled on to the vttermost confines of the Rhine, and liking there to set downe his rest, imitated his Brothers example (in styling the country) and called it Zeland.

Zeland, named by Zelandus.

Concerning their building of Cities, Townes, Castles, and Forts, which afterward came to be ruined & defaced againe by warres with the Romans, Saxons, Gauls, Danes, &c. or to what order of life the people disposed themselves, and through how many and infinite encumbrances (from their original) they passed, for no meane store of yeares together: these are matters merely exempt from our intended breuity, and may more amply be seen in the history at large, whereunto I refer any such desirous Reader, and borrowing fauour for so large a leap, I instantly proceeded to the year, 863. when Holland first became to be an Earledome.

In the year before mentioned, Charles the Bald, King of France, at Bladell in the Prouince of Campaigne, hauing there (in his company) a generall assembly of his Princes and Barons, for consultation of many important matters; pleased to aduance the two sonnes of Count Hughen (who was Vnckle to the King) for their great deseruings, and for the farther encouragement of the like vertuous minded Gentlemen: Walger, who was the eldest sonne, he made Earle of Tessierbando; and Thierry the yongest son, or Theodor, as some tearme him, being formerly called Thierry of Aquaine, he made earle of Holland.

This gift of the kings, especially that to Thierry, was much withstood by the Friselanders, as scorning to be commanded by any new Lord or Ruler: wherefore they consulted with the Hollanders, and a plot was laid to expell this new Earle. But it proved to no effect, for the king comming thither (in person) with a powerful army, made such an example on the Ring-leaders in this rebellion, that the rest (in very great humility) submitted themselves, casting their Weapons not onely at the Kings feete, but likewise at the Earles, and (vpon pardon) they vowed their continuall bounden duty to Thierry. His authority was then further strengthened, in the year eight hundred sixty eight, by the letters Patents of King Charles, as also by them of Lewes King of Germany, confirming him to bee Earle of Holland, Zeland, and Lord of Friseland.

This Thierry married Genna, or Ienna, daughter to Pepin the Bald, king of Italy, sonne to the Emperor Charlemagne. Hee worthily foyled the Danes, that then possessed the Towne of Vrieht, the Wiltes and the Slaues, disabling them from any further footing in Holland, which made them presume to meddle in Zeland, but thence they were repulled likewise. By which meanes, he remained afterward in peace, beautifying his Countries both with faire buildings and good Lawes. He dyed very old, hauing reigned 40. yeares, and after him succeeded

2. Thierry his son, second of that name, Earle of Holland, Zeland, and Lord of Friseland, who married with Hildegard, daughter vnto King Lewes of France, the Stammerer, and Sister to King Charles the Simple. The Friselanders did twice reuolt from their obedience, and would not allow Earle Thierry to be their Lord, slaying very many of them that obeyed the Earle, waiting, spoiling, and burning all the way as they went. But at length they were iustly repayed for their insolencie, and such a slaughter was made of the Frisons (without any mercy) that few or none of them returned home to their dwellings. Afterward, he forced them to make the doores of entrance into their houses, so lowe and narrow, that they must stoope verie lowe before they could get in; and this he did, to make them the more humble and seruile, receiuing a new Oath of allegiance of them. And hauing reigned about fiftie yeares, being then aged 88. yeares old, he dyed, leauing two sonnes behind him, the eldest whereof (being named Egbert) became Archbishop of Treurs, and Arnold his yongest son succeeded him.

A dreadfull Comet, eclipsing the sun and the moon.

3. Arnold, or (as others will haue it) Arnulphus, yongest son to Earle Thierry, followed in rule as his fathers successor: but he held the Earledomes of Holland, Zeland, and Lordship of Friseland, no longer of the crown of France, but of Orto the third, Emperour; and so became in fee to the Empire. A very fearefull Comet appeared in his time, with strange Ecclypses both of the Sunne and Moone, being as red as blood, and terrible Earthquakes: a fire also fell from heauen, in similitude like an huge Tower, burning for a long time: after which ensued so violent a pestilence, that the liuing died burying the dead. The Frisons reuolting again from obedience, made all his reigne a continuall warfare, and the Armies (on either side) meeting neere vnto Winckell, so dreadfull a battaile was fought betwene them: that the Hollanders sustained the worst, Count Arnold being there slaine, and a great number of his cheefe Nobility. This battaile was fought the eighteenth of October, the morrow after S. Lamberts day, in the year 993. So this Earle Arnold, hauing reigned 59 yeares, and being thus vnfortunatly slaine, was buried by his Father and Grandfather, in the Abbey of Egmont.

4. Thierry, third of that name, and son to Count Arnold, succeeded as fourth Earle of Holland, Zeland, and Lord of Friseland. Being desirous, to reuenge his Fathers death vpon the Frisons: hee was much impeached therein by Adelbold, Bishop of Vrieht, against whom (neuertheless) hee prevailed in two, long and cruell battailes, in the year, 1018, and (with great slaughter of the Frisons) brought them vnder obedience to his yongest son Florin, whom he made Lord of them. This Earle Thierry, liuing afterward in verie peacefull dayes, vnderooke a Pilgrimage to Ierusalem, with the Lord of Arckell, his loyall subiect; who died at Ierusalem, & was there very honourably buried by Thierry. After whose return home, and some yeares passed in peace with his Wife and Children, hauing reigned 46. yeares, hee died in Anno 1039. and was buried by his father in the Abbey of Egmont.

Adelbold Bishop of Vrieht.

5. Thierry, fourth of that Name, was the fifth Earle of Holland, Zeland, & Lord of Friseland, after the decease of Thierry his Father. In a Tournie of Princes and Lords, performed (for pleasure) in the Citie of Liege, it was this Earles hard hap, to kill a Brother of the Bishops of Cullen and Liege: whereby ensued such discorde and molestation, that after many aduentures of reuenge, undertaken by the Germane Gentlemen, albeit therein they sustained much losse of men, the Earle was shot into the thigh with a poisoned dart, of which wound hee dyed the fifteenth of May, one thousand foure hundred and eight, after he had gouerned nine yeares, and was buried by his father, in the Abbey of Egmont. He was neuer married, and therefore left not any child to succede him.

The Bishops of Cullen and Liege.

6. Florin, who (as you haue heard before) was Earle of Friseland, now after his brothers death, became the sixth Earle of Holland and Zeland. The former mishap at Liege, could not as yet be forgotten by the Bishops of Cullen and Liege; but they would needs prosecute fresh reuenge on Count Florin, who being a man of vndated spirit, defeated his enemies in two attempts. Once by a cunning stratagem, causing ditch and pitfalls to be made in south Holland, couering them with straw and grasse, so that they could not be easily discerned. At this time a bloody battell being fought betwene betweene them, there was forty thousand of the Earles enemies slaine, beside twenty six thousand more, who were drowned and smothered in those ditches, Anno Domini 1058. The second foyle of his aduersaries, happened foure yeeres after this, when the Hollanders (putting the Germanis to flight) returned with rich spoiles, and great store of prisoners; this was in the yeare of our Lord 1062. Yet was it this Earle ill fortune, to be afterward slayne vnarmed, as he fate vnder an Elme, taking the ayre, his enemies preuailing by this aduantage. He had ruled in Holland foureteeen yeeres, and in Friseland 21. yeeres, and lyeth buried at Egmont.

7. 8. Gertrude, widow to Earle Floris, in regarde that Thierrie her sonne was in his nonage, gouerned those Countries in his right. And in the yeare of our Lord, 1063. she re-married with Robert the Frizon (sonne to Baldwine of Lisse de Bucke, Earle of Flanders) with the good liking of all the States and Nobilitie. Hee also was made Guardian of young Earle Thierrie, and (had by this Gertrude) three somes, Robert, surnamed the Yong (who went with Godfrey of Bullen to the holie Land, and was (after his fathers decesse) Earle of Flanders;) Philip, father to William of Ist, and Baldwin Bishop of Teraanne, beside three daughters also, which he had by the said Gertrude. This Robert was called the Frizon, not in regarde of his birth, but of his bigge stature, strength and courage. For, hauing preuailed against the Frizons, and hearing of his Brothers death, Baldwine de Mons, Earle of Flanders; hee layd clayme to the sayde Earle dome, and (notwithstanding the opposition of Richild, widow to Earle Baldwine: by means of the Flemings, he ouerthrew the King of France in battell, and the with her sonne Baldwine, remaying satisfied with the Countie of Hennault, Robert became quickly Earle of Flanders. For eight yeares space, hee carried himselfe with great wisdom and valour, and dying in the yeare of our Lord 1077. was buried in the Cannons Church, founded by himselfe at Cassell. *Gertrude*s time of rule, by her selfe, and *Robert*s after, are reckoned as two seuerall gouernements.

9. Godfrey, surnamed the crooke-backed Duke of Lorraine, in this time of young Earle *Thierrie*s minority, was made an instrument (in regard of the former quarrel of Count Floris, and the Bishops of Cullen and Liege; as yet not reuenged to their mindes) to suggest a false information to Henry the fourth, Emperour, whereby the sayde Godfrey became an vsurper of the young Earles right, for the space of foure yeeres. But as he was sitting on the draught to ease his body, a seruant of young Count Thierrie, did thrust a saueline vp into his fundament, whereof he died (not long after) at Maestrecht.

10. Thierrie, the fifth of that name, who (by crooke-backed Godfrey, and other strange oppositions) had long time bene debarred from quiet possession of his right; at length, by an absolute conquest of the Frizons, in two seuerall great battells, recovered all, and returned home as a Conqueror. Afterward, he married Whitilde, daughter to Fredericke, Duke of Saxonie, by whom he had a sonne and daughter: Floris that succeeded him, and Mathilde, married to the Duke of Orleanse. Earle Thierrie hauing gouerned fifteen yeeres, dyed, and was buried in the Abbey of Egmont.

11. Floris, the second of that name, & surnamed the Fat or Grosse, succeeded next after his father Thierrie: he greatly fauoured Church-men, whereby the Abbey of *Egmont*s revenues were largely increased. He being a man of very peacefull inclination, little or no disturbances happened in his time: but onely by the Frizons, who, for their rebelling, were seuerely punished, and forced to submit themselves to his mercy. This Floris married Petromilla, or Parnell, daughter to Didier, Duke of Saxonie, and sister to Lotharius the Emperour: By her he had three sons, Thierrie, Floris, called the Blacke Prince of Kemerlande; and Symon, also one daughter named Hadewicke, who was Countesse of Guelderes. Hauing gouerned his Countries very honourably, for the space of one and thirty yeeres; he dyed in the yeare of our Lord, one thousand one hundred thirty and three, and lyeth buried in the Abbey of Egmont.

12. Thierrie, sixt of that name, succeeded his father Floris, and was much molested by the Frizons, in regard that his brother Floris the Blacke Prince, enuying the happines and quiet of Thierrie, went and tooke part with them against him; vntill such (such time as the Emperour Lotharius (being theyr vncle) had reconciled them, and made them friends. Conrade beeing ioyned as competitor in the Empire with Lotharius, caused a fresh quarrell between Thierrie and the Bishop of Virecht, he ratifying the former graunt of Henry, which caused very long contention, and much blood to be shed on either side. Thierrie hauing gouerned his Countries of Holland, Zeland, and Friseland fortie yeeres, died in the yeare 1163. and lieth buried in the Abbey of Egmont.

13. Floris the third, eldest sonne of Thierrie, as heyre to his father, inherited his right in Holland, Zeland, and Friseland. The Frizons (pretending their former freedoms and imperiall liberties) made still their reuolutes from time to time, imboldened thereto by the often suggestions of Godfrey of Rhemen, Bishop of Virecht, who (as his predecessors had done before him) still questioned the Earledomes of Ostergo and Westergo in Friseland: but the Emperour Fredericke, went himselfe in person, and made an agreement between them. All which notwithstanding, much hurt was done on eyther side, as time and treachery fitted them with apt opportunity. A great controuersie happened betweene the Earles of Holland and Flanders, for the Isle of Walchren, and Count Floris (in trial of sight) became prisoner to the Earle of Flanders: who neuertheless vnto him princely, and they being accorded by the Archbishop of Cullen, and the Bishoppes of Liege, the great hole neare to the damme or sluice; was recovered with much adoe, by casting a dog-filing therinto, and speedy filling it vp with earth, whereon they named it Hondidam, that is, Dogs-sluice. This Earle Floris, assisting the Emperour Fredericke, Phillip King of France, Richard King of England, with many other Dukes, Christian Princes and Earles, at the siege of Damietta in Soria: fell there sicke in the Army, and died 1208. hauing gouerned his prouinces twenty seuen yeeres.

14. Thierrie the seventh, hearing of his fathers death in Palestine, succeeded as his heire in all his Earledoms. The whole time of his regiment, was in war and continuall combutions. First by his brother Loord William of Holland (who was with his father Floris in Palestine, and performed there many honourable seruices) thorow diuers disagreements that happened betwene them; notwithstanding, as many laboured reconcilings, and pacifications. Next, Baldwine Earle of Flanders, he was as molestation to him likewise, for the Isle of Walchren: besides the Frizons rebellions, and his trouble with the Bishoppes of Cologne and Liege, as also his imprisonment to the Duke of Brabant, and then the intrusion of the Bishop of Virecht, after which, ensued a peace and vnited amity on all sides. This Count Thierrie had no heires male, but two beautifull daughters, Adella, married to Henry of Guelderes, who dyed without anie Children, and Ada, meely married by her mother (after her fathers death) to Count Lewes of Loos, that so the gouernement might be disposed at her pleasure. In the yeare of our Lord, 1203. Earle Thierrie dyed, hauing gouerned his Countries thirteeen yeeres; and and lyeth buried in the Abbey of Egmont.

15. Ada, daughter to Earle Thierrie, was Countesse of Holland and Zeland, after her fathers death; which moued a great heart-burning in the Lordes and Gentlemen, that they should liue vnder a Woman, and a poore Earles command. Therefore, they sent into Friseland for Count William, protesting to assist him in attaining the gouernement of Holland. The young Countesse Ada was surprized in their first attempt, and her husband the Earle of Loos driuen to flight; who yet winne the Bishop of Virecht (by money and other promises) to ayde him, and by this means he had some final successe for a while. But the Countesse Ada dying without any children, Earle William was then the true and onely heyre to Holland and Zeland. In which right of his, hee went with his power against the Earle of Loos, and such was his successe, that the Women did beate his enemies with Distaves and Stones, they beeing glad to cast away their Armour for lightnesse, to saue themselves by flight; yet many were drowned in the Ditches, and a great number taken prisoners, with all the Earle of Loos Tents, Pauillions, Plate, Jewelles, and Munition, which Count William royally diuided amongst his Hollanders, remaying absolute Prince of Holland, Zeland, and Friseland.

ded rightfully in all his Earledoms, by the death of his Neece the yong Countesse Ada. He had some strife with Didier Bishop of Vtrecht, and Gerard Vander Are his brother: but (vpon certayne Articles) all displeasures were qualified. By his first wife Alix, daughter to the Earle of Guelderes, he had Floris, that next succeeded him, Otho Bishop of Vtrecht, William Lieutenant of Holland, and two daughters, the one was Abbesse at Rhynsbouurg, and the other at Delft. His second wife was named Mary, daughter to Edmond of Lancaster, son to Henry the third, King of England, by whom he had no issue. He gouerned 19. years; and dying, lies buried at Rhynsbouurg.

17 Floris the fourth, succeeded his father Count William in his Earledoms. He took great delight in luffs & Tournaments, and the Earle of Clermont proclayming a publike Triumph for all commers, at the Countesse his wives request (who greatly desired to see this Floris, of whom she had heard much commendation:) this honorable Erie of Holland, Zeland, &c. was there treacherously slaine, onely through iealous suspicion of the old Erie of Clermont, who was there likewise presently slaine himselfe, and the Countesse (grieving for this great mishap) died soone after. This Count Floris had a daughter named Machilde, or Margaret, as some call her, who was married to Count Herman of Henneberg. She despising a poore widow, that desired her almes vpon vrgent necessitie, holding in either arme a sweet yong child, both which, God had sent hir at one birth; gaue hir very reprochfull words beside, as that the could not be honest of her bodie; and (by her husband) haue two children lawfully begotten. The poore woman, grieving to be reiected in such extreame want and need, but much more, to heare her reputation so nearely touched, knowing her soule cleare from all dishonest deduction: made no further suite to the Lady, but (falling vpon her knees) appealed to God for defence of her Innocencie, and earnestly desired, that as she had coeined and borne those two infants lawfully by her husband; euen so, if euer that Ladie should be subiect to the custome of Women, that it would please him, to send her as many children at one birth, as there are daies in the year. Not long after, the Lady conceived with childe by her husband,

& (for her deliuerance) went into Holland, to visite the Earle her brother, taking vp lodging in the Abbey of religious women at Lojdunen, and grew so exceeding great, as the like had neuer before beene seene. When her time came, on the Friday before Palme-sunday, in the year of our Lord God 1276. shee was deliuered of 365. children, the one halfe being sonnes, and the other daughters; but the odde childe was an Hermaphrodite, and they were all well shaped and proportioned in their little members. These children were layd in two basins, and were all baptized by Gaydon, Suffragan to the Bishop of Vtrecht, who named all the sonnes Iohn, and the daughters Elizabeth, but what name hee gaue the Hermaphrodite, it is not recorded. They were no sooner baptized, but they all died, and the mother also. The two Basins are yet to be seene in the sayde Church of Lojdunen, and a memorie of them, both in Latine and Dutch. The Latine beginning thus: Margareta, Comitiss Hennebergia uxor, & Florentij Hollandia & Zelandia filia, &c. Vnderneath are these verses:

*En tibi monstrum & memorabile factum,
Quale nec a mundi condicione datum.*

This Count Floris, being so treacherously slaine, as yee haue heard before, had his body brought backe into Holland, by the Earle of Cleues, and other noble Lords, who buried it in the Abby of Rhynsbouurg; he hauing honourably and virtuously gouerned his Countreies twelue yeares. He left but one son named William, six yeares old, who was in the tutelage of his vnckle Otho, Bishop of Vtrecht, during his minority.

18 William, second of that name, succeeded his father Floris in all his dominions, being all the time of his vnder yeares, in the gouernement of Otho Bishop of Vtrecht his vnckle, who was a very worthy & careful Guardian to him. The Pope hauing deposed Fredericke the second, and Conrade his sonne from the Empire; the Princes Electors (in despite of the Pope) made this Earle William King of the Romans, and crowned him at Aix le Chapelle, he hauing then attained to the age of 20. yeares. A long & tedious trouble hapned, betwene him, & Margaret Countesse of Flanders, a very high-minded and proude woman, woman, for the country of Walchren, wherein, after a great foile and slaughter of the Flemings, (taking part with her) and imprisonment of her two sonnes (Guy and Iohn) she implored the aid of Charles Duke of Brion, against king William, & sped thereby no better then she had done before, but was glad in the end to seek reconciliation. This King William built the Pallace of the Earles of Holland, in the village of La Hage, or the Hague, where it is at this day, and a goodly Cloister at Harlem. At his warres in west Friseland, where he preuailed very successfully, he would needs (without any other assistance then himselfe) follow the rebells ouer the Ice, where his horse slipping in, himselfe almost drowned, and none neare to helpe him (but enemies of the Frisians, that lay secretly in ambush) they beate him downe with clubbes and staues, not knowing that it was the King, and so they slew him. But when afterward they tooke better notice of him, by his Target and Armes thereon emblazoned: in very hearty sorrow for their foule deed, they buried him secretly, in a poore house in the village of Hookswond, thinking to wipe out all remembrance of him. But his body was after found, and buried in the Abbey of Midlebourg, in the Isle of Walchren.

19 Floris the fift, son to King William, who was slaine so inhumanely; albeit hee was but sixe months old, yet he succeeded his father, his vnckle Floris being his Gouernor and Tutor. At 17. yeares of age, he went with an army against the euer-reuolting Frisians, and ouercame them at a village called Schellinckhou, very feuerly reuenging his fathers death on them, and (by building foure Castles in Friseland) brought them wholly vnder his obediēce. Afterward, Count Floris made a voyage into England, where a marriage was contracted, betwene Iohn, eldest son to Earle Floris, and Elizabeth, daughter to king Edward the first: Iohn being (not long after) sent into England, to accomplish the sayd marriage, where he remained in the Court of England, vntill his fathers vnfortunate death, which briefly was thus:

A knight liued in the Earles Court, named Gerard van Velson, who had bene a whole yeares space detayned in prison, & his brother beheaded, through certaine false suggestions whispered to the Earle, which (afterward) appearing to be a meere iniury: the Earle sought to repaire this wrong, with very especial fauors done to the knight, great aduancements, & would haue bestowed also his concubine in marriage on him. Which Gerard disclaining & replying, that he would not weare his cast shooes: the Earle rashly answered, that he should take his leauings, in despite of his hart. To preuent marriage with the Earles minion, the knight bestowed his affections else-where, and wedded a Ladie of great honour and beauty. Which when the Earle vnderstood, he pursued his former rash folly, to the price of his own life: Sending Gerard on an employment of much credit & respect, and wherewith he was not a little pleased, not doubting anie such wicked intention. The Earle came to Gerards house, vnder color of hospitality, and there (winning hert to priuate conference in her bed chamber) forcibly deflowered her, to performe his rash promise to her husband. At Gerards returne, and this foule wrong discovered, it was pursued with very bloody reuenge, by a resolute conspiracy sworn against his life: which albeit he had some warning of (by a paper deliuered him by a poore woman) yet his disaster being inuincible, a traine was laid for him as he rode a hawking, and twentie one wounds he receiued on his body, by the hand of the sayd Gerard. But hee and the rest of the conspirator escaped not vnpunished for they had their heads smitten off, and were then laid vpon wheeles; but Gerard was put (stark naked) into a Pipe sticke full of sharp nailes, and was so rowled vp and downe through all the streetes of Leyden. Then was he beheaded, & layd on a wheele, and al his kinned (to the ninth degree) put to death, and laid on wheeles.

20 After the wicked murder of Earle Floris the fift, committed by the Frisians, as hath bene declared: Iohn his only son (being then in England with King Edward his father in law) was next to succeed him as his rightfull heire. But before he could leaue England, some partialities and factions happened in Holland for the gouernement, which soone were qualified at Earle Iohns being there present, notwithstanding the subtil policie of Walart of Borselle, seizing the person of Earle Iohn, and Lady Elizabeth his wife, thinking to haue the gouernement of the sayd Earle, because, as yet, yet, he was but young. Earle Iohn preuailed against the Frizons, and the Bishop of Vrecht, and hauing gouerned his Countreies about foure yeares, hee fell sicke at Hirlem, and there dyed. He was the first of all the Earles of Holland, that died without children: wherefore in him failed the line masculine of the Earls from the dukes of Aquitaine, which Thierry, or Theodor, the first Earle of Holland, had continued 437. yeares. He was buried in the Abbey of Rhinibourgh, his widow Lady Elizabeth being caried back into England, where she was afterward married to the Earle of Oxford: So that by the death of Earle Iohn in this manner, those Countreies were deuolued to the Earles of Hennault, issuing by the mothers side frō the earles of Holland.

21 Iohn, the second of that name, called Iohn of Hennault (claiming his right from Alix, Sister to William king of the Romans) succeeded after Iohn, as Earle of Holland, Zeland, and Friseland, &c. He had a long and tedious trouble with Iohn de Reuseffe, who perswaded the Emperour, that Iohn Earle of Holland dying without issue, his Earledoms ought (in right) to returne to the Empire; according as Charls the bald, Emperour of the Romans, had at first giuen them in fee and homage to Thierry of Aquitaine. This suggestion raised the Emperour Albert in Armes against Iohn of Hennault, but the Bishop of Cullen compounded the matter betwene them; and Iohn de Reuseffe was afterward drowned, by which means, Iohn of Hennault, hauing gouerned Hennault thirty yeares, and his countreies of Holland, Zeland, and Friseland five yeares, died, & was buried at Valenciennes.

22 William the third, sonne and heire to count Iohn of Hennault, succeeded his fathers Earledomes: he was commonly called, The good Earle William, for his vertues, iustice, good life, and honourable actions. In his time hapned so great a dearth and famine in Holland, that poore people dyed with hunger, euen in the streets as they went: seeking also for hearbs and rootes in the fields and woods, there they were likewise found dead, and in the common high wayes: little children dyed sucking at their mothers breasts, and some were enforced to feede on their dead children. In this time of famine, a poore woman in the Towne of Leyden, being extremely overcharged with hunger, entreated her owne sister, (being a woman of better abilitye) to lend her some bread, which she would thankfully repay againe, when God should enable her. She, very vnkindly, and without any pity of her extremity, denied her oftentimes, notwithstanding the others often vringings; that shee was assured, that shee could not be without bread. Heereupon the vnmmercifull sister (lying, both to God and to her owne poore sister) sayde: If I haue any bread, I wish that it may instantly be turned into a stone: wherewith the heauy displeasure of almighty God laid hold vpon her words, and going afterward to hir Cupboard (to relieue herselfe) she found all her loanes of bread conuerted into apparant stones, and died herselfe with extremity of hunger. It is credibly said, that one or two of those stones, are yet to be seene in Saint Peters Church at Leyden, as a memorie of this iust iudgement of God.

There is also recorded another memorable Historie, of vpright Iustice done by this good Earle William, to a poore country-man, against a Bayliffe of South Holland, who had taken a goodly faire Cowe from him, that was the reliefe of himselfe, his poore wife and children; as there are some Kine in that Countrey, which doe giue twenty pottles of milke and more, in a day. The Bayliffe at the poore mans complaint to this good earle William, who lay then sicke in his Bed at Valenciennes (yet neuer debarred any suiters from audience, were he sicke or well) was adjudged to giue the poore man an hundred crownes of good gold, for the wrong he had done to him, which was accordingly performed. But for his iniurie to publike Iustice (being himselfe an Officer) and abusing the authority committed in trust to him; the Earle lent for an Executioner, and caused his head to be smitten off by his beds side. This good Count William, being a vertuous Prince, victorious in warre, a man learned, wife, wel spoken, and iudicious, a great friend to peace, gracious to all men, and beloued in all courts, hauing gouerned his Prouinces 32. yeares, dyed the ninth day of Iune 1337. and was buried with great pomp at Valenciennes.

23 William the fourth, son to the good Earle William, came to his fathers Earledoms by lawfull succession. He was a man of high merit, & a most famous Souldier, whereof whereof he made good proofe, first against the Saracins and Moores, in the kingdome of Granada: Next, with the Emperour Lewes, and many noble Earles, ayding his brother in lawe Edward the third King of England, against the king of France; thirdly, in ouer-running Lithuania, Liuania, and warring against the Russian Infidels; lading home his men with victory & wealth; spoiles: And lastly, in preuailing against the Frizons, and Robert of Arckell gouernour of Vrecht: Yet it was his hard hap to be slaine vnkowne (amongst the Frizons) before any could haue power to helpe him: so that he left no lawfull child to succede him, and therefore his sister, (being Emperesse) remayned his onelic heire.

24 Margaret, wife to Lewes of Banaria, (then Emperour) and the eldest sister to Earle William, flayne (as you haue heard) by the Frizons, by the Emperours interposition of his authority, and her owne native right, went downe by the Rhine into Holland, accompanied with a most princely and well-befeeing traine, and was acknowledged to be Ladie and Princesse of Holland, Zeland, and Friseland. But before her returne back to the Emperour againe, shee constituted both his and her eldest sonne (named William of Banaria) to bee her Regent there in those Countreies, for a summe of money yearly payed to her: but remayning vnpayd, she might resume all her rights to herselfe againe. The Emperour deceasing, the Emperesse Margaret came thither againe, and had resignation (from her sonne William) of all the aforesaid Countreies, retrying himselfe into Hennault, as being well contented there to liue: vnill by intestine discord, and dangerous practises of two intruded factions, called Cabillaux and Hoeks (where in both nobles and gentlemen did too far enter) the mothers government did grow vnsubsistable, and Duke William was recovered from Hennault, to vnder-goe the sole authority. Two very bloody battels were fought betwene the Emperesse and her sonne; and in the first, Earle William escaped with great difficultie, and fledde into Holland, for this battell was fought at La Vere in Zeland. But in the second, there was so much blood spilt, that (for three dayes after) the old River of Muse (at full Sea) was (all ouer) red in that place. The Emperesse (by helpe of a small Bathe) escaped into England; and vpon an agreement afterwards made betwene them: Duke William had the quiet possession of Holland, Zeland, and Friseland assigned him, and the Emperesse Margaret had the countie of Hennault, where (five yeares after) she ended her dayes, and lyeth buried at Valenciennes.

25 Duke William being peaceably possessed of his Seigneuries, according to the former composition, being also Duke of Banaria, Salatine of Rhine, and Earle of Hennault by his mothers death, tooke to wife the Lady Matilda, daughter to Henry duke of Lancaster in England, by whom hee had no children. Much strife, warre, and bloody bickering, hapned betwene him and the Bishop of Vrecht, with shrewd disadvantages on eyther side; till, by the meanes of some Noblemen, they were reduced to amitie.

This Duke William (vpon what occasion it could neuer be knowne) fell distracted of his senses, and slew a Knight with a blow of his fist: so that hee was shut vp (vnder good Guard) for nineteene yeares space, euen till he dyed. Hauing gouerned his prouinces of Holland, Zeland and Friseland (before his madnesse) fcauen yeares, and Hennault two.

26 Albert of Banaria, brother to Duke William, in the time of his distraction, was sent for from Banaria; and made Gouernor of his brothers Countreies, in hope of his recovery, which by no meanes could be compassed. Hee vanquished the Frizons in many rebellions, tooke the towne of Delft, and beheaded the Baron of Eughien, vpon sinister reformations, which caused great trouble betwene him, and sixe brethren of the said Baron: but, vpon their reconciliation. Cognis Albert builded the Chanonry of the Chappell, at the Court of the Hague.

In his time, a Sea-woman (by reason of great tempests at Sea, and extraordinary high Tides) was seene swimming in the Zuyderzee; betweene the Townes of Camper and Edam; which being brought to Edam, and cleansed from the Sea-moffe growne about her, by her long abiding there: she was like to another woman, endured to be apparelled, and would feed on meats as others did, yet fought the all meanes to escape, and get into the water againe, agayne, had she not very carefully bene tended. Shee did learne to spinne, and exercise other womanly qualities, beeing daily scene of infinite persons, who haue made perfect testimoniall of this rare accident, and signified it for an vndoubted truth, auouching, that she liued fifteene yeares, and lyeth there buried in the Church-yard. In the yeare of our Lord, one thousand four hundred and foure, this famous Prince Albert dyed, after hee had gouerned his Countie fixe and fortie yeares: nineteene as he was Tutor to his distracted brother, and twentyseuen as Prince, heire and Lord of those Countie, being buried at the Hague in Holland.

Philip the bold Duke
of Burgundy.

27 William, sixt of that name, after the death of Duke Albert of Banaria his father, succeeded as his immediate heyre. His first wife was daughter to Charles the first, King of France, and she dyed yong, without any issue. He secondly married the daughter of John, sonne to Philip the bold Duke of Burgundy, by whom he had one onely daughter, named Isabeline or Jacoba, as the Dutch vsuto call her. This Count William wasted Friseland, spoiled Liege, and preyed against the Gueldrs, and also the Lordes (father and sonne) of Arckell at Gorrichom, and reconciled the Duke of Burgundy to the French King. The Dolphine of France, sonne to King Charles the sixt, married Isabeline, Count Williams daughter; but hee being poysoned, by putting on a shirt of maile, dyed without issue. As Earle William himselfe did not long after, being bitten in the leg by a mad Dogge, which hurt could neuer be cured. So that the Lady Isabeline (his daughter, and widow to the Dolphine of France) was his true heire in all his Seigneuries: Hee gouerned thirteene yeares, and hee buried at Valenciennes in Hennault.

28 Isabeline, or Jacoba, daughter and sole heire to William of Banaria, succeeded her father in all his Earledomes and Seigneuries, being then widow to the Dolphine of France, and yet but nineteene yeares of age. In regard of her youth and widowhood, she endured much molestation in her gouernement, chiefly in Holland: for the two factions tooke head agayne, and handled their boldnes on both sides, the Hockins fauouring the Countesses faction, and the Cabillantes here-enemies, by which means her rule was greatly disturbed. For John of Banaria (foraking his Bishoppricke of Liege) sought to make himselfe an Earle, and marrie his Niece Isabeline (utterly against her will) and yet to dispossesse her of her rightfull inheritance, for which purpose he leagued himselfe with the Cabillantes, and other powerfull friends, who neuertheless were slaine in their bolde adventure at Gorrichome. And, to frustrate the Bishops vaine hope, the Pope dispensed her marriage with John Duke of Brabant, albeit he was her neare kinsman, whereby their patrimoniall inheritances were the more strengthened, and hee acknowledged as their Prince, in Hennault, Holland, Zeland, Friseland, &c. It were needelesse heere, to relate the following molestations of John of Banaria the Bishop, to his Niece Isabeline, taking on himselfe the title of Earle, and therefore, (by some) ranked among the Earles of Holland, or the after-marriages of Lady Isabeline, to the Duke of Gloucester, vncke to Henry the sixt, King of England; the fourth and last time (in great privacy) to Frank of Borselle, Lieutenant of Zeland, or her (no meane troubles) by the Duke of Burgundy; to whom these resigned vp all her Countie. Let it suffice, that shee liued in continuall vexations nineteene yeares, and dying at the Hague, was buried in the Chappell of the Court of Holland.

30 Philip Duke of Burgundie, being (both by father & mother) rightfull heire and successour to the aforementioned Countesse Isabeline; was thus entitled: Philip Duke of Bourgogne, Brabant, and Lembourg; Earle of Flandres, Arthois, Burgogne, Hennault, Holland, Zeland, and Namure; Marquesse of the holie Empire; and Lord of Friseland, Salins and Macklyn. Hee had three wiues; by the two first hee had no children; but by the last, named Isabel (daughter to John King of Portugall) hee had three sonnes; Anthony and Joffe, who dyed yong; and Charles Martin, Earle of Charolois, and successour vnto his father. This Philip of Bourgogne instituted the order of Knighthood of the golden Fleece, and had much discontent with his sonne Charles, whom (at length) he married to the Lady Margaret, sister to Edward the fourth, King of England. of this Phillip; hee besieged Callis, surprized Luxembourg, subdued Liege, and ouercame the Hamecons. Hee exceeded all his predecessors (dukes of Burgogne) in riches, Seigneuries, height of Pompe and State. He dyed the fifth day of Iune 1467, hauing gouerned about fortie yeares. In his time was the famous Arte of Printing first inuented; the men of Harlem in Holland do challenge the first honour thereof, but it was reduced to perfection at Mentz, by one John Fawstus, who had bene seruant to Laurence Sanjon of Harlem, as they constantly affirme.

31 Charles, furnished the Warlike Duke of Bourgogne, succeeded in all his fathers Titles and Dignities. The Inhabitants of Gant resisting him, he brought them vnder obedience, and defeated the Liegeois in battell, which enforced Liege to yeelde to him. He made peace with the French King, who doubted to be detained at Peronne by Duke Charles. Vpon a fresh rebellion of the Liegeois, the Duke forced King Lewes to go with him to the siege of their town; which he ruined, and practised the like to the house of Brederode. He warred against the Prisons, and carried many Princes in hope of his daughters marriage. The French King, and the Duke, sought to deceive each other, and the Constable of Saint Paul (waxing hatefull to them both) they resolved his ruine, and (on a Truce taken for nine yeares, betweene the King and Duke) the Constable was beheaded at Paris. The Duke warred against the Swisses, and was defeated by them, both at Granson and Morat, wherewith the Swisses were enriched. The Duke besieged Nancie, and was there slaine in battell, by the treason of the Earle of Campobachio, an Italian; where being engirt with a great troupe of Lancers, he receiued wounds, one in the head, the second in the thigh, and the third in the fundament. Hee left one onely daughter and heire.

32 Mary, daughter and heire to Duke Charles, the warlike Duke of Bourgogne, succeeded her father in all his Countie: being but eighteen yeares old when hee was slaine before Nancy, wherefore she remained vnder the charge of the Duke of Cleues, and his brother the Lord of Rauesteine. The French King seized Piccardie & Arthois: and she hapning into the Ganthois power, endured much trouble, by putting her chiefest seruants and counsellors to death. The Flemings were defeated, and the yong Duke of Gueldrs slaine. Afterward, a marriage was concluded betweene Maximilian Arch-duke of Austria, sonne to the Emperor Fredericke, and the Lady Mary of Bourgogne, albeit the would more gladly haue matched with the house of France.

33 Maximilian, Arch-duke of Austria, and sonne to the Emperour Fredericke, marrying the Princess Mary of Bourgogne, was thereby wedded to much warre and trouble. For, first the Gueldrs revolted from the house of Bourgogne. Next hapned the battell of Guingate, wherein the Arch-duke was Conqueror: Then, Turnay yeelded to him; truce was taken betweene him and the French King, and the new tumults of the Cabillaux and Hoecs, were also by him pacified. Dordrecht was surprized by the yong lord of Egmont; also, many Townes in Gueldrs yeelded to the Arch-duke; and (not long after) followed the death of the Arch-duchesse Mary, who had (the first yeare of her marriage, a sonne named Philip, father to Charles the first) the second yeare a daughter, called Margaret, betrothed in her infancie, to Charles the Dolphine of France, sonne to Lewes 11. and the third yeare, a sonne named Frances, according to the name of Frances Duke of Brittaine his godfather. Maximilian being chosen King of the Romans, he made Engelbert Earle of Nassau, Gouernour of the Netherlands in his absence: and afterward, vpon the bold insolency of the Ganthois and Bruges (keeping the King of Romans prisoner) Albert duke of Saxony, was made second gouernour of the Netherlands, & General for the Emperor Fredericke against the Flemings. But Fredericke dying, his son Maximilian succeeded him in the Empire, by which means Philip of Austria, sonne to Maximilian, inherited his right in Holland, Zeland, Friseland, &c.

34 Philip, second of that name, being 16. yeares olde, and succeeding his father Maximilian, Emperour in the Netherlands, had these Titles: Philippe Arch-duke of Austria, Duke of Bourgogne, Lothier, Brabant, Styria, Carinthia, Lembourg, Luxembourg, and Gueldrs; Earle of Hafpoung, Flandres, Arthois, Bourgogne, Ferreto and Kiborch; Palatine of Hennault, Holland, Zeland, Namure and Zuphen:

Vpon his full possession of the Netherlands, peace was made between him, and Charles the eight King of France; war hapning bewixt the Arch-duke and the Duke of Guelthers, great inconueniences followed thereon: but Duke Albert being slaine before Groningen, the Arch-Duke inherited the Realme of Spain by his wife, being made King of Castile, & George duke of Sazony (being then made Gouernor of the Netherlands, for the Arch-duke Philip) continued the Warres in Friseland. For, vpon the death of Isabell, Queene of Castile, Jane her daughter being the onely heyre, and married to the Arch-duke Philip; the hereby inuested him in the realms of Spaine, Leon, Granada, &c. as absolute King. But he enioyed that Dignitie not long: for in the year 1506. the 27. day of September, he dyed (sodainly) in the City of Bourges, suspected to bee poysoned. After the death of Philip King of Castile, the Emperour Maximilian took vpon him the government of the Netherlands, as Guardian vnto Charles and Ferdinand, his Grand children, being the sons of Philip and Jane, King and Queene of Castile.

1508. 35 Charles of Austria, second of that name, succeeded rightfully in all his fathers Lands and Seigneuries, and by the Emperors appointment, his daughter the Lady Margaret (Dowager of Sauoy, and Aunt to the Princes Charles and Ferdinand) was Regent of the Low countries. Afterward, Prince Charles took possession of the Netherlands, and being crowned K. of Spaine and Arragon, soone after followed the death of the Emperour Maximilian, and in an assembly at Francfort, for choyse of a new Emperour, Charles king of Spaine had free election, by the name of Charles the 5. Then was Lady Margaret (widow both of Castile and Sauoy, and Aunt to the Emperour Charles) accepted as sole gouernesse of the Netherlands, in her Nephewes absence. Troubles hapned in Spaine, by reason of the Kings departure thence, & not onely warre in Friseland, but likewise betwene the French and Bourguignons, as also the warres of Bootes or Peazants in Germany; and the Groningens reiecting the Duke of Guelthers, did yeild themselves to the Emperour: then hapned the second bloody edit from the Emperour, against the Netherland protestants, and then was the imperial diet at Ausbourg, where the protestant Princes presented the confession of their faith. After followed the deuouring inandation in the Netherlands, and the death of the Lady dowager Margaret, whereby Mary of Austria, second daughter to King Philip, and Queene Jane of Castile, succeeded in the government of the Netherlands. War hapned betwene the Emperour and the French king, but vpon the coming of queene Elenor of France to the Emperour her brother, peace was concluded betwixt them.

36 While Mary of Austria gouerned the Netherlands, for the Emperour Charles her brother, great troubles hapned vnto the Protestants, by opposition of the Pope & Emperour against them. The Emperour affected the Empire for Prince Philip his sonne, which bred a quarrell betwixt the Emperour, and his brother Ferdinand king of Hungary, to whom the Princes of the Empire were more inclined, then to Philip; and then the Protestants denied their comming to the Councel of Trent. Philip King of Spaine married Mary queene of England: And not long after, the Emperour resigned the Netherlands to his sonne King Philip (whereby he was reckned the 36. Earle of Holland, Zeland, &c.) and the Empire to his brother Ferdinand, King of the Romans and Hungary, departing out of the Netherlands, to end his dayes quietly in a Monastery, nor far from Placentia. In which time, Emanuel Philibert, Duke of Sauoy, and Prince of Piemont, was Gouernour, and Lieutenant Generall of the Netherlands, for King Philip; till the King of Spaines marriage (being turned into teares, by the most vntimely death of the French King) caused Margaret of Austria, Bastarde to the Emperour Charles the first, and Dutchesse of King Philip returned then home into Spaine, it being his last departure out of those countries: whereon (not long after) ensued the subtle bringing of the Spanish Inquisition into the Netherlands, by creation of new Bishops; and such was the power and privilege of the Inquisitors, as none were able to withstand them, in confiscation both of their body and goods at their owne pleasure.

1568. Now, albeit the tyranny of the Dutchesse government in the Low-countries, was more then the people could well endure, yet (to put a sharpe snaffle in their mouths) K. Philip removed his Bastard sister Margaret, & sent Don Ferdinando Aluarez, Duke of Alua, who quickly brought the Netherlands into a most pittifull estate: making himselfe sure of Gant, and Count Horne and count Egmont (abusiuely) made prisoners: he built the Castle of Antwerp, where he erected his own proud statue, & proceeded to apprehend the prince of Orange by Commission, setting down Articles by the Spanish Inquisition (which were confirmed by the king) to ruinate the Netherlands, vpon which soone followed the execution of the sonnes of Batembour at Brussels, as also the Earles of Egmont and Horne. William of Nassau prince of Orange, was made gouernor of Holland, Zeland & Vrecht for the States, & proued very fortunate in many attempts against the D. of Alua, which made him labour his repeale home into Spaine, with Don Fredericke his sonne. Don Lewes de Requesens, the great Commander of Castile, was sent to spoyle the dukes place in the Netherlands, for the K. of Spaine, to whom Aluarez former behavior serued for an example in his proceeding; and notwithstanding, his besieging of Middlebourg (near hand to famishment) yet was his fleet defeated before his face, and the town yielded vp by Collonell Mondragon, to the Prince of Orange. After many dangerous turmoiles on both sides, the States sent to require succour of Elizabeth Q. of England, and soone after dyed Don Lewes de Requesens at Brussels; in whose roome succeeded Don Iohn of Austria (bastard sonne to the Emperour Charles the first) as gouernor for K. Philip in the Netherlands, all the Prouinces whereof were vnted at the pacification of Gand; whereupon, the Castle was yeilded to the States, and all the Spaniards departed out of Antwerp castle, which was also deliuered into the States hands. Don Iohn being receiued as Gouernor, he sought occasions how to renew warre against the prince of Orange, and diuers discontentments, as also treacherous practises, being noted in D. Iohn, the States grew zealous of him, & he was proclaimed the Countries enemy. Then was the Arch-duke Mathias called to bee Gouernor, and while the heart-burnings held betwene Don Iohn and the States, the Duke of Amiou, and Duke Casimire also were required to succour them, but to little effect: for Arthois and Hennault, fell from the Netherlands general vniion, and then followed the death of Don Iohn of the plague, in the Campe neere to Namur.

Then Alexander Farnese, Duke of Parma and Placentia, bastard Nephew to the King of Spaine, succeeded Don Iohn in the Netherlands government: Whereupon, a stricter vniion (then before) was made betwene the Prouinces at Vrecht. The D. of Amiou was called to be Protector, and partly Lord of the Countries in the Vniion, which made the King of Spaine prescribe the Prince of Orange, and let his life at sale, to which proscription the Prince (in euery poynt) made his iust answer. Then were valiant and worthie seruices performed by sir Iohn Norris, and Captaine (afterwards) sir Roger Williams. In the year following, the generall Estates of the Prouinces, hauing declared Philip K. of Spaine, second of that name, to be fallen from the Seignieury of the sayd Prouinces, in regard of his extraordinary and too violent government, against their priuiledges and freedoms (solemnly sworne by himselfe.) In way of right and Armes, took vpon them all the government of the politike Estate, & of the religion in those Prouinces, breaking the Kings Scales, abolishing the subiects of their oath to him, and causing them to take a new oath, for preservation of their country, and obedience to the said States. Vpon a bargain made by the K. of Spaine, to kill the prince of Orange, the said prince was shot by one Iohn Iuwergens, a bankrupt-merchants servant, who was initially slain, but the prince escaped that attempt with life. Afterward he was traitorously murdered by Balthazar

The Earle of Leicester.

In the time of the earle of Leicesters gouernement for the Queene, were sundrie worthy seruices performd by the Earle of Essex, Sir John Norrie, the Lord Willoughby, Sir Philip Sidney, Sir William Russell, &c. besides the subtile pretences of Sir William Stanley, Rowland Torke, Pattson, and others, who held faire weather with the Earle of Leicester, and had the government of Zutphen skonce, and the strong towne of Deuenter (to the great dislike of the States) yet performed no such matter, as the Earles hope was periwaded of them: for, after the death of that matches noble Gentleman Sir Philip Sidney, he being shot before Zutphen, & therof dying the Earle of Leicester (being gone for England) both Deuenter & Zutphen Skonce were deliuered vp to the Spaniards, by base corruption of money. And (not long after) the Prince of Parma beleagring Scuice; by composition it was also yielded vp, after it had endured 17000 cannon shot & more. Beside, vpon some discontentment, betwene the Earle of Leicester, and the States; the Queene called home the sayd Earle into England, and the Lord Willoughby remained there Generall of the English forces. The sundry worthy seruices, both by him, and the English performed, with the Spanish vndoubted hopes of Englands Conquest, in the dreadfull yeare, one thousand five hundred eightie and eight, Prince Maurice his entrance into the Netherlands regiment, and the Dukes of Parmaes warres in France; all these do I passe ouer, referring such as desire farther satisfaction therein, to the large Historie of the Netherlands.

The Prince of Parma dying at Arras (after his retreat from Rouen) the second of September, one thousand five hundred ninety and two: Maurice of Nassau, borne Prince of Orange, Marquess of La Vere, and of Flushing, &c. was made great Capitaine and Admirall generall of the vniited Prouinces in the Low-countries, by the Estates: and Ernestus, Archduke of Austria, was also made Lieutenant Gouvernour, and Capitaine generall for Phillip of Spaine.

Prince Maurice prouing very successefull in his warrelike attempts, a Renegade or Apostate Priest (in the habite of Souldier) was corrupted (by the Arch-duke Ernestus) to murder the Prince Maurice at Breda; and, vpon his owne confession thereof, he was executed at the Hage. Afterward, vpon Prince Maurice his valiant surprisall of Gronning, Ernestus had dealt in like maner with a Souldier, named Peter de Four (who had sometime serued in the companie of the Garde to Prince Maurice) to vndertake the murdering of him at Lillo: the which treason being confessed by the man himselfe, he was executed in the towne of Berghen-vp-zoom. Here might be much said of the honorable seruices of Sir Frances Vere, and others, but our purposed breuitie is the onely imbarment; and the Netherlie Historie (at large) may thereof discharge me. The Arch-duke Ernestus dyed the twenty one day of February, one thousand five hundred ninety and five; Mondragons forces defeated by Prince Maurice, and La Motte slaine before Dourlaus: the Estates (vnder the king of Spaine) gladly fought peace with the vniited Prouinces, and sent Articles in writing to Prince Maurice, for consideration of their motion. This was not done, but vpon good aduice in the King of Spaine, perceiuing the Netherlands, and Prince Maurice his great fortunes against him, adding euery day, (more and more) to his vtter abolition thence. Hereupon, Albertus the Cardinall, brother to deceased Ernestus, and Arch-duke of Austria, was sent (by the King) to gouerne there for him; many Easterlings and Netherland therland shippes, which had beene stayed in Spaine to meete the Indian fleetes, were suddenly releafed; and Phillip of Nassau (who is now Prince of Orange and Earle of Buren, that had long time beene restrained of his liberty in Spaine) for the better countenancing of th intended busines, he likewise was sent along with the Cardinall Albertus.

The Cardinall being made Gouvernour for the King of Spaine, rooke Callice from the French King, as his first peece of seruice: but for losse thereof, he recouered La-fere from the Spaniards. Whereupon, the Cardinall besieged Hulst in Flanders, which yielded in the end: but it was a deare purchase to the Cardinall, for this siege, (continuing some two moneths) cost him the liues of about three-score valiant Captaines, besides other Commanders, Collonels, and men of marke, and about five thousand well approoued souldiers.

Then did the King of Spaine dispense with himselfe for payment of his debts, which made many Merchants in Spaine, Italy, Antwerpe, Amsterdam, and Middle-bowry, to become Bankerouts. A league was made betwene the French King; the Queene of England and the States, against the Spaniards; and then did Prince Maurice go to Tournhout, where the Earle of Varax was slaine. Amiens also was surprized by the Spaniards; but soone besieged and recovered by the French King, albeit the Cardinall did offer succour, which proued in vain. Prince Maurice besieged, and tooke the Townes of Alpen, Meurs, Rhinberg, Groll, Brefort, Enfcheyde, Oldenzel, Omarfom, Goot, and Lingen; all which seruices he performed in three moneths. Then happened another treacherous plot, against the life of Prince Maurice, by perswasion of the Iesuites of Darmay, and vndertaken by Peter Panne, a Cowper by trade; but being then a Broker or Bankerout Merchant, who hauing received the Sacrament to performe the deede, eyther with knife, ponyard, or pistol: the Prouinciall of the Iesuites made a long Sermon, to encourage him in the action, and assuring him of Paradice, if he performed it, vsed these words to him besides: Go in peace, for thou shalt goe like an Angell, in the guard of God. But the man (being terrified in conscience) discouered

the whole treason, without any compulsion, and was therefore executed at Leyden in Holland. The King of Spaine growing weak and sickly, gaue his Daughter the Infanta, named Isabella Clara Eugenia, in marriage to the Arch duke and Cardinall Albertus, with transadon of the Netherlands and Bourgoigne: whereupon he left his Cardinales habite, and went to fetch the Infanta. Soone after dyed the King of Spaine, on the thirteenth day of September, in the yeare of our Lord God 1598, being seauentie one yeares olde, and foure moneths.

The Arch-duke and the Infanta being come into the Netherlands, had their installment at Brussels, Louaine, Antwerpe, &c. The Emperour sent to the States, concerning a peace, but their resolution helde to make warre in Flanders. Then happened the siege and memorable battaile of Nieuport, where Prince Maurice tooke diuers Fortes from the Spaniards, and ouerthrew the Arch-dukes Armie, he being there in person: but gladly fled away, leaving his Armes, Horise of Combat, all his Houthold, Artillery, and baggage behinde him, and lost fixe thousand men, besides eight hundred taken prisoners, among whom was Don Francisco de Mendoza, Admirall of Aragon, Marquess of Guadaleite, and Lieutenant generall of the Arch-dukes Army, who was ledde to Oostend; Don Baptista de Villa noua, led to Horne in Holland; Don Alonso Ricquell, to Delft; Don Gonzalo Hernandez de Spinola, to Vrecht; Don Pedro de Montenegro, to the Hague; Don Pedro de Valasco, to Berghen, with Don Francisco de Tarres, and Don Antonio de Mendoza, and Don Pedro de Leufins, to Enchusen: besides the Arch-dukes three Pages, Count Carlo Rezi, Don Diego de Guzman, and Mortier: Don Pedro de Monte-maior, his chiefe Talter; also his Phisition, Barber, Harbinger, Rider, Cook, Porter, Grooms of his Chamber, most of the Archers, Halberdiers of his Guard, and (in a maner) all his houthold; with three Priests or Monkes, forty Auncients, and thirty seauen Pensioners, reformed (by them) Auncients and Sergeants reformed. Hee lost also fixe peeces of Ordinance, one hundred thirty and fixe Ensignes of foote taken, and fixe Corners of hoisse, comprehending the Mutiners Standard, and the recouered lost Colours.

Moreover, on the Archdukes side were slaine, the Earle of Saume, the Earle of La Fere, the Seneschall of Montelimar, the Baron of Pimereult, Chaffy Ottingny, son to the President Richardot; Don Galpar de Sapens, Colonell, who died at Oastend, Don Diego de Torres, Don Galpar de Loyaso, Don Gonzalo d'Espinola, Don Ioan de Pardo, Don Garcia de Toledo, Don Lapode Capeta, Don Alonso Carcano, Don Louis Faccardo, Sebastian Velaico, Sebastian Doleloz, Chritiomaill Verdugues, Mattheo d'Oiteuville, Joannettin de casa nueva, the Paymaster Alines, and many other neuer knownen.

Prince Maurice and the States, at the first encounter in the morning, and lastly in the batell, lost about 2000. men, among whom were Bernard, Couteler, &c. Hamelton, Captaines of horse, and some twentie Captaines of foot, but no man of marke or speciall note. In this braue exploitte at Nieuport, the vertue and valor of Sir Frances Vere Generall, and Sir Horatio Vere his Brother, Colonell, will for euer bee remembered.

The occurrences in the following years as the besiedging of Oastend, the enterprize on Flessigne, the practise to sacke Antwerpe againe, Grane yielded vp vnto Prince Maurice; also his honorable offers to the towne of Sluice, and it being yielded to him vpon composition, euen in the view of the Archdukes army: they require a larger field of discourse, whē by this breuity can be admitted. Proceed we then to speake of the long continued sledge at Oastend, which lasting three whol years and eleuen weekes, was at last compounded withall, and on the twentie two day of September, 1604. yielded to the Archduke.

What numbers were slain in this long continued siege of Oast-end, can hardly be gathered, albeit, a note was found in a Commiffaries Pocket (who had bin slain the seuenth of August, 1604. before Oast-end) wherein were diuers good obseruations; especially concerning the Archdukes Campe, and also what number

(of each degree) dyed and were slaine therein, during this sledge, vntill the yeilding vp thereof, viz Masters of the camp seuen; Colonels fifteene; Sergeant Maiors twenty nine, Capitaines 565. Lieutenants 1116. Ensigns 322. Sergeants 1911. Corporals 1166. Lanfprizadoes 600. Soldiers 54663. Mariners 611. women and Children, 119. all amounting to 72114. persons.

To continue the memory of this long sledge, as also the winning of Sluice; counters (of Siluer and Copper) were made in the vnited Prouinces, bearing (on the one side) the figure of Oastend, and on the other, the Towns of Rhinberke, Grane, Sluice Ardenbourg, with the Forts of Isendyke & Cadant, with this inscription round about; Plus triennio obfessa, hosti rudera, Patria quatuor ex me vrbes dedit. Oastend being more then three years besiedged, gaue the enemy an heape of stones, and to her Native Country foure Townes. Another Counter, concerning Sluice, had these wordes on the one side, Traxit, duxit, dedit, Anno 1604. And with the Armes of Zeland on the other side, were these words: Beatus populus cuius adiutor Deus. For the following yeares, from 1604. to 1608. I find no especiall or memorable accidents; but an enterprize by Prince Maurice, on the riuier of Scheld and Antwerpe, with the taking of the Castle of Wouwre, neere vnto Berghen Vpzaome; Spinolas taking of Linghen, with an attempt on Berghen & Groll, taken by composition, &c. For a treaty of peace happening betwene England and Spaine, the like also chanced to be talked on concerning the Netherlands, and many other meetings were made to bring it to effect. At length it was brought to passe, by the labour and endeour of a Friar (as it was reported) who made manie errands betwene Spaine and the Netherlands, vntill it was accomplished. Since when, nothing hath hapned of any consequence, but the taking of the Towne of Gulbe in Germany, where the Prince Maurice did behaue himselfe very honorably.

CHAP. I.

Containing, a breefe discourse of the Originall of the Venetians; the foundation of Venice, and how it hath beene gouerned, from the yeare of our Lord, 421. to this instant.

Historiographers who haue written of the Venetians, doe not agree together in their true Originall. For some doe write, that they are descended of the Venetian Gauls, inhabiting along the Ocean sea in little Britaigne, called Armorica, whereof one of the principall Citties (beeing a Byshops See) was called Vennes. Others, and (among them) Titus Livius, born in Padua, assures vs, that they came forth of Paplagonia, and that Philemon their Captaine (being slayne at Troy the great) they went with Antenor into Italy. Others write, that this Nation, hauing beene neighbours to the Cappadocians, and venturing fight with the Cimmerians, they hazarded farre further vpon the Adriaticke Sea in their Fortune. The most common opinion, is of them, who say, that the Himitians or Hemetes came with Antenor; and, in sometime after (by changing of a Letter) were called Venitians, or Veneses.

First of all, they expelled the ENGANEANS

who inhabited this country, between the Adriaticke sea and the Alpes, and builded the City of Padua. Afterward, by successe of time, they increased in such sort, as they would not be satisfied to be Masters (onely) of that which had appertained to the ENGANEANS (consisting of thirty foure sayre Citties and Townes;) but intruded farther, to seize on Bressano and Ferli. Some report this Country to be bounded with the Rivers of Pau, and that of Adda, as also the Lake of Guard, anciently called the Benacke, the Alpes, and the Adriaticke sea.

And so the ancient Venitians in this manner, extended their Dominion, both in longitude and latitude, in the most pleasant Countrey of Italy: but the seating of the places did daily beget the elder estate of the Venitians hatred. For on the one side, the ordinary robberies of the Liburnians, and on the other side, the frequent and frightfull courses of the Barbarians, did hinder them from any long time of continuing in quiet. For, without these impeachments, this Nation had bin most fortunate, in conquering (by the right of Warre) one of the most goodly & beautiful regions in all Italy.

Now ouer & beside, that on the south-side, it is enuironed with a most calme circuite of the sea, and in regard thereof, is the most capable of receiving all strange Merchandizes: so it is likewise Watered with very delectable riuers, whereby whatsoever cometh from the Sea, is easilie transported to the very Naele of the Prouince. It aboundeth in Pooles, Ponds, Forrests, and vnder-woods, & the whole Land is choicely fertile in Corne, Wine, Oyle,

People of Paplagonia.

Oyle, and all kindes of fruites. It is also plentifully stored with Country houses, Townes, Citties, and Villages, Castles, Fortes, and such like, verie commendable for the situation & enclosure of their Walles.

These new inhabitants, when their weak estate beganne to grow in fayrer forme: they were sildom exempted from the VVarres and incursions of strangers. For, after many bolde insolenies of the Barbarians, with continued VVarres against each other, even from their verie beginning, vntill the time of Attila: they were yet much more dreadfully encumbered, with the furious assault of the Goths, a Tempest farre exceeding in turbulency, all other former distasters happening vnto them whatsoeuer. For first, the Hunnes (a people of Scythia, dwelling neere to the Riphean Mountaines) conducted by Attila, the Sonne of Mahdlucke, dispersed themselves ouer Italy, and making horrible spoile wheresoeuer they went, fell into the Prouince belonging to the Venitians. After a long siege, they tooke the City of Aquileia, and poyled and burnt it wholly. In like manner did they also ruinate the two Citties of Concordia and Altina, and almost all the Venitian region.

At the fearefull newes of this Warre, the Venitians were more amazed then any other, and so much the rather, because they had beene formerly inured, to sustaine their cheefest misshappes amongst the Barbarians. Whereupon it is said, that (euen then) a great number of persons withdrew themselves from the firme Land, to the Isles where Venice at this instant is builded: hasting thither from all other parts, especially vpon the arriuall of this cruell enemy Attila.

Some (of the better sort of Padua) first beganne the retreat, and being come to the entrance or issue of the Riuer, which was then very deepe (whence the name of Rialto hath remained to the same place, as deriued of the word Rinealto) they there laid the first foundation of the Cittie of Venice.

The meaner people of Padua, enforced by the selfe-same feare, fled thence, and beganne to people themselves in Chioggia, Malamocco, and Albiola. Some of them of Aquileia (at the same time) betooke themselves to the Marshes or Fennes of Grada; and, vpon the first returne of Attila, the people ran (in mighty affluence) along the Coastes to the Neighbouring Isles. They of Aquileia bestowed themselves in Grada, a place neere vnto firme land, yet engirt with VVarres. They that fledde from Concordia, made vse of Coarbi and the Attinois, fixe little Islands neere to one another, which they gaue names vnto, according to the names of the gates of their former lost and ruined Citties: to wit, Torcello, Maierbo, Buriano, Muriano, Amanas, and Constantiaco.

These feuerall places, where at this present the City of Venice is seated, were (in elder times) very straight or narrowe Islands, and neere vnto each other, sauing onely that they were separated by the pleasing course of Riuers, which ranne into, and returned againe from the Sea, according to the changes of his fluxe and reflux. Nor in these straights were then any dwellings to be discerned, but onely of Sea-Fowles, that flew thither from the Seas, to disport themselves vpon the Sunny bankes; and Fisher-men likewise, would sometimes there put in for harbour.

The Paduans, that tooke vp the Rialto, were the first that beganne to build, and it was in the very same place, where the first foundation of the City was layde: Namely, the five and twentieth day of March, in the yeare of our Lord, 421. and second yeare of the reigne of Pharamond, first King of the Gauls or French-men, in the time also of Pope Boniface the first, and of the Emperour Honorius. Whereby it plainly appeareth, that at one and the selfe-same time, began both the kingdom of France and the Commonwealt of Venice. And that both the one and the other haue continued to this present, for twelue hundred yeares, very little, either more or lesse.

This City so newly begun, encreased daily both in people and buildings. But see what happened vpon a sodaine, a Greeke Carpenters house (or rather hee was one of the Shipwrights, named Eninopus) falling on fire, consumed in a moment (with a violent & continuall embracing) 24 faire new built houses. Which when these new come inhabitants perceived, & fearing that heauen was offended with with this manner of beginning, forgetting God; and serving their owne appetites. They fell all to prayer, and made a solemne vow, to build a Church in the honour of God, and in memory of the Apostle Saint James; at which verie instant time, a mighty tempest of rain (as sodainly fell) whereby the rest of the new begun City was happily preserved.

That Church is yet at this day plainly to be discerned, with the marks and appearances of great antiquity, euen in the very midst of the Rialto: And it was then consecrated by foure Bishops, to wit, Seuerianus bythop of Padua, Ambrose, bythop of Altina, Iacundus, bythop of Treuisa, and Epodius, bythop of Paderlo, and a Priest was there appointed, to performe diuine Seruice.

The first foundations of this Famous City, were men of honest repute, Noble, and rich. For the ancient Venitians; at the change of their abiding, brought with them thither their wiues and childre, with the very wealthiest moueables which they had, and so (at leysure) withdrew themselves, to places of a more secure dwelling. But being impeached (by incursions of the Hunnes) to Till the groundes vpon the sea Coast; (such as had any meanes or apt commodity) gaue themselves to fighting, and to make salt, or to transport the goods of their neighbors; esteeming the benefit thereby gotten, to be no more dishonest or vnbecomming, then to plough and husband the groundes of others.

As for the wealthiest sort, they addicted themselves to traffick Merchandizes with strangers, and by their frequent aduancing into diuers Countries, some of them being very skillfull Mariners, and well experienced in the triall of seuerall Oares or Mettals hidden in the ground, which by industry and endeavour they found in the earth, became Finders or Tryers of those Mettals, and extracted (from the grosser substances) the purer perfections of Gold and Silver, whereby, in their owne Language, they were termed Offici, detinied of the Latine word Aurifer, Gold-linthes, or Hammer men, that (of those refined Mettals) could frame Cups, Pots, Rings, Basons, Ewres, or any other needfull matter whatsoeuer, both for the seruice of God in Churches and Temples, and for the royalty of Emperours, Kings, & Princes. So that, by the consent of diuers good Authors, as Linie, Florus, Cassiodorus, Tragus Pompeius, and others, the first Goldsmiths, workers in Gold and Silver, and framers of those excellent metalles into such orderly meanes for vse (within the parts of Europe) lived in Venice, whereas yet (to this day) do remaine the very best ingenious, and perfect workmen for such matters (according to the iudgement of many) that are to be found in any part of the world: Concerning such as remained more ordinarily at home, for care & safety of the City; they applied their spirits, to deuise good lawes and customs for general benefit. During which time, such was their due respect of iustice, & so precise care of equity and right to all men; as among to great a number of people, there could not bee any disorderly differences noted.

Catholike religion they so singularly commended, and the dayly presence of some reuerend Prelates, who had faued themselves with their Compatriots; that it augmented (among them) a common affection to piety. And their assistance appeared verie requisite, not onely for the ministry of holy Offices; but also for retention of the inhabitants of this new City, in ancient piety and religion. Fearing least they might be infected with the poison of Arrian heresie, because nothing els made more spoile and haubck through all the Prouinces, except the weapons of the Goths and Hunnes.

Such was the beginning of the City of Venice, and in such manner of living, and in such excellences shee spent her first infancy, till (by her vertues) shee attained vnto greater growth, and grounded her selfe in her instant state and condition. It hath constantly bene held, that this Commonwealt (surmoure) retained that forme of gouernment, which is termed Aristocracie; that is, that the most noble and worthiest Citizens should guide and gouern. For, although it be said, that it hath bene gouerned first by Consils, then by Tribunes, and lastly by Dukes, and Masters of warlike power; yet notwithstanding all these dignities, being but electiue, and not hereditary; the election should (in right) appertain to the most Noble Islanders, and Gentlemen of name, by whose aduice the Commonwealt ought to be managed.

managed, euen as it hath bin, and stil con-tinueth to this day.

Consuls, to the number of three, were chosen for two yeares, and albeit that this kinde of Government lasted for about the space of threescore yeares, yet wee finde onely but three consecutue or succeeding elections of them. The first Consuls, were Albertus Phalarius, Thomas Candianus, and Zeno Daulo. These men first go-uerned the City in her Nonage, & some are of the minde, that they were the first Authors of the Paduans flight, and their retirement to the Lakish or Marish Isles, as also of their first building there. The second Consuls, were Lucianus Granhus, Maximus, or Marinus Lucius, and Hugo
Fuscus. The third, were Marcus Aurelius, Andreas Claudius, and Albinus Maurus.
The names of such as were elected after these, are not to be found in anie Histories.

After, that the Isles (about the Rialto were filled with inhabitants: in steed of Consuls, Tribunes were created, and for their creation, the matter was first debatered priuately by few people, afterward, it was ordained and resolved in open assembly of the Islanders: that in each Isle
there should be a Tribune, and hee should bee a yearly Magistrate, to render iustice to the Citizens, and with severity to punish their offences. But the remainder which concerned the generalitie of the Common-wealth, was referred to the generall assembly of the Islanders, to bee by them determined. Afterward, there was but one Tribune created for government of the Isles, which continued for some yeares. Finally, they concluded to create ten, wherunto were added two more, who should dwell in Heraclea; & this Tribunary dignity held place for more then two hundred yeares. Heere is to bee noted, that the Tribunes of the Isles, abusing their authorities, did so trouble the State with ciuill dissensions, as it plainly appeared, that the maine body of the Citie
would be dissolued, without some good and immediate remedy. Which gaue occasion, that (to heare the complaints of euery one) a general assembly of the Isles was published, and their meeting, to be in Heraclea.

In this assembly, Christophere byshop of Grada was Resident, accompanied with a great number of the Cleargie, and after diuine service was performed, the first proposition which he made, was, that (for good of the Common-wealth, each man might complaine of the future Tribune, which being done, and the offences no longer to be endured, for public benefit of the state in general, resolution was set downe, to make election of a Duke, who should represent all honor and Ma-iesty in the State or Seigneury, & he should haue power to assemble the general counsell, when questions were to be made, of any important matter concerning the Commonwealth. He should haue power also, to elect yearly Tribunes or Magistrates in euery Isle, and their appellations to bee brought before him. Moreouer, if any should obtaine any dignity, Prelacie, or Benefice, by suffrages of the Clergy or people: that he should not enjoy it, or be possessed thereof, without the good liking and consent of the Duke, whose power also ended with his life.

This being thus concluded, in the year 697. Paulucio was created the first Duke, and so hath that Ducall dignity continued euer since. Saue onely that in the year 737. after the death of the third Duke Orso, it was determined, that no duke should be elected, for six yeares, but that a Master of the armed troopes or Souldiers should be established, and his Authority to be annually, which lasted no longer then five yeares. For in the year, 742. they proceeded againe to a Duke's election; and since that time, the Common-wealth of Venice hath euermore had Dukes & Princes of the Seigneury; by whose wisdomes (and his counsell a silding) it hath bin preserved in an euer flourishing estate, euen to this instant yeare, 1619.

publicke. He pacified the difference which Luitprand, king of the Lombards had with K. Aribert, and made friendship with them both: as well by his authority, as by arms.
He brought the rebellious Aquileians vnder obedience, encreased the Citties customes and reuenues, and dyed, hauing beeene Duke twenty yeares, sixe moneths, and eight dayes.

2. Marcello Tegaliano, of the same place of Heraclea, was elected his successeur, by common voyce of the people. He was deu-oute, modest and affable, but much lesse diligent in gouerning, then his predecess-
our. The Patriarch of Grada was transferred into Aquileia in his time, by Luit-prand, and there hee had great warres, about the dissensions of the Bishops, wher-into he would not interpose himselfe, but dyed, hauing beeene Duke nine yeares, and twenty one dayes.

3. Orso Hipato, a nobleman of Heraclea, wonne himselfe great reputation by his famous deedes. Paulo the Exarche had recourse to him, the Gracian Armie beeing broken, and siegelayd to Rauenna by Luit-prand. He re-gained Rauenna, made the Kings nephew his prisoner, slew the duke of Vicenza, and re-seated the Exarche in his due rights. Hee bridled the Aquileians, who troubled the publike peace, and put courage into the soules of the yonger sort.
He was slaine, by reason of the dissensions of Iesolo, the eleauenth yeare, and fift mo-neth of his Principalltie.

4. Theodato Hipato, sonne of Orso, was proclaimed Duke 5. yeares after the death of his father: during which time, the people were gouerned by a Marshall or Master of the Souldiers: and forsaking Heraclea, he brought the State to Malamocco.
There he was the first created, and limited his Confinnes with Astolpho King of the Lombards. He was also slayne by Galla a Citizen of Malamocco, in the thirteenth yeare of his Principalltie.

5. Galla de Malamocco, a wicked and seditious man, yet shewing himselfe as Protector of publike peace, was established in the place of Theodato. But his wickednesse being knowne, and that (being but a subiect) he would needs make himselfe absolute Lord, hauing before slayne his chiefe Maister Theodato: the people plucked out his eyes, and tooke from him the Dignitie, which hee had a yeare vsurped.

6. Dominico Monegario, of Malamocco, was seated in the steade of Galla. Somewhat to bridle this Dukes autoritie, the people ioyned two yearely Tribunes with him. But he, being a man audacious and arrogant, fought to tyrannize ouer the people: wherat they growing into fustie, plucked out his eyes, the eight yeare of his Principalltie.

7. Mauritio Galbaio, a noble Heracleian, for his iustice, wisdom, and wealth, was chosen to this dignity. He made his sonne Duke with him, and they gouerned together. In his time, the Church of Grada being molested, he sent an Ambassadour to Pope Stephen, to accord the difference.
The Bishopricke of Saint Peter de Castello Olnelo, was then created. And he died, hauing gouerned twenty three yeares.

8. Gionanni Galbaio, hauing bene Duke nine yeares with his father, gouerned
the Common-wealth yet nine yeres more,
and after the sayd time, hee made Mauritio his sonne, companion with him in the Principality. But they being both of vn-sufferable and wicked life, hauing murdered Iohn Patriarch of Grada, throwing him downe headling from an high tower:
Fortunatus, successeur in the Patriarchate, made a conspiracie against them, and another was elected Duke. Wherat, being not a little confounded, the father fled into Fraunce, and the sonne to Mantua, the sixteenth yeare of their rule.

9. Obeferio, being elected Prince by them that had intelligence with Fortunatus, tooke his brother Beato as his associate, and Valentine beside (being their third brother) was admitted with them in the same dignitie. And it is worth the noting, that of these three brethren, Beato is onelie placed in the ranke of Dukes in the Counsell chamber of Venice; whereas Obeferio incited Pepin King of Italy, to make warre on the Venetians: and Beato maintained the Common-wealth, raigning five yeares.

10. Angelo Participatio, after he had wel borne himselfe in the warre against Pepin, was elected Duke, the people being summond to the Rialto. He founded the Dukes palace, in the same place where that now builds, standeth. The diuision of the Empire was made in his time, and the Venetians left in their owne liberty. The Citie was diuided into wards, streets, and precincts. The Pregadi, and the Quaranta, who (for criminal offences) was then instituted among them. He gouerned 18. yeares.

11 Giulimiano Participatio, hauing beene an associate in the dignity with his father, was (after his death) confirmed by the people. Hee repealed home his brother Iohn, who was then at Constantinople, & accepted him as his fellow ruler: hee made the peoples authority greater then before, & gaue ayde to Michael the Emperour against the Sarazins. The body of Saint Marke was in his time brought from Alexandria, accepting it into his protection, and the Church remaining at this day, was consecrated in his memory. He died the second yeare of his dignity.

12 Giovanni Participatio, remained in the royalty, and enlarged the Church of S. Marke, placing therein a great number of Priests and Canons, & appointing a Primicerio to gouerne them. Hee caused the head of Obelerio to be cut off, whome hee had besieged in the Isle of Curtia. He made war vpon the Nauratines, and ouercame them. In the end, a conspiracy was deuised against him, and beeing confined to Grada, in the eight yeare of his Principality, hee shaued his head and beard, and made himselfe a Monke, in which estate he dyed.

13 Pietro Tradomico of Pola, hauing carried himselfe to the peoples contentment in the warres against Pepin, was elected Duke. He ioyned Iohn his son in rule with him, and gaue succour to the Emperour of Constantinople, who made request thereof by Theodosius Patricius. He was made Protospatary of the Empire: in help whereof, he sent 60. Gallies. Lewes 2. granted him many priuiledges, and in the end, hee was slaine by a sedition, in his 27. yeare.

14 Orso Participatio hauing appealed the sedition, was made Du. The Turks hauing spoiled Dalmatia, euen so far as Grada, were vanquished by him and Giovanni Participatio his son, whom he made associat with him in his gouernment. Basilus the Emperour, highly honoured him for that good service, and made him Protospatary of the Empire. He gouerned 17. yeares.

15 Giovanni Participatio, being confirmed in his dignity, tooke and burned Coma- chio, wasted the Countie of Rauenna, to reuenge himself on the Count of Comachio, who had imprisoned and wounded into death his Brother Bradoario. He growing ouercome with sicknesse, caused the Church of Saint Cornelius, and S. Cyprian to be built at Malomocco, and hauing gouerned five yeares, and sixe moneths, renounced the Dignity.

16 Pietro Candiano, was elected after the voluntary dismission of his Predecessour. He was a valiant man, and verie expert in Armes; and yet notwithstanding, greatly addicted to deuotion. He went (in person) with ten Gallies against the Nauratines, who (as Theeues) robbed and pryloined from the Venitians. Fighting valiantly against them, hee dyed at the second time, with the Weapons in his handes. He gouerned no longer then fife moneths.

Dominico Tribuno, is set (by some) in ranke with the Dukes: but others, lesse curious in search of the History, haue omitted him, because he was duke but three moneths, and thirteene dayes, and nothing is remarkable in his time, but a certaine priuiledge, granted by him to Chioggia.

17 Pietro Tribuno, sonne of Dominico, was elected Duke. He obtained of Guydo, Emperour and King of Italy, a confirmation of all ancient Priuiledges. The Barbarian Hunnes came againe into Italy, and burned Heraclae, Capo de Argier, and Chioggia. This Prince ouercame them, with very much honour: and this was the third time, that those Strangers fought to vsurp on that State. He gouerned twenty foure yeares.

18 Orso Badoaro, called himselfe Participatio, and was the first that chaunged his name. He sent for his sonne Pietro to Constantinople, and hee was made Protospatary. In the yeare nine hundred and twentie, hee obtained of Rodolphus, Emperour and King of Italy, the confirmation of the Venitians ancient authority, to stampe Moneyes. Hee addedd himselfe wholly to piety, and in his 30. yeare, he renounced the Dignitie, to make himselfe a Monke, and liue priuately.

19 Pietro Candiano the second, was a worthy man, and made Warre on Lanterio, Marquesse of Istria, who hindred the Traffike of the Venitians. He ouercame him him, and re-conquered the people of Capo d'Istria. He vanquished Albertus sonne to the Emperour Berengarius, who impatronizing himselfe of Rauenna, impeached the passage of the Venitians shippes. In his time, Maidens were stolen by the Testaines, to ioyn in marriage with them; but they were soone recouered. He gouerned seuen yeares.

20 Pietro Badoaro, the sonne of Orso, was redeemed by him from the Sclauonians. He gouerned but two yeares and seuen moneths, alwayes in peace, which he much affected. Berengarius the Emperour did him many fauours, for his great deserts.

21 Pietro Candiano the third, sonne to the second Candiano, associated himselfe in his dignity with his sonne Pietro: and at two seuerall times armed three & thirty Shippes against the Narentines; but at the second time, he made peace with the. His sonne being reproued by him for his bad behauiour, reuolted from him, and against the Common-wealth. The people would haue slaine him, but hee was sent thence into exile: wher ioyning with Guydo, sonne of Berengarius, hee endangered the Commonwealth: wherat his Father greewing, died in his fiftenth yeare of gouernment.

22 Pietro Candiano the fourth, being repealed from exile (albeit the people had sworne neuer to receiue him) was made Prince with very great applause. He dealt in such sort with Pope Iohn the twelfth, that the Church of Grada was made Patriarchall, and Metropolitane of all the Venitians State, and of Istria. Otho the Emperour, granted him many honourable priuiledges. He ruined Vderzo, and was slaine with his Sonne in a sedition of the people, hauing gouerned about twentie yeares.

23 Pietro Orscolo, was a man altogether deuout, and was elected by the people against his will. He would very often walk in an vnknowne habit, to visit the houses of poore people and Hospitals. Hee appeased the dissensions between the Venitians, and them of Capo d'Istria, who yielding themselves tributary, hee went with Nesto Romualdo of Rauenna, to liue Religiously. He gouerned two yeares and two moneths, doing many worthy and charitable deeds.

24 Vitale Candiano, Sonne of Pietro the third, made the confederacy with the Emperour Otho. He fell sicke so soone as hee came vpon his charge: wherefore hee became a Monke, hauing gouerned about a yeare.

25 Tribuno Memo, was very rich, but no man of State. In his time happened great dissensions, betwene the families of Moresina and Caloprias; by reason whereof, many notorious murders were committed. He tooke part with the Morisini, which caused the faction to withdraw themselves to Verona, to the Emperour Otho. He gaue the Isle of S. Giorgio Maggiore to the Abbot of Moresini: and renounced the Principality in his twelfth yeare, entering into Religion.

26 Pietro Orscolo the second, beeing a very discrete man, ordered the matter so well with the Emperours Basilus and Alexius: that the Venitians were exempted from Tolles and Taxations. Otho the Emperour lying at Verona, did highly fauour him; and, among other graces, to holde one of his sonnes at Baptisme. Hee was the first that extended their Confines on the Sea, winning many places in Istria and Dalmatia. Hauing caused the Church and Pallace to be finished in his time, hee dyed in the eighteenth yeare of his Principality.

27 Ottone Orscolo, hauing Gouerned some space with his father Pietro, was confirmed in the dignity, at the age of eighteene yeares. He wunne such reputation, that Geta King of Hungaria, gaue him one of his Sisters in marriage. In person he conquered them of Istria, who were become Rebelles; and went into Dalmatia, in the enterprize agaynst Cresfransu. At length, the malicious enuiers of his glories, deuised a Conspiracie agaynst him, vpon the which, he was confined into Grece, in the seauenteenth yeare of his rule.

28 Pietro Centranice, or Barbolano, succeeded next to Otho. But hauing not well qualified all dissensions, as well concerning the Cittizens remoouing, as the other Neighbours; he was compelled to forsake the dignity, and make himselfe a Monke. Orso, Brother of Otho, returned from Constantinople, beeing Patriarche of Grada, and he was constituted in expectation of Othos coming. He continued about a yeare in the Palace, and forsooke the Principality, newes being brought of Othos death. Dominico Orseolo would then perforce usurp the dignity; but he was expelled by the people the next morning, & died at Raenna.

29 Dominico Flabanico, was elected during his exile, by the faction of them that had excluded Dominico Orseolo. In his time and in the year 1040. the national Council was held, for government of the Ecclesiasticks. He made the family of Orseolo suspicious to the State, by his owne meanes, and laboured for their vtter supplantation. He gouerned ten yeares, foure months, and twelue dayes.

30 Dominico Contarini was verie pleasing to the people. He brought Dalmatia to peace, being heavily burthened with the rebellion of Zara. He fauoured the Normans against Robert King of Apulia. And the discord which hapned betweene the Common-wealth, and Papa, Patriarch of Aquileia, was by him qualified. Hee builded the Monasterie on the Lido, and dyed in the eight and twenty yeare of his Principality.

31 Dominico Silino, won himselfe such reputation, that Nicephorus, Emperour of Constantinople, gaue him his sister in marriage; by whose perswasion, he made war vpon the forenamed King Robert of Apulia, and (at the first attempt) returned with a very honourable victory, possessing himselfe of Duras. But at his second aduventure, hee fought with small aduantage; whereby ensued the diminution of his credit. He pergetted the Church of Saint Marke with Marble, first and before any other, causing it also to be beautified with an artificiall Checkerworke. He died in the thirteenth yeare of his gouernment.

32 Vitale Faliero being made Duke, he immediately obtained of Alexius, then Emperour, to haue the soueraignie of Dalmatia and Croatia. Henry, successor in the Empire, did him many great fauors: and comming in deuotion to Venice, hee helde one of his daughters at Baptisme. The Office of proprietaries was constituted in his time, and the workmanship of S. Markes Church continued. He died in his sixteenth yeare.

33 Vitale Michele, by his worthy aduentioning on the sea, did very farre extend the Commonwealthes limites. Hee made the Easterne warre (by the perswasion of Pope Urban the second) for Conquest of the Holy Land, with the Princes of Christendome. The Isle of Smyrna, Suria, and Ierusalem were then recovered from the Infidels. He died in his sixt yeare.

34 Ordelscho Faliero, sonne of Vitale, assisted King Baldwine against the Infidels in conquest of the holy Land: and made such progression, as they deuided the Empire betweene them, thoroughout all the kingdom of Iudea. In the 8. yeare of his Principality, Malomocco was almost alburied and submerged; by reason whereof, the Episcopal See was transferred to Chioggia. He went in person to the Warre against Zara, which was become rebellious, and winning the victory: he would needs returne thither againe a second time, and on the like occasion, where hee died in Armes, in the fifteenth yeere of his Principality.

35 Dominico Michele, being made Duke for his high repute and merite, went to giue aide to the Christians in the Holie Land. With 200. well appointed shippes and Gallies, he made the Infidels to raise their sledge from before Ioppa. Hee tooke Tyre, which he gaue to Paimond Patriarch of Ierusalem. Emanuel the Emperour made war against him, fro whom he won Chio, Rhodes, Samos, Mitylline, and Ister. He renounced his principality, in the 13. yeare of his rule.

36 Pietro Polani, kinsman to Michele, was a very wise man, in so much as he was made Arbitrator of the difference between Conrade and Emanuel the Emperour. Hee made war against them of Pisa & Padua, whom he conquered. He armed himselfe against the Duke of Apulia, in behalfe of the same Emanuel, to whose Empire hee added many worthy possessions. Some say, it was his sonne that won all the battailes, and that himselfe being false sicke, returned thence, and dyed in his 18. yeare of rule.

37 Dominico Morefisi, hee swept the Gulfe of certaine Pyrats of Ancona, the cheefe whereof being called Guiscardo, was taken and hanged. Hee layed sledge vnto Pola, which he tooke, with Parenteo; which Citties were become rebellious in Iliria. He held confederacy with William king of Sicily, of whom hee obtained many many exemptions for the Traffike of his Merchants. Zara made the Metropolitane Cittie (at his instance) and hee so preuayled, that Dominico his Sonne was made an Earle. Hee beautified the Buildings of the Cittie of Venice, and began the Tower of Saint Marke. He dyed seauen months after the eight yeare of his Election.

38 Vitale Michele the second, subdued the Tarentines, which now had rebelled the third time: He imprisoned Prich, Patriarch of Aquileia, and twelue Chanoys. In an hundred dayes, he put forth an hundred Gallies, and twentie Shippes on the Sea, against the Emperour Emanuel. The great Family of the Iustiniani, were, in his time brought to one onely man, and hee was become Religious; whom hee tooke forth of his Monastery (by the Popes consent) and gaue him his owne daughter in marriage, because hee would not haue so worthy a house to be extinct. There hapned a great Pestilence in his time, the occasion whereof, the people (in their weake iudgment) laid vpon him. He was wounded, and dyed, hauing gouerned seuentene yeares, and xxvii. daies.

39 Sebastiano Ziani, was the first that euer was elected by the eleauen Electors. In his time there was a great Schisme in the Church, by meanes of the Emperour Fredericke Barbarossa, who caused Alexander the third to forsake the See, Ottavian hauing bene made Anti-pope, Alexander made his retirement to Venice, where hauing a long time serued in the Monastery of La Charita, he was in the end known, and taken thence by the Prince and Seignoury. Heereupon, Barbarossa made warre against the Venetians: but his sonne Ottavian being taken, he mediated reconciliation betweene them. He died in the fift yeare of his gouernment.

40 Orio Malpiero, or Maltepreira, was the first Duke elected by the forty, and for that purpose was created by the death of Ziani. Hee had sixe Concellors allowed him to authorize his deliberations. Hee reconquered Zara, that had now the fourth time rebelled. Hee sent supply vnto the Christians against the Moores, who began to usurpe in the holy Land 88. yeares after that Baldwine had deliuered it. Protonotarius was recovered, and Andronicus, successor to Emanuel the Emperour, deliuered many Venitian Marchants. Hee renounced the Principality in his 14. yeare, and entred into Religion.

41 Henrico Dandolo was likewise elected by the forty. They of Zara were once againe vanquished, and Pola conquered. 43 Giacomo Tiepolo, was made Duke by chance, in concurrence of Renier Candalo, who had as many voices as he. Candalo rebelled, and the seditious were severely chastised. Zara, that had long borne the yoke, was now reduced vnder obedience. He had Warre against them of Ferrara, and against Essexino, who would haue inuested himselfe with Padua. In conclusion, he gaue ouer the Principality in his 20. yeare, and died soone after.

44 Marino Morefisi, was made Duke by the one and fortieth, by reason of the precedent concurrence. In his time was another Courty Noble man sent into Candia, who builded the Canea. He made Warre against Essexino, who besseged Manissa, and who (in a furious rage) slewed 1200. Paduans to behoewe in peeces, which he had with him then in his armie. He died in the 4. yeare of his Principality.

45 Renier Zeno Podescha at Bernengo, was elected Duke, and sent to be seerch thence with foure Gallies. Vnder him, the Commonwealth wonne a famous victorie, against them of Genes: but the contentment therewith was very breefe, because Michaell Paleologus, expelled both the French-men and Venitians out of Constantinople, being ayded by the Geneway forces, which was eight and fifty yeares after the surprizing of the sayde Cittie: yet once more (after that) the selfesame people were againe reconquered: and hauing gouerned this dignitie 16. yeares, he dyed.

46 Lorenzo Tiepolo was made Duke, in memory of the victory hee had against them of Genes at Tyre. Hee allyed two of his sonnes (verie Nobly) with two strange Ladies: by reason whereof, a Lawe was then made, that the like might not be afterward done. He brought Serbia in obedience to the Common-wealth, and the Bolognians were vanquished by him: hee gouerned seuen yeares, and fise and twenty dayes.

47 Giovanni Contarini, being aged eighty yeares, and Attorney of S. Mark, was made Duke. The law against illegitimates was then enacted, and they excluded from all publike Offices. There were some rebellions moued in Iliria, and by them of Genes; but they were quickly appeased. At length, thorough vnelidicness of age, and by aduice of the Senat, hee gaue ouer the dignitie, hauing gouerned in this authority four yeares, and six moneths.

48 Giovanni Dandolo was elected, being then absent. The City was (in his time) much afflicted by water, & an earthquake. He made warre in Iliria, agaynst the Patriarch of Aquileia, and the Count of Gortia. At the instance of Pope Nicholas, he assisted the Archbishop of Tripoli with 25. Gallies. He died seuen moneths after his eight yeare of rule.

49 Pietro Gradenigo, a man of great courage, deliuered the Common-wealth from two important dangers. One, was a high disgrace, which happened in a battell against them of Genes. The other was the conspiracy of Balamonte, which was boldly checked with weapon in hand, vpon the place of S. Marke. It was then ordayned, that Noblemen onely should gouerne, and the counsell of ten was then instituted. Hauing ruled 22. yeares, and nine moneths, he dyed.

50 Marino Giorgio, was a man of such life, that they termed him a Saint. Venice was continually excommunicated in his time, by reason of the taking of Ferrara. Zara rebelled again the sixt time, & much labour it cost, to reduce it vnder obedience againe. After hee builded the Monastery of Saint Dominicke, and died (at the age of eighty and one yeares) in his first yeare, hauing gouerned ten months, and ten dayes.

52 Giovanni Soranzo, had the honor of reconquering Zara, and many other places, which had reuolued in his predecessours time. Negropont, was re-obtained, & war afresh commenced against them of Genes. The excommunication was quitted from Venice, by the interposition of Francisco Dandolo, kneeling before the Pope, with a Chaîne of iron about his necke. The number of Attorneys of S. Marke, was increased to sixe. Hee gouerned fixteene yeares, and six moneths.

52 Francisco Dandolo, who had so lowly humbled himselfe for his Countreys good, was therefore exalted to her highest dignity. They of Fola, and of Valesia, submitted themselves to the Common-wealth, which gaue way vnto the warre against the Patriarch of Aquileia. Padua was taken on Albert Scaliger, and Trenisfa, and the County remained to the Common-wealth. This man was of the league with the Christian Princes, against the Turke, and in his time were fixtie seuerall Ambassadors at Venice. He gouerned ten yeares, and ten moneths.

53 Bartholomeo Gradenigo, Attorney of S. Marke, was made Duke at twenty fix yeares of age, by the intercession of Andrea Dandolo, and his cessation. In his time was Venice myraculously deliuered from a mighty imminent inundation. Candie rebelled, and the rebelles were severely punished. There hapned a great dearth in the City, which droue the people to discontentment: he dyed in his fourth yeare.

54 Andrea Dandolo, who had before resigned his place vnto Bartholomeo Gradenigo, caused the dearth for to cease; by sending for great store of Corne out of Sicily. Hee obtained of the King of Babylon, free Nauigation into Egypt. Zara rebelled the seauenth time, and was reprinted.

The Warre betweene them of Genes and the City, was troubled by two great accidents: happenings; the one, was an Earth-quake very dreadful, and the other, was a greuous Pestilence: Hee gouerned twelue yeares, wanting some fewe moneths.

55 Marino Faliero, was elected Duke, being then Ambassador at Rome. Hauing

recei-

received an iniurie by some particulars, which was not reuenged according vnto his owne desire: hee determined in the eighty yeare of his age, to make himselfe absolutely Lord, without any controule. The conspiracy being discouered by Nicholas Lion, he had his head smitten off with in the Pallace. And it was ordayned, that his Picture should not be placed amongst the other dukes, but the place being left voyde, had only this Writing: This is the place of Marino Faliero, who, for his grievous offence, had his head cut off: hee was duke but ten moneths.

56 Giovanni Gradenigo had an excellent spirit, but a much mis-shapen countenance. The warre was renewed against the Genes, which terminated with a mutual peace. He had warre against the King of Hungarie for Dalmatia. Trenisfa was besieged in his time, and thither he went in person. Hee gouerned one yeare, three moneths and foureteene dayes.

56 Giovanni Delfino, was elected Duke when hee was in Trenisfa, defending it against the King of Hungary. The Senate sent to demand free passage for him; which being denyed, he came forth with two hundred horse to heare the enemy, and so attained to Marghera, where the Senate in person receiued him. In short time he gaue end to this warre, and recovered Conciliano, Servalla, and Asola. He made peace for the souerainty of Dalmatia; and dyed aged forty and five yeares, hauing gouerned four yeares, two moneths, and cleuen dayes.

58 Lorenzo Celsa, vpon a false bruite, of a victory against them of reuolued Genes; was made Duke in concurrence of Pietro Gradenigo, Leonardo Dandolo, and Marco Cornaro. Candie rebelled againe, and it was regained with a very great difficulty. On this occasion, a lutt and feast was publicly made in the place of Saint Marke: he dyed two daies after the fourth yeare of his Principallitie.

59 Marco Cornaro, a man very wise and learned, was sent into Candie, which was rebellious, and there he made a cruel bloody warre: the Pope graunting plenary Indulgence to all such as went thither. The Rebels being severely punished, the common-wealth sent to Pope Vrbane the fixt, a certwaine number of their Gallies. He gouerned two yeares, five moneths, and four and twentie dayes:

60 Andrea Contarini, fled to the Paduans fearing to be elected Duke, and as prefiging the ruine which (in his time) would betide the Common-wealth. First of all, he made warre with them of Trenisfa, then soone after, with Carrara for the confines of Padua: and such was the fortune, that Chioggia being taken, the City of Venice found it selfe to bee in extreame danger. But in the end, he went and opposed himselfe (in person) against the enemies, vanquished them, and regained Chioggia: he dyed, hauing gouerned fiteene yeares, four moneths, and fiteene daies.

61 Michele Morosini, was a man well furnished with Learning and Wisdom. Some say, that in his time the life of Theodosius was taken, and not in the time of his predecessour Contarini. There were diuers Lawes then made (and amongst others) it was ordayned, that Homicides, who had formerly benee hangd, should afterwards haue their heads smitten off. He liued but four moneths, and five daies in his dignitie, and dyed in the threescore and foureteene yeare of his age.

62 Antonio Venier, was a rigorous obseruer of Iustice. He confined one of his owne Sonnes in exile, because he had (ouer-lightly) offended the familie of a noble Venitian. Hee made league with Galeazzo the Vicount, against Carrara, where-vpon he tooke Padua. He assisted the Emperour Emmanuel against the Turke; and gaue aid also vnto Sigismund, King of Hungaria, who afterwards came to the Empire. The place of Saint Marke, and that of the Rialto, were greatly beautified in his time. Hee dyed two moneths, and three dayes, after the eighteenth yeare of his rule.

63 Michele Steno, had the dignitie of Attorney of Saint Marke, with that of Duke. Hee wonne an important battell against the Genewais. Carrara was now the last time vanquished, and Padua and Verona surprized. They of Piscenza, to free themselves from his tyrannie, yielded themselves to the Common-wealth. Ladislaus King of Hungary, did likewise forgoe Zara: Hee dyed, hauing gouerned thirteene yeares, and three dayes.

64 Thomas Mocenigo, was first General of the Gouffe. He embraced peace, to the end, that the Citizens might traffike.

Filina

Vdina became obedient to the Commonwealth, with the Countrey of Friuli; by means of the Lords of Sauorgnani, who were made noble-men of Venice. The Florentines were also succoured against the Duke of Milaine. In his tenth yere he died.

65 Francesco Foscarini stoutly repressed the Duke of Milaine, who proceeded too farre on the liberties of Italy. Brescia, Bergamo, and other Citties of Lombardy were then wonne: amongst which were Loda and Parma, and Rauenna in Romania. Hee made also a large progresse on the Seas, such into Morea. The Senate assisted Paleologus the Emperour, against the Turks, who vnrped Constantinople, in the yere 1453. Hee was made Arbitrator by the Duke of Milaine, in certaine differences of neighbour-hood. The King of Dacia was made a noble Venitian: And afterward, the Duke (in regarde of his age and infirmities) was dismissed, having gouerned thirty foure yeares, and fixe moneths.

66 Paschale Malapiero, was appointed in the place of Foscarini, being Attorney of Saint Marke, who dyed two dayes after his dismissal. He made a Lawe, That in following times, the Duke should not be deposed. In his dayes, the famous Arte of Printing was brought into Venice. The Arts were greatly encreased: And hee maintayned the people in peace, during foure yeares, fixe moneths, and fixe daies that he gouerned.

67 Christophoro Moro, a Procurator of Saint Marke, was made Duke. He liued for some time in peace, till the second yere of his gouernement; and then the Turke (proud of his surprizall of Constantinople) declared warre against the Venitians. He made peace with Pope Pius the fift, and the Duke of Burgundy: But the Pope dying, they remayned alone, and maintayned warre which lasted twentie yeares. And yet he dyed, hauing reigned nine yeares, and fixe moneths.

68 Nicholo Trono had such good hap, that (in his time) the Commonwealths affaires went well against the Turke. Pietro Mocenigo, General in the Archipelagus, vnnited his power with the Pope. The king of Naples, and they of Rhodes sent eightie five gallies together, and tooke Satalia, a City of Pamphilia. He made league likewise with the King of Persia, against the Turke. James King of Cyprus comming to Venice, espoused Catharina Cornara, adoptiue daughter of Saint Marke. He gouerned one yere, eight moneths, and fixe dayes.

69 Nicholo Marcello, Attorney of Saint Marke, after some laws made by the Correctors, was elected Duke. In his time there was a conspiracie in Cyprus, to haue the Kingdome fall into the power of Ferdinand King of Naples. Pietro Mocenigo went thither with a great Armie, where he appealed all troubles, and feuerly chastised the Rebels. Scutari, a Cittie in Liburnia, was besieged by the Turke, and valiantly defended by Antonio Loredano. This duke gouerned one yere, foure moneths, and seuentene dayes.

70 Pietro Mocenigo was elected Duke, in desert of all his worthy deedes. Lepanto was besieged in his time by the Turke, and vertuously maintayned by Antonio Loredano. They brought their power likewise before the Isle of Stalimens, but the same Loredano (by his valour) defended it. The daughter to King Ferdinand came to Venice, with the Cardinall her brother, where they were royally entertained. This Prince caused a Money to be stamped, which hee furnished by his owne name: And gouerned but two yeares, and nine moneths.

71 Andrea Vendramino had such ill hap in his gouernement, that the Venitian Army was two severall times put to flight by the Turkes: Once, neare to Croja in Albania, and the other in the countrey of Friuli. He was a goodly man of person, and had a most beautifull Lady to his wife, by whom he had as goodly children, whom he allied in marriage with the chiefe Families: he gouerned one yere, and eight moneths.

72 Gionanni Mocenigo, brother to Pietro Mocenigo, hauing continued the warre against the Turke, in the end made peace with him: ordering the matter so, that he left Scutari and Stipula in liberty of Commerce, and power to keepe a Deputie at Constantinople. Hee made warre against Ferdinand King of Naples, at the instance of Pope Sixtus the fourth, which occasioned the long warre called Sociale. In the end, peace was made, the Commonwealth hauing gotten Rouigo & Polefano. The Cittie became much disgraced by fire, and a pestilent sickenesse: The prince dyed, dyed, hauing reigned seauen yeares, and fixe moneths.

73 Marco Barbarigo, the plague being ceased, caused all to be new builded, which the fire had defaced in the Pallace. Hee was greatly differing from all other Princes, to wit, in pardoning, and forgetting particular injuries doone vnto him: but such as were comitted against the State, he would haue reuenged with strictest feueritie. The grand Signeur or Turke sent a particular Ambassadour vnto him, to congratulate his election. He gouerned but nine moneths.

74 Agostino Barbarigo, withstood the progresse of Charles the eighth King of France, when hee made warre against them of Arragon, for the Kingdome of Naples, which he conquered. The Turke vnrped on the Common-weales of Lepanto, Modona, and Corona. The Kingdome of Cyprus was brought vnder the tutelage of the Senate, and Qu. Catharina brought thence to Venice. The office of la Sante was created, by occasion of the pestilence: This Duke gouerned fiftene yeares, and twenty one dayes.

75 Leonardo Laureadano sustained a very rigorous war, against the chiefe Princes of the world: there beeing a League made betweene the Emperour Maximilian, the King of France; them of Naples, and the Dukes of Sauoy, Ferrara, and Manina, incited thereto by Pope Iulius the second. All the whole estate of firme land was surprized, except Trevisa, but in the end it was recovered. He liued in the Principality nineteene yeares, eight moneths, and twenty dayes.

76 Antonio Grimani, being General, had a most infamous dis-rout or foile, by which occasion, hee was dismissed of the charge of Procurator of Saint Marke, and confined to Cherso. He brake his limitation, and withdrew himselfe to Rome to the Cardinall his sonne: where he had so many worthy Offices imposed vpon him, as, not onely he was re-established in his Attorneys place againe; but he was likewise made Duke, at the age of foure score and two yeares, and gouerned but one yere, ten moneths, and two dayes.

77 Andrea Gruti, gaining the best part of the glorie, for the reprizall of Padua, was in very great esteeme. Hee dealt with the King of France, (to whome he was prisoner) that his Maiestie allied himselfe with the Commonwealth, and Brescia and Verona were reconquered. He knew very well, how to make his carriage pleasing to the Senate, during the warres betweene Charles the fifth, Emperour, and King Frances the first, as also against Solyman. He gouerned fiftene yeares, seauen moneths, and eight dayes.

78 Pietro Lando continued the defence of the Commonwealth against the Turke: with whom (at last) he made a peace, knowing how to make vse thereof, and maintaine his owne charge, whilest the warre continued betweene Charles the fift, and King Frances the first. Hee gouerned fixe yeares, and eight moneths.

79 Francesco Donato, making benefite also of this peace, beautified the Cittie with many goodly buildings, besides that of the Pallace. He sent succor to the Emperour, against certaine Rebels in Germanie. The Princes of Gwisle, coming to Venice in his time, were entertained as fitted their degree. He gouerned seauen yeares, and fixe moneths.

80 Marco Antonio Trevisano, a man altogether deuout, laboured that the Commonwealth might abound in goodnesse and ciuill manners; preuenting (by his owne worthy example) that vices should not be winced at, as, in too many countreies they are. He gouerned a yere, wanting three dayes.

81 Francesco Veniero, could so well skill of gouerning the Commonwealth, that albeit the Turke (in his time) made warre in Apulia, and the King of France in Tuscany: yet all was well at Venice, and the Queene of Poland royally welcommed thither. He gouerned two yeares, one moneth and twenty dayes.

82 Lorenzo Priuli, was solicited (by the Pope) to make warre against the Emperour. But, he being a friend to the Commonwealth, by no means would offend him, but mediated a pacification of those affaires. In his time peace was made betweene France and Spain, and Charles the fift dyed. This Prince gouerned three yeares, eleauen moneths, and eight dayes.

83 Girolamo Priuli, brother to the preceeding prince, enioyed those great honors, which Pope Pius the fourth gaue vnto the common-wealth: And all his delight was to heare ambassadors in the hall of Kings.

In his time the Council of Trent was concluded, whither he sent (as Ambassadors) Nicholo de Ponte, and Mattheo Dandolo.

The Common-wealth helde (at Baptisme) the sonne to the Duke of Sauoy, by a Deputie borne of Margueret of France. He dyed, hauing gouerned eight yeares, two moneths, and foure dayes.

84 Pietro Loredano, by the concurrence of two others, was elected Duke, contrarie to the hope of all, or his owne expectation. The Arsenal was burned in his time, and there then also happened a very great dearth of all things. Selim, successour of Solyman, tooke occasion to breake peace with the Common-wealth, demanding of them the kingdome of Cyprus, and moued warre vpon this Subiect. He gouerned foure yeares, fiue moneths, and eight dayes.

85 Luigi Mocemiga, warre being kindled against the Turke, lost the kingdome of Cyprus, Nicosia being taken, and Famagosta surrendered. The Common-wealth made league with Pope Pius the fifth, and Philip King of Spaine, so that their armies (being ioyned together in the yeare of our Lord, one thousand fiue hundred seueny one) they obtayned a worthy victorie against the Turkes. Soone after, Henry the third, king of France, came to Venice, where he was magnificently entertained. This Prince dyed in his seauenth yeare.

86 Sebastiano Veniero, was elected by common voyce, and with such applause, that diuers Turkes ranne to him and kissed his fecte. He created fiue Correctours of the Lawes, for ruling the affaires of the Pallace. The City was deliuered of a dangerous plague, and the Pallace was againe very greatly defaced by fire. This prince gouerned not aboue a whole yeare.

87 Nicholo de Ponte, was created Duke, a man very learned in all the Sciences, and whereof hee had made publike profession in Venice. He passed thorow all the honors of the Common-wealth, wherewith the Citizens could possibly gratifie him. The Seminary of Saint Marke was instituted by him. Certaine princes of Iapponia arriving then at Venice, were by him most honourably entertained. He builded the bridge of Canareggio: and gouerned seuen yeares, nine moneths, and thirteen dayes.

88 Paschale Cicogna, Procuratour of S. Marke, was elected when he was at diuine

Service in the Church. In his time there was great warres, betweene France and Spayne about Piedmont, and betweenthe Emperour and the Turke, for some parts in Hungaria. He caused the towne of Palma to bee builded, in the confines of the Countrey of Friuli, and a new castile or fortress, in the Isle of Cephalonia. He had the honor of the wonderfull bridge of the Rialto, which he builded: And gouerned ten yeares, or thereabout.

89 Marino Grimini, Procuratour of Saint Marke, was so highly in grace and fauour of the people, that on the day of his Election; they declared extraordinary signes of ioy, and continued them for many following dayes. The second yeare of his Principality, he caused the dutcheffe his wife to be crowned in great triumph. At which time, Pope Clement the eight sent her the Rose of gold. In his time was much ioy and triumph made, for the peace concluded betweenthe Kings of France and Spayne. Vpon occasion of the Popes comming to Ferrara, obtained by the Ecclesiasticall Estate, the Cardinal Aldobrandino passed thence to Venice, where he was most honourably wel-comed, with diuers other Cardinalls. There was such an extraordinary ouer-flow of waters, in the fift yeare of his Principality, that the Barkes, Boates, and Gundoloos floated on the place of Saint Marke, euen as if they had bene in a full maine riuer. He dyed, and was much moaned of the people, hauing gouerned ten yeares, and eight moneths.

90 Leonardo Dandolo, hauing by his worthy deseruings, singuler wisdom and dexterity, mannaged passed affaires, and gone thorow all honors of the Common-wealth, giuing euident testimonie of his care and faithfullnesse; was aduanced in the place of Grimani, the tenth day of Ianuary, 1606. He had bene sent Ambasadour to Constantinople to Mahomet (hee being newly come to the Empire of the East) in the Common-wealths name, to salute him with accustomed complements. He hath such a practick braine, & so happily a memory, seated in a soule so religiously zealous for common benefite; that the Senate hath referred more vnto him, than to any other of his Predecessours.

The Citie hath (in his time) bene communicated, by Paulus Quintus, now Pope, Pope, about some pretentions appertaining to his See: But it may well be sayd of this Prince, that, against such Thunder-clappes and Lightning flashes, hee hath shewne himselfe an immouable rocke, in defence of that estate in generall. In like manner, two principall Pillers of Christendome, threatned great disaster and ruine: but that most Christian Henry the fourth, King of France, embracing those two Colomnes, vpheld both the one and other, and redressed all discontentment, by the entermise of his Ambassadors, and hath erected a triumphall Arche, to the immortalitie of his glorie. This Prince now liuing happily in peace, doth daily acknowledge to France, his particular affection for such fauour, & may (in time) much better declare it. God long preferue him, and all other good Princes.

CHAP. III.

¶ Of Wounds made by Gun-shot, and other ferie Engines.

In the yeare of our Lord, 1536. the victorious king Frances sent a great Armie vnto Piedmont, to Viaille Thurin, and to recover those townes and castles, which had bene taken by the Marquesse Du Guesle, Lieutenant generall of the Emperour, where Monsieur the Constable, then great Master, was Lieutenant generall of the Army, and Monsieur de Monte-jan Captaine generall of the Footmen (of whom I was then Chirurgian.) A great part of the Armie arrived at the Pas of Suse, where we found the enimie keeping the passage, and had made vnto themselves certayne forts and trenches, in such sort, that before they could be raied from thence, wee entered into battell: in which conflict there was many hurt and slaine, as well on the one side as on the other. But they were enforced to quit that passage, and to recover the castles, which they held not long, but were compelled to giue it vp, marching away in their shirts onely, hauing each of them a white W and in their hands: of whom, the most part went to the Castle of Villane, where there was about some two hundred Spaniards. To this castle my Lord the Constable drew his forces, because hee would make his way cleare before him. It is situate vpon a little Mountaine, which giueth great assurance to those within, that there can bee no Ordinance planted against it, to batter it downe. They were summoned to restore it vp, or else were threatned to haue it battered in peeces, which they flatly refused: answering withall, that they were as good and faithfull seruants to the Emperour, as Monsieur the Constable was to the King his maister. Their answer being vnderstoode, the same night there was mounted two great Cannons, by the force of armes with ropes and cordes, by the Switzers, where, (as misfortune would) those cannons being planted, a Gunner by indiscretion fired a barrel of Gun-powder, wherewith he himselfe was extreemely burned, together with tenne or twelue soldiers. Moreover, the flame of the powder was the cause of the discouerie of the Ordinance, whereby those of the Castle, the night following, discharged their Ordinance at that place where they discouered our Cannons; insomuch, that we had many of our men hurt and slaine.

The morrow after, very early wee beganne the battery, and in few houres after the breach was made; which those of the Castle perceiuing, desired a parley, but it was too late; for in the meane time some of our foot-men, perceiuing them to be astonished, mounted the breach, and entered the Castle, putting euery man to the sword, except onely a certaine beautifull Piedmontese, which a great Lord entertained into his seruice. The Captaine and Ancient were taken aliue, but were presently after hanged vpon the Gate of the Towne, to terrifie the rest of the Emperours souldiers, not to be so foole-hardie, to hold such places against so great an armie. Now, the souldiers of the Castle seeing our men rushing in vpon them in such great furie, made all the resistance they could to defend themselves, in killing and wounding a great number of our Souldiers with their pikes and muskets, where the Chirurgians had a great deale of work cut out to their hands.

I was (at that time) but a yong Chirurgian,

The Castle de Villane besieged and taken.

gian, and but little experienced in the Art, because I neuer (as yet) had seene the curation of anie Wounds made by Gun-shot. True it is, that I had read Iohn de Vigo, his first booke of Wounds in generall, chap. 8. where he saith, That those wounds made by fiery Engines, do participate of venosity, because of the Powder; and for their curation, he commands to cauterize them with the Oile of Elders mixed with a little Treacle: yet neuertheless, because I would not be deceived, before I would make vse of the said boyling oile, knowing that it brought with it extreme paine to the Patient, I obserued the methode of other Chirurians in the first dressing of such wounds; which was by the application & infusion of the foresaid Oile, as hot as possibly they could suffer it, with Tents and Setons: wherefore I became emboldened to do as they did. But in the end my oile failed mee, so that I was constrained to vse in stead thereof, a digestiue made of the yolke of an egge, Oile of Roses and Terebinth. The night following, I could hardly sleep at mine ease, fearing lest that for wāt of cauterizing, I should find my Patients, on whom I had not vsed of the foresaid Oyle, dead and empyofoned; which made mee to rise early in the morning to visit them: where, beyond my expectation, I found those on whom I had vsed the digestiue medicine, to feele but little paine, and their wounds without inflammation or tumor, hauing rested well all that night. The rest, on whom the foresaid Oile was applied, I found them inclining to Feauers, with great paine, tumor, and inflammation about their Wounds: then I resolved with my selfe, neuer to burne so cruelly the wounded Patients by Gun-shot any more.

When we entered Thurin, I was tolde of a Chirurgian, who was exceeding famous, especially for his curing wounds made by Gun-shot, with whom I found the means to acquaint my selfe: yet it was neare two yeares and a halfe, before hee would acquaint mee with his Medicine which hee called his Balme. In the meane time, Mounseieur the Marshall of Monte-jan, who was Lieutenant general of the King in Piedmont, dyed: then I tolde this Chirurgian, that I had a desire to returne to Paris, withall, requesting him, that he would performe his promise, which was, to giue me the receit of his Balme, which he willingly did, seeing that I was to leaue that country. He sent me to fetch him two yong whelps, one pound of earth-worms, two pounds of the oyle of Lillies, six ounces of the Terebinth of Perice, and one ounce of Aqua-vita: and in my presence, he boyled the whelps aliuie in the said oile, vntill the flesh departed from the bones. Afterward, he tooke the wormes (hauing before killed and purified them in white Wine, to purge themselves of the earth which they haue alwayes in their bodies:) being so prepared, he boyled them also in the said oile, till they became dry; this he strained thorow a napkin, without anie great expresseion; that doone, hee added thereto the Terebinth: and lastly, the Aqua-vita, and called God to witnesse, that this was his Balme which hee vsed in all wounds made by Gun-shot, and in others which required suppuration; withall, praying me not to divulge his secret.

From thence I returned to Paris, where shortly after, Mounseieur Siluius, Lecturer of the King in Physicke, a man greatly esteemed among learned men, requested me one day to dine with him, which I did willingly; where hee asked me many Questions, and among the rest, of the essence of wounds made by Gunne-shot, and of the combustions made by Gunne-powder. Whereupon, I presently prouoed vnto him, that the powder was not any thing venomous at all; because that no Simple that enters therein is any way venomous, much lesse the composition. Also, I haue seene by experience, that some Souldiers being hurt, will take of the said powder in wine, saying, That powder so taken, doth preferue the body from the ensuing accidents, the which I approue not. Also, others hauing vlcers on their bodies, doe commonly vse of the said powder drie, and heale them without any daunger at all. And as for the Bullets, they can not containe any such heat, that they should haue the facultie of burning: for a bullet being shot against a stone-wall, it may presently be helde in the naked hand, although the collision made against the Stones, should (in reason) heate it the more: And as for combustions or burnings made by Gun-powder, I neuer found any particular accident in it, whereby the cure ought to be diuersified from the cure of other combustions.

buftions. Whereupon, I related this History. A certaine boy of the Kitchen, of Mounseieur the Marshall of Adonte-jan, fell into a Caldron full of oyle, almost boyling hote; to dresse whom being sent for, I went presently to an Apothecarie; demanding of him such cooling medicines, which are commonly applyed vnto burnings. An ancient Countrey-woman being by; hearing mee speake of this burning, counselled me to apply for the first dressing (to prevent the rising of pustules or bladders) of rawe onions, bruised with a little salt. I demanded of this woman, Whether she had euer made experience of that Medicine before: Shee presently sware vnto me in her language; Si meste, à la fe de dé; which did incite me to make experience heereof, on this scullion of the Kitchen, where truly I found the morrow after, that in those parts, where the Onions had touched, to bee altogether free from vessicles or blisters, and the other parts, where the Onions were not applyed, to be much blistered.

Not long after, a certaine Dutch-man, one of the guard of the said Lord de Monte-jan, hauing drunke hard, by indiscretions set his Flask afire, which caused a great disaster, both to his hands and face; and being called to dresse him, I applyed of the saide Onions on the one halfe of his face; and on the other side, of other common remedies. At the second dressing, I found that part where I had applied the Onions, to be altogether without blisters, or any excoriation, and the other altogether blistered: then I first purposed to write of the effect of the said Onions.

Moreover, I tolde vnto the sayd Syluius, that for the better extraction of bullets which are hidden in any part of the body, it is requisite, the Patient should be placed in the same situation, that he was in at that time when he was wounded. Many other things I discovered vnto him, which are contained in this Booke following. My Discourse ended, he prayed me very earnestly, that I would publish it by writings; to the end, that that false opinion of Vico might be altogether abolished, the which I willingly consented vnto, and caused many instruments to be cut, such as had not bene divulged, for the extraction of Bullets, and other vnaturall things out of the body.

And it was first Imprinted in the yeare, 1545. and well receiued, which caused me to renew it agayne, and publish it the second time, in the yeare 1550. and lastly, in the yeare, 1564. where I haue enriched it with many other things, because I haue since followed the warres, haue bene in many battells, and besieged Townes, as in Mos and Iudin. Also, I haue bene entertained into the seruice of five Kings; where I haue alwayes discoursed with the most excellent Physitians and Chirurians of those times, to learne and discover, if there were any other methode or way, to cure those wounds made by gun-shot; whereof the most part (specially those that haue followed the warres, and are guided by reason and experience) are of my opinion, which is, to vse Suppuratiues in the beginning, and not boyling oyles. And I did protest moreouer to the sayd Syluius, that I haue found those wounds as easie to cure (being in fleshy partes) as all other great contused wounds are. But, where the Bullet meeteth with the bones and neruous parts, it teareth, dilacerateth, breaketh, and shuicreth in peeces, not onely where it toucheth, but also the circumiacent parts, without any mercy; causing great accidents, which happen specially in the iointures or ioynts, and in bodies of euill constitution, and in time subiect to corruption, that is to say, where the Ayre is hote and moyst, then is the cure most difficult, and oftentimes impossible; not onely of wounds made by gun-shot, but also of those which are made by other instruments; yea, though they were but in fleshy partes.

Therefore, the foresaid accidents do not proceede from the venosity which is in the powder, or by the combustion or burning of the Bullet. For prooue of which, I will alleadge this obseruation, which I haue experimented (not long since) on the person of the Earle of Gordon, Lord of Achindon, a Scottish-man, whom I cured by the commandement of the Queene-mother, who was hurt with the shot of a Pistoll cleane through both the thighs, without fracture of the bones; he standing so neare the mouth of the Pistoll, that the fire tooke holde of his breeches; neuertheless, hee was perfectly cured in two and thirtie dayes, without a Feauer or anie other euill accident. dress him at S. Iohn de Latran, in the house of the Archishoppe of Glasco, then Ambassadour for Scotland, who came every day to see him dress. Moreouer, for testimony, I could produce Mounseieur Brigard, Doctour Regent in the facultie of Physicke, who was an assistant with me; together with James Guillemain, Chirurgian to the King, and sworne at Paris, who was with me vntill his perfect curation. The same likewise Mounseieur Hautin, Doctour Regent in the faculty of Physicke can testify, who sometimes came to see him. Also Giles Buzet, Scotchman and Chirurgian, cury of them maruailing how hee became so soone cured, without the application of hot and sharp medicines. Now, the reason wherefore I haue made this little Discourse, is to demonstrate, that it is about 30. yeares agoe, since I first found out this manner of curing wounds made by gun-shot, without the vse of boiling oiles, or any other sharp or burning medicines, vnlesse I was constrained to vse them, for such accidents which hapned in Cacochymed bodies, or through the euil disposition and malignancy of the ayre, as I will shew more amply in this Discourse following, which I made vnto the deceased King, after the taking of Rome.

CHAP. IIII.

A Answer vnto a certayne demaund, propounded by the victorious Prince Charles the ninth, as touching the qualitie and Efficacy of wounds made by Gunne-shotte, at his Maiesties retourne from the siege, and taking of the Towne of Rome.

Occasion of this discourse.

One day pleased your Maiestie, together with the Queene-Mother, my L. the prince of La Roche-sur-Yon, and many other Princes and great Lords, to demaund of me how it came to passe, that in these last warres, the most part of such Gentlemen & Soldiers, who were wounded by Gun-shot, & other instruments of war, died, or were very hardly recovered from their diseases, although the wounds they receiued were but of small appaare, and the Chirurgians which were employed for their cures, did performe their duties according to Art; I haue bin the bolder to publish this discourse, to satisfie (in some measure) the duty of my Art, & that my Profession might not be spotted with the least dishonor; and that your Maiestie might vnderstand the reasons, which might haue bin the cause of the death of so many valiant me; the most part of whom I haue seene (to my great griefe) to finish their dayes pitiuously, without any possibilitie in mee, or anie other more experienced then my selfe to giue them remedy.

I know that this following Discourse will astonish some, who reposeing themselves vpon their owne particular opinions, and not examining the matter deeply, will finde the first front of my disputation very strange, because that the contrary hath bene so long imprinted in their fantasies. For I doe hold, that the cause of the malignancy of wounds by Gun-shot, not to proceed from any poyson or venomous quality in the powder (as they imagine) or from the Bullet it selfe, being rubbed or infused in any venomous mixture. Neuerthelesse, if their meekenesse and patience will extend so farre, as first to weigh the moriues, which first moued me to vndertake this subiect, which was a zeale of the publike good; towards the which the Lawe of Nature bindeth me, to shew the vttermost of my power in such things which the singular prouidence of Almighty God hath reuealed vnto me. And secondly, that they will examine with iudgement, the reasons which I shall vse in this present Treatise: then I shall bee certayne, they will both accept my labour thankfully, and free it from all future calummie. Otherwise they will shew themselves to be so ill affectioned toward me, as if I should present my selfe before them, enriched with all the treasures of the auncient Philosophers, and they should place mee in the number of the poorest and ignorantest men in the world. To preuent therefore all the Arguments of venome and poisoning, which the Adversaries heere about mentioned may alledge, I will make it plaine vnto your Maiestie, that such as are wounded by gunne-shot; I say the malignancy of such wounds, not to proceed from the venome of the Powder, being of it selfe simply considered: and much lesse from the obulsion or cauterization which the Bullet Insinuation into the good acceptance of those who are of the contrary opinion.

The present disposition is taken from Philosophers, Physicians and Chirurgians.

The Author propooseth points, which he would rectifie, vnto the poyson of the powder, and the first of the Bullet.

The composition of the powder.

Bullet so heated by the fire of the powder can make in those parts, which it rendeth & dilacerateth thorow the violence thereof: although neuerthelesse some do strue to maintayne; alledging for all, reasons, That a certayne Tower full of powder hath heeretofore bene seene ruinated in an instant, onely by the means of a Cannon shot. Also of a thatched house set on fire with a Musket shotte. Moreouer, because that such wounds which are made by Gunne-shotte, we commonly behold their Orifices and other circum-iacent parts so blacke, as if an actuall Cauter had passed thereon. As also the fall of a certayne escarre, as they say. All which Arguments are so ill framed, that they deserue no authoritie, being builded on so slender a foundation: much lesse, that the resolution of your demaund should be taken from them, as I trust to giue you plainly to vnderstand in the Disputation following. Which (after I had seene a great number of those wounds, and diligently obserued them, handling them according to the methode) I haue collected from the auncient Philosophers, Physicians, and Chirurgians to present vnto your Maiesty, and to withdrawe your minde from the admiration of the lamentable death of so many braue Gentlemen and Souldiers.

Now, to enter into the matter proposed, and to answer the Arguments before alledged, we are first to examine, whether there be any poyson inclosed in the powder, or no: And if there bee, whether it may infect by means of the pretended poyson thereof. Which, that it may appeare plainly, wee must search into the composition of the sayd powder, considering that it is not of substance simple, but compound: and so by examining the nature of such Simples, which enter into the composition thereof: I meane their qualities, effects, and operations, we shall the sooner attaine to the scope and intention pretended.

As for the Simples it is a most assured thing, that there are but three in all, which make the composition thereof, that is to say, coales of willow or birchy sulphure, and salt-peter, and sometimes Aqua-vitæ which ingredients severally considered, are altogether exempt and free from poyson, or any venomous quality: And first for the coales, there is not any thing considerable in them, vnlesse it bee a drying quality, of subtile substance, by means whereof it is apt to take fire, euen as a linen cloth burned into Tinder doth the sparkes that fall from a Flint stone. Sulphure is hote and drie, neuerthelesse, not excessive, and of a more oile and viscous substance, yet not so easie to inflame as coales, although it doth retaine the fire more forcibly when it is once inflamed, and is very hardly extinguished. As for the salt-peter, it is such, that many make vse thereof instead of salt. Now let vs examine, whether there be any venosity in the nature of these simples; namely in that of sulphure; which is the most suspected. Dioscorides in his first booke, chap. 37. prescribeth it to be taken in an Egge, in the astmaticke passion, coughes, and to such which spit matter, and those that haue the Taundise. And Galen in his ninth booke of his Simples, cha. 36. ordaineth it as a topicall remedy, vnto such who are bitten by venomous beasts; and in all malignant praeisles or itchings; as for the Aqua-vitæ, it is a thing subtile, that it will evaporate if it be set in the ayre; besides, it is vsed by most Chirurgians inwardly in drinks, and outwardly in embrocations as a most singular medicine. These things considered, make mee to affirme, that the whole composition of powder is altogether free from venome or poyson, seeing that the ingredients are altogether cleare from the least touch in that kind.

Moreouer, I haue obserued it to bee the practise of the Hollanders, being wounded by Gunne-shotte, to dissolve two charges of powder in Wine; and to drinke it off, hoping, by that means to be freed from all future accidents which might happen to their wounds (although I doe not approve thereof, because it is a most insufficient remedy.) Also, such vners which are made through the combustion of powder, are of no other nature then those that are made by fire, or scalding water. But, wherefore should I alledge any fortaine example? Do we not see amongst our owne Souldiers, I do not know on what occasion, but only to shew themselves braue fellows; to empye their charges of powder into their cuppes, and drinke it without anie inconuenience at all; and others in like manner, being!

hurt on any part of their bodies, will apply of the same vpon their vjcers to drie them, and finde much profit by it. As for those which do affirme that it is not in the powder, but the Bullet, which being subtilly pierced in many places, or filled vp with venome, or stipped, rubbed, or mixed with any poyson, causeth the aforesayd daungerous accidents: To such do I answer without further trouble, that the fire set to the powder, is sufficient to purifie the poyson of the Bullet, if any there were; the which can not be done, by impoysoned Swords, Pikes, Arrows, and such like, because they passe not thorow the action of the fire. Briefly, to confirme my opinion to be true, there is not anie one of those that were in your Maiesties Campe at Rohan, that doth not assuredly know, that those Bullets which were shotte against those of the Towne, to be altogether free from poyson. Neuertheless, the besieged Towne-men affirmed, that all those Bullets were poysoned. Also, the Souldiers of your Maiesties Camp had the same opinion, of such Bullets which were shot at them out of the town, that they were all impoysoned, by them; rather beleeving and iudging of the qualitie of the wounds by their euill successe, than by the Causes whereby they were made.

True it is, that as in Physicke, according to the Sentence of Hippocrates in the Epidemics; as Galen noteth on the twenty sentence, and the twenty one of the third Section of the third booke, all diseases are called Pestilentiall and venomous, being from common and general causes of whar kind, soeuer they be, and such kill many persons: so in the like manner, we may call such wounds as are made by Gunne-shot venomous, which are more difficult to heale then others; not because they doe participate of any venomosity, but from some general cause depending, either fixt to the Cacochymie of the body, putrification of the aire, or the corruption of the victualls, whereby those vjcers, are brought to be more malignant Cacochymies, and rebellious to all medicines.

Refutation of those that affirm that the Bullet causeth
combustion.

To affirme, that it is onely the combustion of the bullet, which causeth the aforesaid danger; I cannot conserue their reasons, seeing that the Bullet is (for the most part) made but of lead, and therefore vn-

ble to indure any great heate, without being altogether dissolued, which we neuertheless doe see to passe thorow a coat Armour, and to penetrate the body through and through, and yet to remaine whole.

Moreover, we do obserue, that if a Bullet be shot against a stone, or against anie solid matter, it may in the same instant be handled of vs in our hands, without feeling any notable heate, although the violent striking and collision made against the stone, should in reason encrease the heate, if anie there were. And which is more, if a Bullet bee shot against a bagge full of powder, the fire will not endanger it. This I dare be bolde to say and affirme moreover, That if a quantitie of powder should take fire, being kept in a Tower, or any other place, by the means of a Bullet shot, it was not the heate of the Bullet, but rather the violent striking of the Bullet against the stones of the said Tower, which might cause sparkes of fire to fall amongst the powder; even as the smiting of a Steele against a flint stone. The like we may iudge of such thatched houses, which haue bene set on fire by a musket shot, to haue rather proceeded from some wad, either of Towee or Paper, rammed in with the powder; and so fired with it. But that which doth most confirme mee in the assurance of mine opinion, is, that if a ball of Waxe be shot out of a Musket, it feelth no force of fire at all; for then would it melt; neuertheless, it will pierce an inch board. An argument of sufficient weight to prooue, that the Bullets cannot be so extremely heated by the force of the powder, that they should cauterize and burne, as many haue esteemed.

And as for that blackenesse, which is ordinarily found to be about the Orifices of such wounds, and other adiacent parts: I affirme, that this accident doth not proceed from any qualitie of fire accompanying the Bullet, but because of the great conuulsion that it maketh: For it cannot enter into the body otherwise then by an extreme and incredible force, because it is of a round figure.

Vpon this point, if the wounded persons themselves be demanded, I beleue they will testifie the truth of my saying, because they are no sooner strooke with the Bullet, but they doe feelee in the same instant, as if a club or some other heauie burthen were false on the offended party, in the which they feelee a heauy paine, with a benumbed stupification of the part; which dissipateth and sometimes extinguisheth the naturall heate, together with the spirites contained therein; from whence there followeth oftentimes a gangrene and mortification of the part, yea sometimes of the whole body. And as for the Efficacie which they affirme there to be, and fall away as they say, they doe abuse themselves: for it is onely some certaine portion of the membranes and confused steth, dilacerated by the Bullet, which becometh corrupted, and so separateth it selfe from the found parts which are greatly confused.

Although that these reasons doe make it manifest enough, that there is no venomous qualitie in the powder, nor action of fire carryed with the Bullet; neuertheless, many, building their opinions vpon naturall Philosophie, doe maintayne the contrarie, affirming that Cannon shot is like vnto the clappes of Thunder, which burst forth of the Clouds in the middle Region of the ayre, and so fall violently on the earth. From the which similitude they would inferre and conclude, that there is both fire, and a venomous qualitie in the Bullet: as it proceedeth out of the mouth of the Cannon. I know (I thanke God) that Thunder being ingendered from a grosse and viscous exhalation, by means of vapour conioyned with it, doth neuer breake forth of the Clouds to penetrate heere below; but it draweth and bringeth immediately with it a certaine fire, sometimes more subtle, sometimes more grosse, according to the diuersitie of the matter, whereof the exhalation is composed. For Seneca writeth in the second Booke of his Natural Questions, chapter 49. that there are three kinds of Thunders, all differing the one from the other, according to the quantitie and manner of their inflammation. The first, by reason of the matter thereof, it being most thin and subtle, it doth pierce & penetrate suddenly the objects which it toucheth. The second kind, by reason of the violence thereof, breaketh and dissipateth the same things, because the matter thereof is more violent, and compact as a tempest. The third sort being composed of a more earthie matter, burneth with manifest tokens of the heate thereof. I also know, that the Thunder is of nature pestilentiall and fetide, because of the grosse & stinky matter thereof, which being burned, leaueth behind it such a stinking fauor, that all animals do so much avoid it, that if it do happen to fall into their denness, other places of haunt, they will vterly abandon and forsake such places; so much do they hate the infectious stinke of that poison. The same is noted by Olau Magnus, in his Septentrional Historie, that in certayne places where Thunder hath fallen, presently after the fall thereof, the fields haue benee found afterwards to be couered & strewed ouer with sulphure, neuertheless vnprofitable, and almost extinguished. For all these reasons, I must not confesse, that the blows of Gun-shot are accompanied with poyson and fire, as the clappes of Thunder are. For although they doe agree the one with the other, in some similitude, it is not therefore in their substance and matter, but rather in the manner which they haue to batter, teare, and dissipate the objects which they doe meete with, that is to say, the clappes of Thunder through the force of fire; and of the bolre or stone sometimes engendered therein: and the blowes of Gunne-shot by the means of the Ayre forced away by impetuosity, and so conducting the Bullet, causeth the like disaster. What if I should be conuicted by stronger Arguments, so that I were enforced to auouch, that Thunder and the Cannon to be of the like substance; yet I should neuer bee forced to say, that the shotte of the Cannons and Muskets doe participate of a fierie qualitie. Plinie saith in the second Booke of his Historie, and the 51. chapter, that among Thunder, one kinde is composed of a marvellous drie matter, dissipating all such things it meete withall; neuertheless, without anie signe of burning: others, of a more humid nature, which in like manner burneth not; but blacketh and discoloreth much, more then the first. Others are composed of a very cleare and subtle matter: the nature whereof is most marvellous, forsooth that it is not to be doubted (as Seneca hath well said) that there is therein a certayne diuine vertue: and it is in melting Golde or Silver in a mans purse, the purple it selfe not being so much as touched therewith.

Also in melting a sword, the scabberd thereof remayning whole. Also, in dissolving into droppes the yron head of a Pike, without burning, or so much as heating the wood. In shedding the wine out of a vessell, without burning or breaking of the caske. According to the aforesayd testimony, I can assure you, and that without any prejudice, that those Thunders, which onelie breake and dissipate without any burning; and such which do leaue effects full of great admiration, not to be much vnlike in substance to the Cannon shot, and not those which carrie immediately with them the action of fire.

Example.

To proue my saying true, this one example shall suffice. A certaine Souldier receyued a wound in his Thigh with a Musket shot, from whence I extracted a bullet; the which being wrapped in the Taffatie of his breeches, made a very deepe wound. Neuerthelesse, I drew it forth of the wound with the same Taffatie, it being without any signe of burning.

And which is more, I haue seene many men, who not being shot, nor anie thing touched therewith, vnlesse it were in their apparel only; haue receiued such an astonishment by a Cannon shot, that onely passed nere them: that their members thereby haue become blacke and liuid; and shortly after, haue fallen into a gangrene and mortification, whereof in the end they haue dyed.

These effects are like vnto those of the thunder before spoken of. Neuerthelesse, there is not in them any fire or poyson: which maketh mee conclude, that there is no poyson in the common and ordinarie powder. Seeing therefore, that this disaster was common to all those which were hurt in these last warres, and yet neither by fire or poyson that so many valiant men dyed. To what cause may we impute this euill? I am so confident of the true cause (my Liege) that I hope presently to make your Maiestie vnderstand the same, to the end that your demaund may be fully satisfied.

Those which haue consumed their age and study in the secrets of naturall Philosophie, haue left vs this amongst other things, for authentick and appooued of all times. Which is, that the Elements doe symbolize in such sort the one with the other, that they doe sometimes transfigure and change themselves, the one into the other, in such sort, that not onelie their first qualities, which are heate, coldnes, driness and moisture: but also their substances are changed, by rarification or condensation of themselves; so the fire doth conuert it selfe ordinarily into ayre, the ayre into water, the water into earth; and contrariwise the earth into water, the water into ayre, and the ayre into fire. The which wee may dayly behold, and proue it by those bellows of Copper which the Dutchman brings vs, being composed in the forme of a Boll, which being filled with water, and hauing but one hole in the middle of the Spherick forme thereof: receiue the transmutation of the water within it into ayre, thorow the action of the fire, neare vnto the which the Boll must bee placed; and so thrusteth the ayre forth of it with violence, making a continuall noyse or sound, vntill all the ayre be gone forth of it. The like may be knowne by Egges or Cheshenuts; for eyther of them being put into the fire before they are crackt, or the Rhinds broken, presently the watery humidity contained in them, doth conuert it selfe into ayre, through the action of the fire: and the ayre in making his passage, bursteth the shell, because it occupieth more place being in the forme of ayre, into the which it was changed by rarification caused by the fire, then it did vnder the forme of water; and not finding passage, is constrained to make one by violence, according vnto the proposition helde for most certayne and true amongst all Physitians; that is to say, of that one part of earth is made tenne of water: and of one part of water is made tenne of ayre, as of one part of ayre ten of fire. I do say and affirme so much of the matters contained in the said Gun-powder, which by means of the fire is conuerted into a great quantity of ayre; the which because it cannot be contained in the place, where the matter was before the transmutation thereof, is compelled to issue forth with an incredible violence: by means whereof, the bullet breaketh, shinereth and rendeth all that euer it meets with, yet doth not the fire accompany it. Euen as wee see a Bow, or a Sling shoote forth an Arrow or Stone, without any aire at all.

But

The effect of Artillery like the thunder

But the bullet driueth before it such a suble winde, and so swiftly agitated, that sometimes the very winde it selfe, without the action of the Bullet, causeth strange and wonderfull effects. For sometimes, I haue knowne it make a fracture in the bones, without any diuision of the flesh. And herein it may be compared (as wee said before) vnto the effect of Thunder: euen so we see, that if the saide powder bee inclosed in Mines and Vaults of the earth, and being conuerted into aire thorough the action of the fire set vnto it, howe it doeth ruinate and reuerse huge masses of earth almost as bigge as Mountaines. Also in this yeare, in your Maiesties Towne of Paris, a certaine quantity of powder, but newly made in the Arsenall, by taking fire, caused such a great tempest, that the whole Towne shooke at it: for with an horrible fury, it leuelled with the Earth all the houses neere vnto that place, and discomered and battered down the windowes of all those that stood within the fury of it. And to be briefe (euen as a clap of thunder) it did reuerse heere and there many men halfe slaine; taking away from some their eyes, from others their hearing, and left others no lesse torne and mangled in their members, then if foure horses had drawne them in pieces: and all this by the only agitation of the ayre, into which substance, the powder was conuerted. The which, according to the quantity and quality of the matter thereof, and according to his motion, either more or lesse violent, hath caused so many wonderfull accidents in our Prouinces; altogether like vnto those which are caused through the inclosing of windes in the bowels and cauities of the earth, not being perspirable. The which, struing to haue vent, bloeth with such a strong and violent agitation, that they make the earth to tremble & quake therat: thereby demolishing Cities, and ruinating buildings, and transporting them from one place to another. As the Townes of Megara and Egina, anciently much celebrated in the Country of Greece, perishing by Earth-quakes can witness vnto vs.

I omit to discover (as but little serving to our purpose) how the winde enclosed in the Entrailles of the earth, maketh a noyse of diuers sounds, and very strange, according to the diuers formes of the conduits and passages, through the which it isfluent by, euen after the manner of musickall Instruments; the which being large, do giue a great and base sound; & being narrow, do make high and sharpe notes, and being crooked or replied, make diuers sounds; as wee see by experience in the Huntsmans home, and in Trumpets, the which also, being moistened with water, do make a hollow gurgling sound.

In like manner, these noises, mumblings, and clamors, are sundry wayes diuertified, according to the places whence they proceed; in such sort, that sometimes hath bene heard a clamorous cry, representing (as it seemed) the assault of a City, the cries and lowings of Bulls, or the neighing of Horses, roaring of Lyons, found of Trumpets, reports of Artillery, and many other dreadful things; yea sometimes humane voyces. As it is reported by one, who had heard a voyce (as it were) of a woman beatings, which made (as he imagined) such a wofull and grievous lamentation; where-with he became so greatly affrighted, that he had scarcely breath sufficient to make this report. But when he had well vnderstood the cause of this plaintiue voyce, he was presently deliuered from that feare, which otherwife might haue killed him.

But haue perhaps will say, that these things haue alwayes bene, and no lesse ordinary in the times past, then they are at this present: and therefore it is a great folly in me to alledge them, for efficient causes of the death of so many men. The which imputation, I should freely confesse, if I should present them for such: but seeing, that by them I would onely parallel and compare the impetuosity of Artillery, with that of thunder, and the motions of the earth; which being so, it will appeare, that it maketh nothing against my first intention, as I hope to demonstrate cleerly, that I am slandered without a cause, if you please to giue eare to the deduction following. In the which, I will plainly and briefly describe the true causes of the late mortality, which happened among your Highnesse Soldiers.

Amongst the things necessary for our liues, there is nothing that can more alter our bodies, then the ayre; the which, continually (willing or vnwilling) we inspire by those conduites which Nature hath appointed

pointed for that end; as the mouth, the nose, and generally through all the pores of the skinne and Arteries therein infixed, whether wee cate, drinke, watch, or sleepe, or doe any other action, whether Natural, Vitall, or Animall. From thence it commeth, that the aire inspired into the Lungs, the Heart, and the braine, and vniuersally in all the parts of the bodie, to refresh, and in some measure to nourish the same, is the cause that a man cannot liue one minute without inspiration; according to the which wonderfull benefit, the excellent Physitian Hippocrates hath pronounced, and that truly, that the aire hath a kinde of Diuinity in it; because, that in breathing and blowing ouer all parts of the world vniuersally, it doth circumuolue all things therein containd: nourishing them miraculously, strengthening them firmly, and maintaining them in an amiable Vnion; altogether symbolizing with the Starrs and Planets, into the which the diuine providence is infused, which changeth the aire at his pleasure, and giueth it power not only ouer the mutation of times and seasons, but also of the alteration of naturall bodies. And therefore the Philosphers and Physitians haue expressly commanded, that we should haue a principall regarde vnto the situation and motions of the heauenly bodies, and constitutions of the Ayre, when the preferuation of health, or the curation of diseases are in question; but especially the course and mutation of the aire is of great power, as wee may easily iudge by the foure seasons of the yeare. For the Aire being hot and dry in Sommer, our bodies in like manner doth thereby become heated and dried: and in winter the humidity and coldnesse of the ayre doth likewise fill our bodies with the very same qualities; in such order neuertheless, and in so good a disposition of nature, that although our temperatures seeme to bee changed, according to the foure seasons of the yeare; we neuertheless receiue no harme thereby, if those times doe keepe their seasons and qualities free from excess. But to the contrary, if the seasons be so peruerred, that the Sommer is colde, and the Winter hott, and the other seasons in the like distemperature; this discord bringeth with it a great perturbation, both in our bodies and in our spirits, constrained neuertheless to receive the danger, by reason that the causes are extreme, and on every side encompass vs; so that we are constrained to lodge it in vs by those Organes and Conduites appointed by Nature to that end, as partly, to expell the superfluous excrements of our nourishment, and partly to receiue the said externall causes, which is the ayre or winde, producing in vs diuers effects, according to those parts of the world from whence they do proceed.

For, it being so, that the Southerly Windes are hot and moyst, that of the North cold and dry; the Easterly Winds for the most part are cleare and pure, and the Westerly cloudy and subiect to rain; yet it is a most assured thing, that the aire which we do inspire continually, holdeth in all, and through all, the qualitie that is most predominant. And therefore, wee should of necessity consider in all diseases, and the inconueniences which happen therein, the quality of the winds, and the power which they haue ouer the bodies; as Hippocrates hath learnedly left vs by writing, in the third Booke of his Aphorisms, Chap. 1. and 17. saying, That our bodies do receiue a great alteration through the vicissitude of the times and seasons of the yeare. As by the South-winde our bodies are subiect to all diseases, because that moysture is their primitive cause: it also weakneth our naturall heate, the which in the opposite case is much fortified thorough a cold and dry winde, which also maketh our spirits more quick and subtle. The verity of which sentence, the inhabitants of the Territory of Narbonne doe too much experiment to their damage. For being themselves betweene the lushet and healthfullest people of all France; yet neuertheless they themselves are very sickly for the most part, their bodies leane, their countenances sad and heauy; their faces tawny, or of an Olive colour; do manifestly shew the same. Also among other diseases, they are almost all subiect to the white Leprosie; and the last Vicers which they haue, which we make no account of at Poitiers or Paris, do ordinarily continue with them a whole yeare together. Not for any other cause, as they themselves confesse, and as all strangers know that haue liued in their country, but onely because they are for the most part, blasted and breathed vpon with a Southerly Winde, which in their language they call Altan, & maketh the aire to be grosse and cloudy; causing in their bodies all the effects which are attributed by Hippocrates to the Southerly winds, in his third booke and fifth Aphorisme, that is to say, when it reigneth, it dulleth the hearing, dimmeth the sight, swellth and aggrauateth the head, weakneth and abateth all the forces of the body.

Also, when Hippocrates compareth the temperatures of the one qualitie with the other, he resolueth vpon this point: That the dry seasons are farre more healthfull then the humid, that haue continued for a long succession of time, because excessiue humidity is the true matter of putrefaction, as experience telleth vs. For wee see, that in those places where the Marine or Sea-winds haue long blowne, all kinds of flesh (though neuer so new and fresh) will corrupt in lesse then an houre. These things being considered, that it is most necessary for the conseruation of our bodies in health, that the seasons should follow their naturall temperatures, without any excess or contrariety, there is no doubt to be made, but that our bodies will fall into many vnaturall diseases, when the naturall qualities of the seasons are peruerred thorough the euill disposition of the aire and winde, that predominateth therein. It being so, that for these 3. yeares space here in France, the seasons of euery yeare haue not kept their ordinay qualities. In the Sommer wee haue but little heate. In the Winter a little or no cold at all. Also the other haue bene continually distemperd with raine and moysture, together with much southerly winds whose nature we haue declared before, & this throughout all France.

I know no man so little scepse in natural Philology, or in Astrologie, which will not finde the aire to be the efficient cause of so many euils, which for these 3. yeares space haue happened in the Kingdome of France. For from whence should proceed those contagious Pestilences, which happened indifferently to old and young, so rich and poore, and in so many places, but from the corruption of the Ayre? From whence should proceed so many kinds of Feauers, Pleuritis, Apoplexies, Catarrhs, defluxions of small Poxe and Meazles?

So many kinds of venomous Beastes, as Froggies, Toads, Grasshoppers, Caterpillers, Spiders, Flies, Walpes, Snailles, Serpents, Vipers, Snakes, Lizards, Scorpions, and Aspidicks, but onely from a putrefaction resulting from the humiditie of the aire, accompanied with a languishing heate. This is it (I say) that hath engendered in vs, and in all the Country of France, so many strange and vknown accidents. Behold therefore how our naturall heate hath bene weakned, how our blood and humors haue bene corrupted through the malignity of the ayre, which these Southerly winds haue caused, thorough the hote and moyst quality thereof.

Thus much I haue obserued, that where there hath bene need of Phlebotomizing, there hath bene but little blood drawne from any, whether they were young or old, wounded, or not of so good or euill temperature, but it hath bene corrupted, and appeared of white or greenish Colours. This I haue alwayes obserued in these last Vvarres, and in other places where I haue bene called to cure the wounded: such as haue bene phlebotomized by the prescription of the Physitian, either for the prevention of accidents, or the furtherance of the cure. In all which, I say indifferently, I haue found the blood putrified and corrupted.

This being so, it must needs follow, that the fleshy parts of our bodies cannot be otherwise then euilly disposed; and all our bodies Cacochymate; seeing that their nourishment which is the blood, is putrified, and the ayre altogether corrupted. From whence it followeth, that those bodies which were wounded in the fleshy parts, were difficult to cure, considering that there was in them a perdition of substance, the which hauing neede of the regeneration of the flesh, could not bee accomplished, neither by Medicines, nor any Art of the Chirurgian; such & so great was the Cacochymie or euill constitution of their bodies. Euen as in an Hydroticke person, there can no flesh be regenerated, because the blood is too colde and swarty; and in the Elephantick or leprous disease, the flesh and other parts do abide in putrefaction, because of the corrupted blood whereby they are nourished. In like manner, in wounds of Cacochymed bodies,

A Gualtitude.

lib. 13. Aphor. 15.

dies, there can be no regeneration made of any good substance, because that to restore a lawdable flesh in the wounded part it is required, that the blood should not offend neither in quantity nor quality, & that the offended part bee in it naturall temperature. All these things were wanting in the times of these last Varres: and therefore it is not to be wondered at, if the wounds which were then received (although they were but small and of little consequence in the noble or ignoble parts) haue brought with them so many tedious accidents, and in the end death; because that the aire which doeth encompasse vs, maketh the wounds to be corrupt and putrified, by reason of the inspiration and transpiration thereof, especially when it selfe is corrupt and putrified, by altering & corrupting the humors.

Intollerable stinke proceeding from the wounded parts of men.

Of this point I haue had the experience in many Wounds, which I haue bin called to dresse, that haue rendred a most insupportable stinking fauour, as a certaine witness of corruption and infection, in so much, that the assistants could hardly endure to be present at their dressings. It need not to be here alledged, that this was for want of being cleanly kept, or often dressing, or for not administering to them things necessary: for this corruption was as common to Princes and great Lords, as vnto poore soldiers; whose wounds (if by chance one day escaped) whetein they were not drest, so great was the number of the hurt soldiery you should finde in them the morrow after, a great quantitie of worms, with a marvellous stinking fauour. And moreover, there hapned vnto them many Apostumes in diuers parts of their bodies opposite to their hurts. For if they were shotte in the right shoulder, they should haue an Apostume on the left haue; and if the wound were in the right leg, the Apostume would arise in the left arme. As it hapned to the late K. of Navarre, to Monsieur de Neuers, and to Monsieur de Renclan, and almost to all others. So it seemeth, that Nature being so much oppressed with corrupted humors, could not be sufficiently purged and discharged of them by wounds onely, but sent some part of the corruption to some other part either hidden or apparent. For, if the Apostumes appeared not outwardly, they should be found in the inward part; as in the Liuer, Lungs, or Spleen. Fro those putrefactions were stirred vp certain vapors, which through their combination with the heart, causeth continual Feauers, with the Liuer, a let and hinderance of the generation of good blood; & with the brain swoonings, faintings, convulsions, and consequently death.

Now because of those aforesayde accidents, it is vnpossible for any Chirurgical (were he neuer so expert) to correct the malignity of the aforesaid wounds: neither those that are employed therein, ought not to be reprehended; because it is impossible for them to warre against God, nor against the aire, wherein oftentimes are hidden the rods of his diuine iustice. If therefore, according to the sentence of ancient Hippocrates, who saith; That all contused wounds ought to be brought to suppuration, thereby to be perfectly cured; which method wee are sometimes constrained to change, because of the putrefactions Gangrenas and mortifications which doe accompanie such wounds, thorough the corruption of the aire; and can any blame or accuse vs, because we are constrained through necessity to change and alter that manner of curation, and insted of suppurative medicines to vse other remedies, to resist such accidents which not onely happen in wounds made by Gun-shot, but also by swords or stauers; which remedies shall be described in this present Discourse. Besides humane causes, that man is ill instructed in the knowledge of Celestiall things, which doth not becompe for certaine, that the wrath of God hangeth ouer vs, to punish the faults which ordinarily we commit against his Maiesty. His scourges are prepared ready, his rods and weapons haue they ministers alwayes at hand, to execute the commandment of his diuine iustice, into whose sectors I dare enter no further, but will conclude with the opinion of the best aduised Practitioners, that the principall occasion of the aforesaid mortallitie, did proceede from the pure and determinate will of God, who by the temperature that he hath giuen to the ayre and windes (as the Heraldes of his diuine iustice) hath made vs apt to receiue the aforesaid inconueniencies, which we haue incurred by our iniquities.

CHAP. V.

¶ Of the Excellencie of the Arte of Physicke, going farre beyond all other humane Arts and Sciences whatsoeuer.

What humane Arts are vnto becom.

All Arts intended for the use of man.

Diuinity expected from all humane Arts.

The nature and quality of knowledge in humane lawes.

The place allotted to physick in the second degree.

¶ We vnderstand humane Artes (as well Liberrall as Mechanicall) to bee all those, that Man (inspired by God) hath inuented for his necessitie, commoditie, or recreation. Amongest which also is Physicke, the practise of naturall Philosophie vpon the bodies of men, for whom all mechanickall Artes were deuised; as Artes liberrall for exercise of the minde. We except onely from all ordinary professions of Man, the sacred Science of Diuinity; which we vnderstand, not to come within compasse of this comparison, when we extoll Physicke to be aboue all humane Arts: because it is neither Art or humane Science; but a matter merely and purely diuine, not inuented by men, but infused by God; concerning soules, and not bodies; eternall, infallible, immutable, hauing (for object) God Almighty, Creator of the World, who made it of nothing, and for the seruice of man. In whom we are to consider a reasonable soule, the body, and benefits which are giuen vnto him, for the support and maintaining of his life.

Diuinity hath her especial care of the soule, and next to her, Moral Philosophie. Skill and knowledge; restrained vnto humane Lawes, do discourse on goods and proprieties appertaining to men, rendering to euery one that which is his owne. Betweene them both is Physicke, conseruing the body in health, expelling Diseases, and sauing from death, so farre as it pleaseth God to permit. If then the excellency of professions, is to be esteemed in and by their subiects, according as they ought to bee: Physicke will then assume the second place, For, the soule is more then the body, and the bodie more then garments.

I will not heere contest with my Grand Masters the Magistrates, who haue power ouer mens bodies, as well in case of life, as death: for their authority is nothing else but a mere declaration; either of pardoning, or punishing with death, according to the quality of desert. As for the power of absolution or pardon, if it be in grace, as the sole Prince or Soueraigne Magistrate may do it: it proceedeth from the priuiledge giuen him by God, and not from any knowledge of the Lawes. Like to the other, that declareth the innocence and preuention of the accused: the which is properly to saue, or giue life, because the party standing so accused, hath not therefore deferred death.

And as for power of putting to death, therein is no praise; at least, it ought not to be compared with the power of sauing life. For, so much doth the Physicion (the grace of God assisting) to man, being attainted with deadly diseases, and doubtles should dye, except they were succoured in such manner. Now, whether it is effectable, or no, and that (by the Art of Physicke) life may be prolonged: that we shal more amply relate in the following chapter. Onely our intent heere, is, to shewe the excellencie of man; to confirme the excellency of that Art, which is dedicated onely to his conseruation.

The principall dignity of Man, is in this, that God hath vouchsafed to bestow on him his owne Image and resemblance, giuing him an immortall soule, capable of the Diuinity: in regard that all things were submitted to him, for his necessitie, commoditie, and recreation; hauing made (for his seruice) Heauen, Earth, the Sea, and all that is in them. For God hath no need of any thing, made by himselfe: All is for our vse, and therefore it is easie to vnderstand and know, that Man is more worthy and excellent then all the worlde. So, to speake truly, Heauen and Earth, which haue had a beginning; were ordained for an ending, and to we xolde like a Garment. Onely Man shall neuer end, but change his condition, and of being mortall, he shall become immortall; in a short while after the soule shal receiue her diuorce from the body, taking it vp again, in much more glorious manner then before, and in such a perfect temper, as neuer can be subiect to corruption.

Seeing then, that Man is the worthiest thing in all the world, beside al other whatsoeuer: the Science ordained for his person,

The power of Magistrates in cases of life or death, holding their authority from God.

What diuersity there is betweene the two powers, of sauing life, and putting to death.

Wherein the clearest dignity of Man doth consist.

Man was created neuer to haue ending, but to change his present condition.

Man the only worthy thing in all the world.

son, must needs bee the most excellent aboue all other, next vnto that which properly concerneth his Creator. For, Man is the most worthy creature of all, and (by consequence) the Art or Science which maintaineth him in life and health, is the onely excellent of all humane Arts. This is a strong argument, for the preheminece and dignity of Physicke, according to the singularity of the subiect whereon it discourseth.

I could giue a glance at some other matters, which make (in like manner) for his commendation: As his Antiquity, Necessity, and Vtility, together with the Authority of them, that haue the more reuerenced and esteemed him, for the same reasons. As concerning his Antiquitie, no man doubteth, but it is as olde as the transgression of Adam, and that so soone as he had sinned, he (thereby) became subiect to sicknesse. He must needs be Physitian to himselfe, to whom God had giuen knowledge, concerning the vertue of all things whatsoever, and causing him to giue them feuerall names, answerable and according to their feuerall proprieties.

Prophane Histories, doe attribute the inuention of Physick to god Apollon, which is the Sonne: signifying thereby, that from the Sun proceedeth the vertue of Plants, and other medicaments, which the earth produceth. Hereupon they conclude, that Esculapius (the first that made profession of this Art) was his sonne; and he the Father of Macchaon & Podalirius, vulnerarie Physitians (otherwise called Chirurgeons) who were in the warre of Troy, the History whereof, is the very ancientest in the world.

Now, concerning Antiquity, it is one of those conditions, that commendeth something; provided, that it hath bene continued. For, if it be neither vfe-able, nor beneficiall, it will soon haue ending. But we see (euen to this instant) that Physicke hath bene well maintained, euermore in augmentation, beauty, and liberall bounty. And that, by industrie of the cheefest persons that haue bin, not onely Philosophers by profession, but likewise by Kings, Princes, and other men of greatest esteeme, it hath bene highly honoured, according as ancient Histories, and their learned labors left to vs of Physicke, do plainly testifie.

True it is, that the Romaines did let it passe by them, for about fixe hundred yeares, as holding it in detestation for the cruelty of some Chirurgeons which came forth of Greece, a Nation to them very superstitious. But since those times, Physitians were honoured, much respected, & maintained in Rome; holding ranke with the cheefest Noblemen and Knights.

Now, touching the Necessity thereof, it is so manifest, as nothing more. But it seemeth, that this may diminish the excellency of the Art; because it is not acceptable or desirable of it selfe, but onely for neede. Like as in Moral Philosophy, that is most esteemed, which is desirable of it selfe (As to haue children, then affectable, for some other respect, as to haue goods for other children;) Euen so, Physicke, being not desirable of it selfe (like to Musick) but for necessity; it appeareth to be the lesse commendable, euen as Mechanical Arts, which cannot passe without vfe. Yet notwithstanding, this is contrary; for, the more necessary Physick is, so much the more it is to be desired: and the excellency of her effects, maketh her to be the more excellent.

And heere, Vtility or commodity ioyneth with it, commending it in the highest degree. For, as there is nothing in the world more welcome then Health, nor more desirable then long life: Physicke, providing both for the one and other, is the more beneficiall to the contentment of men, then any other humane Science can be. For (by the contrary) as whoeuer that hath not health, is vnprofitable to the world: euen so he hath lyued but a litle while, brought therto the lesse benefit with him. For, as the Father of Eloquence sayd, We are not borne for our selves onely, but our Parents, Kindred, & Friends, our Countrey, yea the whole world; all these do vinge from vs some emolument, and commodity.

It remaineth now, to confirme all these reasons by great and good Authority, of such as haue much esteemed and extolled Physicke, and the professors thereof, commending it infinitely by their VVritings. In the performance whereof, I shall content my selfe, with the exhortation made in Ecclesiasticus, and the remembrance of our graue father Hippocrates. Nor is he to be suspected in the matter, because he was a Physitian: for, he was neuer mercenary, nor at the seruice of any man; but free and most liberal of his profession. And he it was, that first diuided Physicke from Philosophie. Because (in elder daies) Physitians were not distinguished by themselves, but Philosophers did contemplate vpon diseases, and their remedies among naturall things: for their vfe principally (as Celsus witnesseth) who had most need aboute other, in regarde of their bodyes weaknesse, being overcome with continuall depressions of Age.

Hippocrates then was the first, that diuided this Art from Philosophy, and made profession thereof publickly; as (afterward) did Diocles, Praxagoras, Chrysippus, Herophilus, and Erasistratus, all his successors. And they (at length) diuided Physicke into three parts, for better accommodation thereof to sicke persons: referring mechanical people to manuell operation, called Chirurgery, and the preparation of Medicines, which are termed Pharmacie or Apothecaries skill, according as (in these our daies) it is exercised among vs. But it is by mercenary people (for the most part) whose testimonie in the Art of physick, can carry here no credit; no, not that of Galen himselfe, although he was one of the first subiected seruants thereto.

Wherefore that shall satisfie me, which is recorded by so great a Father, after I haue made recital of the words of Ecclesiasticus, the wisedome of Iesus the sonne of Sirach, writing thus in his 38. Chapter, verse 1. Honor the Physitian with that honor which is due vnto him, because of the necessity thou hast of him, for the Lord hath created him. 2. Healing cometh of the most High, and the Physitian shall be honoured euen of Kings. 3. The knowledge of the Physitian exalteth his head, and in the sight of Princes he shall be had in admiration. 4. The Lord hath created Medicines of the Earth, and he that is wise will not abhorre them. 5. Was not the water made sweete with woode, that men should knowe the vertue thereof? 6. So he hath giuen knowledge vnto men, that he might be glorified in his meruallous workes. 7. With such doth he heale men, and taketh away their paines.

8. The Apothecarie maketh his commixtions, and yet hee cannot finish his owne work: for, it is from God, that health cometh ouer

all the earth.

9. My sonne, saile not in thy sicknesse, but pray vnto God, and he will make thee whole.

10. Leaue off from sinne, and order thine hands aright, and cleanse thine heart from all wickednesse.

11. Offer sweete Incense, and fine Flour for a remembrance; make the Offering faire, for thou art not the first giuer.

12. Then giue place to the Physitian: for the Lord hath created him, let him not goe from thee, for thou hast need of him.

13. The houre may come, that their enterprizes may haue good successe.

14. For they shall also pray vnto the Lord, that hee would prosper that which is giuen for ease, and their Physicke for prolonging life.

These diuine words do conclude (Seuerie sufficiently) our purpose, for the dignity, excellency, necessity, vtility, and prerogative of Physitians: condemning all such, as hold them in vile estimation, and (in them) do despise the great goodnesse of Almighty God, who hath bestowed vpon men such meanes of healing. Let vs now heare what was spoken by the learned Hippocrates. The good olde man, in the Booke of the Lawe, complained so long since, that (euen in his time) Physick was but slenderly esteemed, in regarde of abuse; much more then must it neede be now at this day.

The Art of Physicke (saith hee) is the most apparent of all other: but by the ignorance of some that vse it, and such as indge of the Professours, it is too farre overgone by all other Artes. The faulte (methinks) proceedeth principally from this: That in Cities, there is no punishment appointed to the Art of Physicke, as to others. Except dishonour done it; which arduous afflictions sufficient for such as sayle therein.

They may well be compared vnto the Actors in a Tragedie, who haue the habit, visage, and outward behaviour, of those persons which they represent and counterfeit. In like manner, there are many Physitians in name and repute; but verie few that are the men in dede. For, in him that would truly haue the knowledge of Physicke, fixe feuerall qualities or conditions, are necessarily required, which followe thus. 1. The Nature. 2. Discipline. 3. Good Manners. 4. Concerning the Apothecaries.

is ordained them by Nature: who (being ignorant) do despise the healthfull manner of living. For, the Science of Physicke, providing for the health and life of Man, hath such vertue; as if any one shall rashly contemne the ordinances thereof, he not only lieth in misery, and all irksomnesse of diseases, but also cutteth off his length of life, and abridgeth the terme which Nature had prefixed for him, anticipating his death, and (as we may well say) thereby cutteth his owne throte. As much to say, when (by vsing euill gouernment) he consumeth his radical humour, sooner then it was ordained for him, or suffocates, or quencth his naturall heate: on both which, do consist the continuance of life.

Now, if such be the law and nature of contraries, that they are said to be in one and the same subiect; as, if the one hold, the other also must do the like: it followeth then necessarily, that if the one can shorten life, the other like wise can prolong it. And seeing it is most euident, that if the life of Man may be abridged, by diuers fautes and blemishes of excess: it may also as sufficiently be concluded, that life may be prolonged by good gouernment and discrete order. For, although the discommodities, which depend vpon the principles of our generation, are not (by any means) to be auoyded or preuented (as the effluxion and continuall dissipation of our whole substance, which is done by naturall heate, being the reason of Ages sooner ensuing, in regard of excessiue and ineuitable exsiccation:) yet notwithstanding, it may be tardyed by Physicke, and so hindered, that the last day shall not come so soone, nor so hastily.

Hath it not bene (almost) in generall obseruation, that diuers haue lien gasping, yea, euen ready to giue vp the ghost, who (neuertheless) haue bin continued in life for longer time, by taking a small quantity of Malmesie, Aqua vita, Aqua Imperialis, the Confection of Asteris, or some other cordiall thing? The period and last limit of life being then so neere; hath it not bene deferred (by those means) vntill another houre? It is reported of laughing Democritus, that being entreated by his Houehold seruants (seeing his health very crazie) that hee would banish

all grieue and sorrow from his house, during the Thesmophorian Feasts, which were then neere at hand, by prolonging his life till then: that he did it by the sence of Honey, though some others say, that it was by the fauour of hot bread. Thus you see what our Physitions haue deliuered, when there is a varie great apparence of truth.

We haue heard the two parties plead and debate, by contrarieties of sentences and reasons on either side: it behooueth now, to qualifie the contention, and to resolute on this which hath the best hold. And to the end, that it staye doe not with the greater cunning; it is necessarie also, to distinguish the termes of life; that some are super-naturall, others naturall, and others accidentall, which wee call horned on abridged.

We call those super-naturall, which GOD Almighty ordained: and prefixed to some, out of his owne mere will, such as are not to bee inhibited by any Act or Councell. As the date of verie long life, which God appointed in the first Age of the Worlde, and before the Flood, for the multiplication of mankind: and especially to Noah, for the restoration thereof.

Those which we terme naturall, are they that be bestowed vpon every man, according both to the cunctidit of temper and building, as they are in the principles and foundations, whether strong or weak. In regard whereof, some may live long, others lesse while; according vnto the order of Nature.

And they that doe attaine vnto these termes (the grace of God assisting) except they fall into disorder, or some inconvenience happeneth to them; which are (already to bee called) the limits or termes of the third kind, and which we haue named accidentall, or accidental, that may happen in, or to any age, by casual, and inopinate causes; as Vounds, Poysons, Burnings, falls, ruines, shipwracks, plagues, and other populare harmes. Such inconveniences are (most often) ineuitable, and it lieth not in the Science of Physicke, to vie any precaution, against them; but onely to heale the harme already happened, if it be possible. So leauing these termes of life to the arbitration of fortune (which is nothing else, to speake more piously) then the

then the pure will of God, without order of Nature, as elsewhere we haue entrusted: let vs speake onely concerning the terme of naturall life, and explicate the manner thereof more amply.

All the Philosophers and Physitions do agree together, that we ought to measure and bound the continuance or duration of our life, on that which may lengthen our naturall heate, and the radical humour. Now, to the end that these things may last the longer in vs, our good Mother Nature (as Galen speaketh) hath placed in vs a meruailous power, which by continuall application of Nourishment, defendeth the ordinary dissipation of our substance and Radical humour, maintaining our naturall heate, as well by this means, as by respiration, and the pulse of Arteries.

But such a kinde of power as we terme Nutritiue, being limited, and not infinite; cannot alwayes defend and conserue the sayde humour in suggesting another. Whereby it cometh so to passe, that the body waxing dry, by little and little, procureth thence, that that power (afterward) is not well exercised in it selfe: but weaketh dayly more and more, so that in the end, the bodies power ceaseth, from being nourished sufficiently. In this manner, those parts becoming saplesse and withered, the body waxeth meager & diminisheth; and so passing on further thus, it dryeth; and then this condition is called wrinkled Age. This is the principall natural necessity of corruption and death, to all bodies begotten: for death ensueth then, when the humor primitive, sustaining or radical, faileth, and natural heat becommeth quenched; and this is the end of life, which we terme naturall ending.

As concerning the Art of Physicke: It is an Art (saith Auicenne) that exempteth not from death, nor can conduct every one, so farre as to the latest terme of humane life. But it assureth and exempteth from two things; the one is from putrefaction, that it can no way seize, vpon the body, except it be by some externall occasion, as the Pestilence, or poyson; the other is in defending the naturall humiditie, to the end, that it may last the longer, and bee the slower in consuming.

These two things are in the power of Physicke, whereby it may prolong life, for so long time as it is due, according to the temper of euery man, and that by three means. The first whereof, is, to pre-occupate strange heats; to hinder opilation; and to eiect the excrements, from whence ensueth the generation of putrefying; or when they are engendered, to qualifie and quench them. The second is, the due administration of drinking & eating; in substance, quality, quantity, time, and order. The third is, to abstaine from things, which, in consuming and exhausting the Radical humour, in a very short while doeth resolute, or dissipate together the naturall heate; as excessiue traualle or labour; yle of sharpe or piercing things, watchings, cares, and diuers passions of the minde. But about all other, immoderate carnall Copulation, and at incommo- dious houres; with some other such like things, which a man may, and ought to shunne, by following the good and wholesome ordinances and rules of Physicke.

But (say you) no man neede doubt of these things, for euery one will gladly agree, to moue the foresaide Reasons, that such cannot but live long, as keepe within the compass of temperance, and haue an especiall care of their health. This is not the matter, of attaining vnto the end and terme ordained by Nature, without abridging or shortning it, although this is a case verie rare. But I demand principally, whether the end and naturall period of life, maybe aduanced and prolonged by the Art of Physicke, or no? The Answer hereto, is, That life is not onely conserued by Physicke, but likewise prolonged. For, it standeth with good reason, that the thing, must needs be the more confirmed and sustained, the principles, foundation, and produced causes whereof, may be continued and extended, yea, & (especially) made the stronger. Nowe, the principles of life (that is, naturall heate, and the primitive humor) if they cannot bee re-integrated, yet (at least) they may be repaired, & made more vigorous by this Art, According as the curing of Hedickie or conuulsall Feauers doth shew vs, and the recovering or amending of euery complexion; whereby the naturall heate is ordered and tempered.

or moistly, as by Bathes of pure fresh waters, and other such like remedies, the radicall humour may be the longer conserved; which otherwise would be ouer soon consumed; and naturall heat kept temperate, so that it may consume her feeding the more sparingly, by defect whereof, death naturally ensueth: wher is the man who wil not confesse, that life may be prolonged by Physicke, which else would haue bin much shorter, and according to Nature? I know well, and I confesse it, that the solid and spermatike parts, cannot be moistned substantially, & of themselves: neuertheless, you will grant, that they may be moistned through the voided spaces and pores, by which the feeding humour insinuateth it selfe, and whereby also the wasting of the radicall humour is the more tardied. And it is almost in the same manner, as when we put water with oyle into a Lampe, to the end, that the Oyle may the more strongly resist the flames deuouring.

But yet (say you) although the termes of life may be lengthened, yet it is not strongly enough proued by this argumēt. Let me then reply, that of the Complexions or tempers of the body, that of the most and cheefest life, is moisture, or that which is in like manner (or together with it) hot and moist, which vulgarly wee vse to terme Sanguine: the contrary, which we call Melancholy, is of far shorter life. So that, whensoever both of them shall vse one gouernement together, and like maintaining; yet notwithstanding, the first will be of longest lasting, because it hath the terme of it owne life furthest off, from the principles of it own generation. Now, the Art of Physicke enstrueth, & the vertue thereof is so great; that it can change (by little and little) the naturall temperature of cold and dry, into their contrary: as Galen teacheth how to do it, in his two last bookes of the preservation of health. Doth it not follow then hereby immediately, that the terme of life may likewise be prolonged by the Art of Physicke? Yes, and that some one, unfortunately borne, and (euen bound as it were) to shortnesse of life; hath yet changed the condition, and become thereby farre more liuely and chearful. Onely by this meanes (in mine opinion) that euerie one easily vnderstandeth, how to learn of another; which is nothing else, but how to lengthen the limits of all Ages, whereby ensueth, that the course of euery life may be prolonged.

And first of all, that the vigor and flour of youth, may long time be preferred by the Art of Physicke, Galen declareth it in this manner: There are two principall ends in the conseruation of health, which are in our power: namely, to restore the substance dissipated by meats and drinks conuenient, & to resist the excrementes proceeding from them. If no defailance bee made in any of these: the body (so long) shal inioy helth, and will bee very long time conserved in the strength of his owne vigour. In like manner, and by the selfesame reason, Age (altogether vnaoidable, of such as ought to dye by naturall death) is to bee prolonged by the helpe of Physicke: for that swoonings, trances, and the pale asbie countenances of extreme olde Age, shall come very slowly.

Heereby finally we may conclude, that as in all ages (for we may in like manner, and much more easily, vnderstande the termes of childhood, infancy, & youth) and euery estate of life: the termes may be prolonged by Physick, for further time then they are ordained by Nature. And these are the limits, which God (the principall Authour of Physicke) would haue subiected to this Art: which are in our power, so long as God permitteth, and cutteth not our third of life, vntill it pleaseth him. Euen as in like manner heerebefore, and beyond all the order of Nature by him appointed: he sustained and prolonged life myraculously, without anie Physicall helpe, yea, euen without eating and drinking.

which agree likewise (very wonderfully) together in many other things, as may more at large be discerned, by diuers discourses following. For, to explicate (familiarily) the decays of Physicke, I shall often borrow similitudes from warre-like actions, and namely at this instant (mee-thinks) I may serue my turne with one, which aptly offers it selfe for my purpose, thus. If a Generall besiedge a Towne, & take it not within some promised time, or else so soon as they hope, who are far off, without knowing how it might be taken; although the Captaine performed his utmost diligence: he shall be suspected and accused in diuers kindes, as of negligence, slothfulness, intelligence, corruption, treason, ignorance, precipitation, or tardinesse in his enterprizes, badde conclusion, pusillanimity, or some other defect in his charge, & yet all these viterly false. But they which iudged thus peremptorily, knew not what resistance the besiedged made, what good prouision they had, what strength of men, and all things requisite to defend themselves, beyond the expectation of the besiedged; who might be abused by his scouters and spies, and diuers, making report of the estate of the place, and of some other exteriour semblances, whence might be imagined, what was within the Towne.

So farcth it with the Physition, who besiedgeth any disease, treacherously entred into the bodye of Man, to enforce him forsake the place. Oftentimes, hee is abused by exteriour signes, and very goodly outward resemblances: whereby, thinking that he is at the end of the Cure, he is compelled to beginne againe. For, hee meeteth with more corruption and ill humours, then hee knew how to fore see, the Disease making farre greater resistance, then the Physition thought on: reinforcing, and repaying it selfe dayly more and more, against the best succour and remedies applied. So that the sicknesse will last longer, then himselfe that hath it expected, and cannot be cured so soone, as (perhappes) the Physition promised, or others imagined, that had intelligence thereof. Whereuppon, hee groweth suspected presently, eyther of ignorance, or of negligence, of couetousnesse, malice, or some other vice, which induceth him to lengthen out the disease, longer then it ought to be.

As touching ignorance, I suppose it could not bee so, but that the Physition was held to bee skillfull, expert, and an honest man. If hee proued not such a one, it was ill done to call him, and to commit the patients life into his handes: so that the Patient may well say, as Iesus Christ replied vnto Pilate, Iohn 19, verse 11. He that deliuered mee to thee, hath the greater sinne.

As for negligence, I grant that there are Physitions learned, expert, and men of good esteeme, who may passe (somewhat ouer-lightly) their visitation and curing of sick perfonnes: but I can neuer thinke, that it should bee to any such end, as to prolong the paine; but rather that it is a negligence of inaduertence, as may happen in diuers of their other sayffaires. For which, there is very good remedy by earnest solicitations, inciting them (as they ought) to doe their dutie, and wishing them to be more frequent in attendance; or else, by giuing them a coadiutor or assistant, to make them the more diligent in their care.

The most that is to bee doubted (in mine opinion) is greedie Auarice: For the vulgar sort thinke, that Physitions (commonly) lengthen out Diseases, and draw the into some time of continuance, to deriue the greater profite from them. Wherefore, I would gladly stand somewhat the longer vpon this point, to reure this false opinion, which is the most erroneous of all.

First, I am of the minde, that the Physition should bee an honest man, in regarde, that hee ought to loue his owne Honour and Reputation. I desire also, that hee should profite in his profession; as euerie one should gette Goodes honestly by his Vocation. If hee bee an honest and Worthie man; hee hath bowelles of Christian Compassion, and neuer will suffer any man, (by or with his will) to languish out in sicknesse or disease: but if hee bee no such man, hee ought not to bee employed, as I haue formerly saide. But if hee be badly enclined; he may make his aime and intent, to grape vp Wealth; getting a name for no other end, but to become rich. Yet let me tell yee, if hee prolong Diseases, which he may and can shorten: hee

he is no able man, but goeth quite contrary to his intention. For, if he can cure in lesser time then other men do, he shall be in the greater request: hee shall haue such crowdes of patients resort vnto him, as hee can hardly come neare them himselfe, and rather they wil giue him a french Crowne, then a Testir to any other. For, what is hee, that would not rather pay double, treble, yea foure-fold more then ordinarie, to be so soone recouered? If, to some other Physitian, who commeth ouer-late to the cure, ten Crownes bee giuen: there needeth no complaint, if sicke Crownes be distributed to him, that shall abridge the time of a mans agony, in halfe the third or fourth part of sufferance.

Physitions
are not able to cure or re-couer at their own pleasure.

But, to speake vprightly, it is not in the Physitians power, to doe any such acte at his owne pleasure. He would gladly with it so, that he had such a vertue, as to heale by touching, seeing, or the very first receipt giuen, or onely by good gouernement, or any other such light direction: He should haue the lesser paines, be tenne times the more esteemed; and gaine infinitely to his owne advantage. Oh good God! how soone might hee be rich, that could be so prosperous and successfull. It is not then to be imagined, that Physitians (prouoked by couetousnesse) should delight in prolonging diseases: seeing they may gaine so much with good-will, reputation, yea, and extraordinarie recompence, if they had power to cure with such expedition. But I pray you tell me one thing, Is there a Physitian, that hauing parents, kintred & familiar friends, of who he wil take nothing for his paines? Can hee cure them (for his credite sake) in lesser time: the disease being alike, and the subiect answerable? Hee winneth nothing by the length of such sicknesses: it is enough if he loose not the good opinion conceived of him, and diuers kind of offices done vnto him. Let mee say moreouer, when himselfe, his wife, or children lie sicke; they depend vpon his owne experience, and neede not to haue any delay in their recouerie: but can hee sooner cure them, then any other being in the same distresse? Questionlesse, it is a great follie, to thinke, that Physitions should be so forgetfull of themselves, as, to prolong diseases willingly, and with their knowledge; in regard of iust affection to their owne honour and profite.

It may fall out with them, as it often doeth to hardie Souldiours, in besieging some appoynted or determined place, who thinke to effect the businesse in three dayes compass, and yet continue there a moneth before it, without dissembling or sparing any paines. They were perswaded, that a wall could not resist tenne shotte of the Cannon; and yet it out-stood more then an hundred. They held opinion, that the besieged were not stored with victuals and munition, for about eight dayes; and finde them furnished for more then two months. Whatsoeuer is thought or conceiued in this kinde, be they neuer so many, they are but coniectures, idiomes of some resemblance, examples and obseruations, which faile as often as they speed. And yet (for all this) the valiant Capitaine assaillant, ought not to be accused, for ill doing his duty, when hee performed all that Arte and Industrie could require.

In all respects, this is the Physitians case, who is most excusable altogether, when hee sayleth in the quantity and efficacy of his remedies. For this is the principall matter (as Galen auoucheth in many places) that makes the Arte of Physicke coniectural, Defining coniecture to be a meanes or condition, between perfect knowledge, and pure ignorance. Therefore it ought to be interpreted to the best, and taken in good part, what successe the remedies sort vnto, which learned, expert, diligent and honest Physitian applyeth fittest for the purpose, and the most iustly as is possible for him; euermore referring the euent and issue to Almighty God, who giueth and taketh, augmenteth and diminisheth the power of those remedies, according to his best pleaseth him, whether the disease shall be soone or slowly ended; one while indifferently amending, an other while agayne as doubtfully depending.

Malice or spleene now remaineth; which may be suspected in the Physitian. If there be the very least occasion of rancour, hatred and ill will betweene the Physitian and his patient: there was no good aduice or discretion, in calling such a man to the businesse. For (on the contrary) it is very expedient, that the sicke person should loue his Physitian, and he him agayne in like manner, although they haue no knowledge of each other, eyther by name or action. In this case, a strict concordance of amity, ought to be contracted betwene their hearts: For other-while, the patient will neuer kindly receive his Physitians best succour, nor the other care for administering, where hee findeth his paynes not to bee affected. As for deliberate and purposed malice, with an intent to doe hurt secretly; if there be any Physitian to be taxed with such a sin: hee ought rather to be rancored with impositions, and not any way to bee imployed.

But, I vnderstand by the vulgare sort, that they take this word Malice: in another kinde of sense, to wit, that Physitians (with their intent and knowledge) doe cast downe their patients bodies ouerlowe; by abstinence and euacuations, euen endangering the very latest passage. And that this is done, but in ostentation of their Arte, and to winne the worthier reputation, when they can come off with any credit or else they saue and shield it, with some prognosticke opinion, conceyued at the beginning and vnder taking the businesse, that the patient was (euen then) in danger of death; but this doth proceede from such, as haue formerly fallen into the same perill. Thus doe I comprehend the doubtful coniecture of the common people, and (many times) they spare not to speake it.

In very truth, it were most maliciously, traitorously and wickedly doone, if any Physitian should play such pranks with a poore sicke bodie: yee, as vilely done, as if a man should throw such a one into a river, as knew not how to swimme, hoping quickly to cast a cord after him, thereby to get him on shore agayne. For it may so fall out, that the party thus lowled and submerged in the water, knowes not how to catch the cord, or cannot hold it strongly enough, or hath not power sufficient to be drawne forth, and so is drowned in this distresse. But surely, it is not credible or likely, that any Physitians should be so bad minded, as to bring sicke bodies so low by their applications: which (if they are not) ought to bee well instituted, and accordingly as best appertayneth to the case. It is the disease it selfe, which continually undermineth the forces of nature, encreasing still his owne power to a certayne poynnt, which is the vigour and foraigne condition of the sicknesse. After which, if the disease be curable, ensueth the declination, and diminution of the maladie; and thorow all these accidents, the patient proceedeth on to health, as wee shall haue fitter occasion to speake of hereafter.

There are people somewhat more modest, who say not, that Physitians do rake downe their patients bodies so lowe, and bring them into danger: but that they stretch forth the sicknesse in length, eyther by their indulgence (that is, by ouermuch pleasing the sicke persons humour) or to binde him in the larger advantage to them, by recouering him out of a long lingering maladie. As touching indulgence, or tender-heartednesse, it is verie true, that many sicke men affect rather, to be slowe in recouering, then speedily, onely by being the gentler handled: which is an excuse sufficient for the Physitian, provided, that hee makes protestation thereof, for safetie of his owne honour and reputation.

As for such as prolong sickness, thereby to deriue the greater benefite: that were a smooth-faced kind of treason, and (indeede) meere villany. And surely, it cannot be credible (if the Physitian do vnderstand himselfe well) that he should (at any time) offer to delay a disease. For, he is not able to measure, or comprehend the times length; and, by giuing way to such protraction, the interior cuill may grow the worse; wherein is greater perill, then delaying simply, or the cure waxing long. It is another maner of thing, then vicers dealt withall by the Chirurgian: for they may well bee maintayned, without any prejudice to the person, because the inner parts of the body may be safe enough, purging themselves by the vicer, and that there be no other harme, then the vicerated parts.

For prooffe whereof, wee oftentimes appoynt, that Fistulaes should be entertayned with delay, and make issues and fontanelles in many places of the body, which wee must haue kept open for verie long time. But inward maladies are of another consideration, and neuer ought to be dallyed withall: but if they can be cured, red, to procure it with all possible speede, or so soone as may be.

Another point of calumny, is, that Physitions doe abuse the world, that men may well be cured without them; nay, much better and sooner: and, they doe nothing else but deale confusedly. Wee haue already sufficiently confuted this folie, by the sacred authority of Ecclesiasticus. Notwithstanding, I will borrow one similitude more from that famous (and as much wronged) Militarie profession, our Arte holding therein equall comparison. Some places doe gladly yeeld themselves to the besieger, in regarde hee hath cutt off all their victuals and prouision. Others, at the very first view of the Cannon: Other at the first assault: And contrariwise, some there are that remain impregnable. Now, if we should argument in this manner, we daily see places, that yeelde themselves without enforcing: what neede is there then of besieging, assaulting, fighting, ruining the walles or any other hostile acte? What neede we to make warre on Towne or Cittie; when (many times) wee see them voluntarily submitte themselves? It is then but an abuse, and a foolish idle expence to the country (how feditious fouer it be) to haue Souldiers, Artillerie, and any other furniture for warre: where such employment is counted a meere inuention, and cheating of the people, who liue free from such molestation, and all goes well with them.

To our purpose then. If all places be feeble, and no resistance is made, by men well munited, and provided with courage, and other things requisite for their defence; those places may easily yeelde themselves. As the like doe light diseases, against which needeth no force of notable remedies; but many times do weare away of themselves: yea, and sometimes the very strongest, as burning feauers, when there is no great munition within the body to entertaine them, but that the naturall forces make worthy resistance, against the insolencie of the euill. Otherwise, there is neede of succour, to employ batterie, and all kindes of the best remedies: albeit often it commeth so to passe, that all these doe aduantage nothing, the disease remaying still incurable.

What benefite is it to forrow then, or say, that the partie might haue bene better holpen without all this, or that the patient is meere abused? Rather account that truly for an abuse, if a man promise cure of a disease, which is held to be incurable; hee not knowing any remedie, that hath power sufficient to ouercome it: Euen as he shall be abused, that attempteth to compell a Towne to yeelde, by blowes of his fists, or to beate downe the walles with a harquebuzze shot: where the Cannon is rather too litte, and no answerable engin or instrument is to be had. Such are the notable abuses, & true cheateries, which Mounte-banke Empirickes impose vpon the people; promising the curing of all diseases, and more then all many times. Wel may it be said, that they abuse the world, and not naturall Physitions, being learned, expert, and approued honest men.

CHAP. VIII.

That it is neither sinne, nor any acte ill done, to call for the Physition, and to vse his remedies, when men are diseased.

Here is an other kinde of error grounded on the foolish superstition of some Idees, who thinke it an offence to God, if they call for the Physition, to cure their harms & sickness; saying, It is to contradict, and oppose our selues against the will of God, who hath visited them with such an affliction, and onely for their good: because, by chastising the bodie, the soule is purged from sinne. Adding further, as maister Gwydo Chauliac declareth in his singular chapter. God hath sent me, as he pleased, and he will take from mee, when he pleaseth, the name of God be blessed, Amen. Referring their health and recouerie (wholy) to the intercession of the Saints and the Saints of Paradise, making Vows, Almes, Prayers, and Pilgrimages, &c.

This opinion most erronous, is easily refuted, by that which wee haue already alleaged, out of the Booke of Ecclesiasticus, where he piously exhorteth the sicke (and with great wisdom) To reconcile himselfe first to God, whom hee hath offended: and after, to giue way to the Physition, whom God hath created, & giuen him know- ledge, to be glorified in his wonderful works. It is most true, that God sendeth afflictions for our chastisement, and hath made vs subiect vnto them, because wee should acknowledge our owne infirmities. From him also proceedes health and recouerie, by those means which he hath ordered in nature: giuing vertue to plants and other creatures, to ouercome and expell diseases: ordaining the Science of Physicke, & the Apothecaries skill to that effect, euen as well as Tillage and husbandrie, ordained for the sustentation of men, and support of this fraile and mortall life.

Well may we say then, that these are the meanes which ought not to be despised; for, a wise man will no way disdaine them. Otherwise it is to tempt God, as if (vainly) we would haue him to worke myracles, according to our appetite. For, he that saith, If God will that I shall be healed of this sickness, I shall be healed, without vsing the Physition: And if I must die, the Physition can not saue mee. This is euen as if hee should say, If I must yet liue a yeare longer, and that is so appointed by God: I shall safely liue without eating or drinking, and then such expences may well be spared. For if I must liue so long, it is impossible that I should die before, although I neither eate nor drinke.

An extraordinary folie and rashnesse, for a man to promise to himselfe, that God will worke a miracle vpon him: euen to tempt him by such an essay, trauing foode fit for him, and appointed by God for the nourishment of his body. Is not this meely tampering of God, to trie whether hee will worke against the order of nature, or no? He may suffer him to die in this folie by meere extremitie of hunger; and the poore Idiot shall then finde by effect, that he vainly collected this fantastike brutallie in his minde, that God should maintaine him in life, without receiuing sustentation. If God will, he can doe so, but we know the ordination of his owne will, for all men to make vse of his blessings in their food, whereto we are to keepe vs, and not to seke after other extraordinarie means, which are vngodly to vs; and not to bee employed, according to our presuming appetites.

So standeth the case of Physicke, appointed by God for the health of the sicke, and conseruation of them in sound condition. For, whoeuer will be cured otherwise, and hath gotten an opinion, that if he must haue health, he may haue it without helpe of the Physition; who hath the only meane to doe it: he tempteth God; and expects, that hee should performe a miracle, foolishly contemning the naturall course, which God ordained against diseases. Euen as if his house were on fire, and hee will suffer none to quench it with water, saying: If God will that it should be saved, the fire will be quenched by other means.

CHAP. IX.

Concerning the ingratitude and unkindnes in sicke and diseased persons, towards Physitions.

Ingratitude is most odious both to God & men, and hath iustly bin reputed for so notorious a vice: as he that speaketh of Ingratitude, speaks of all the euils in the world. And this is so common amongst men & especially in the case of Physitions; as I am amazed many times, that any generous heart will be a Physition: his profession beeing euerie where subiect to calumny, and conline germane to Ingratitude.

But there are some friends, men of reason, honest and acknowledging, who can see cleaneely couer this offence: seeming willing in any goodnes towards the profession, and not altogether so vthankfull as others are. For there are some who complaine in contencie, as they haue protested publicly, & very often: that (next vnto God) they hold their liues of such & such Physitions. And, having acknowledged (according to their faculty) the labor and industry of the Physition, will also confesse freely, that they are vnable to recompense him with all their goodnes, as therein they speak no more then truth. For, if they owe their liues to the Physitions succour, their life is of greatest value about all their goodnes is not in their power to discharge that debt, although they giue him all their substance.

But the worst point of recompence, is their thankfull acknowledgements to the Physition, saying; they stand obliged to him, and Physicke ordained by God, for benefit of the sicke and healthfull, and that no man should despise it.

An ingratefull man is the only foule name in the World.

Outward professors of loue to physitions, all in ceremony, but little in acte.

Life is more worth then all the wealth in the world.

Wherein the chiefest point of recompence consisteth in gratifying Physicians.

and are indebted to him for their life. This is euen as much, as if a man should snatch a sword out of anothers hand, that stooke ready to kill him therewith; or a strangling cord, by which he meant to end his daies. Were it your case, stood you not beholding to that man for your life? And could (all you had) make him sufficient recompence? Some will say, I haue well payed my Physician, yea, ouer-payd him; haue giuen him so much euery day, I owe him nothing. If he haue made me well, I haue as wel requited him. Alas poore man, that which is giuen to the Physician, is a small acknowledgement, for so great a good as thou hast receiued: for thou payest or recompencest him with the fruit of his own labour: If hee preferred thee from death, (as happily he did, the grace of God assisting) there is no equal recompence in thy power, except thou expose thy life for him, as he made no spare of his for thee. In this manner thou remainest (for euer) indebted, and thus thou confessest truly thy obligation, when (with an intire and vpriight heart) thou makest such an acknowledgement to him.

I know there are some, who wil thinke these words to be hard, and harsh; when I say, he faued thy life, and preferred thee from death; notwithstanding, it is discerned euidently. Put the case, that a man being wounded, loseth his blood in extreme abundance, and doublelesse dyeth instantly, except the blood be staied: he that puts his finger into the wound, & thereby ceaseth bleeding; is not he worthily said, that hee saueh life? As much, and farre more doth he, that restraynes it by medcins, and so consolidates the wound, as (otherwise) it could not be healed. As much also doth he, that restrayneth a fluxe in the belly; an extreme vomiting, or some other pernicious and deadly vacuities: Or (conueniently) healeth a Pleurisie: Or him, whom the Squinzie hath stuffed and balle strangled. As much (alquestionlesse) doth he, that catcheth a child out of the fire, where he had bene burnt to death, but for such present succour.

No lesse account ought to be made of Physicians, who make prouision against inward euilles, and succour nature secretly by diuers means, the power whereof appeareth by worthy effects; because they are (as Herophilus saith) The hands of God.

For he releueth and draweth from deadly dangers, by the means of apt remedies, which the Physician vseth in needefull time. Is it not then a worke more diuine then humane, and can no way be sufficiently recompenced? whereof Ecclesiasticus spake very well. The Science of Physicke, and knowledge in the Physition, shall exalt his head, and make him admirable among Princes: the Physition shall be honoured of Kings. These are the principall acknowledgements due vnto him, honour and gratitude, as a certaine obligation: and not perswasion, that money can returne him sufficient, or equall recompence.

But there are some, that doe deale farre worse, who, after they haue bene healed, by the means of good and loyall succour: can not endure to betolde, that they are beholding to the Physician, but growe hatefull against him, that saued their liues. Oh extreme ingratitude! but yet not only in these our daies: For Hippocrates, in his Epistle to Damagetus, maketh Demonstrations to speake in this manner. I thinke (saith he) O Hippocrates, that in our Science, many things are subiect to oblique and ingratitude. For sicke persons (if they escape) referre their recoverie to the Gods, or else to Fortune, or else to their owne good complexion, robbing the Physition of all honour: Whome (oftentimes) they haue afterwards, being angry and offended, that anie should thinke them beholding, or indebted to him. Moreover, they will not attein or confesse their obligation: but rather are well pleased, that ignorants in the Arte (who neuertheless liue by the Profession) should be of the same temper, kicking enuiously against him, &c.

This suiteth (best of all other) with these our daies. For, the most part of sicke people now referre their recoverie wholly, to some he-Saint or she-Saint of Paradise, to whome they vowe and deuote themselves.

And although (many times) they do not performe their voves; yet can they follow that which the Italian sayd: Passato lo malo gabato lo Santo: The disease being past, the Saint is cheated. Euen (for all the world) as men make great promises to the Physician; so long as the extremitie of anguish lasteth, protesting to giue him mountaines and maruailes; yea, to pay all in Golde and precious Stones, or else, a good pension all his life time.

Recklesly

Ingratitude the very highest degree, baste him that preferred their liues.

Highly Damag.

Our times learned ingratitude of some Ages, was not a little of thankfulness.

In

Mountaines promised, and yet none were performed.

All means devised to rob the Physician of his due.

For performing of promises to physicians.

There are too many such in these ingratefull times.

Two are compared as agreeing with the physicians fortune.

In briefe, much goodnesse is pretended to be doone him; but when the patient cometh to health, then hee is of a quite contrary minde: Either, that the Physician performed not the cure, but that it might haue bene doone without him. Or else, from the follemne vowe he made, came the cause of his recouerie; with the good attendance of his Keepers, and diuers comfortable broaths: Or else, from the Apothecarie, to whome hee rather will attribute all the successe, rather then to the Physician; although the other did nothing, but by his direction. Else, hee will attribute it vnto the goodnesse of his owne complexion: or to some casual chauncy, by some disorder in him committed, and doone: some of these must haue the reference of his healing: So that the Physician shall surely haue the smallest part; or rather none at all, of the honour, gratitude, kindnesse and recompence.

And as concerning promises, the man being recouered, then hee considereth; what charges the sicknesse hath cost him; how long hee hath depended vpon the cure, and what an hinderance it hath bin vnto him. Thus his debt to the Physician is forgotten, and to him hee imputeth a part of his expences, reputing all superfluous, and keeping his bodde ouer long, hoping hee should haue bene restored much sooner, and with a great deale lesser charges. So that (in his account) the Physician should be indebted to him: and if hee could finde Iudges answerable to his minde, hauing iudiciall authoritie, he would haue him condemned in the greatest part of his expences. Heete is good acknowledgement of a benefite receiued; was there euer the like ingratitude?

Surely, I can compare it with none other, then as if a man should strangle himselfe by depayre; or otherwise, and some one coming to succour him, did cut the cord: when the other (maliciously) afterwards, should make him pay for cutting the halter. Or an other man, ready to be drowned in the water; any man endeavouring to saue him, put his own life in perill (by chance) to are a lappet of his garment; and the drowned man (after) to enforce repayment for his torne garment. So, they which should be payers, doe become demanders; confessing neither gree nor grace, for all the good seruice performed vnto them: but rather affect, that an ignorant varlet, or some chame-chamber woman; procured their healthfull recovery, when the cure and industrie of the painefull Physician. And I guesse this to ensue from one of these two reasons; eyther that they are so dull and forth, as they haue not the capacitee of comprehension. Or else, knowing it well enough; they are ashamed and confounded, for not hauing the will to acknowledge and confesse it. Well may I then conclude, as I beganne this Chapter: Ingratitude is most contemptible to God and men.

CHAP. VI.

That the vulgare sort doe account it nothing, if they be not cured or healed contrary to their owne opinion. That the latest applied remedies haue all the honour: And happy is the Physician that cometh to the declination of the disease.

Our next ensuing error, is strongly in cōiunction with the former, and (oftentimes) is the cause of the sayde Ingratitude. For, if a sicke person bee not healed against his owne opinion, or of such as come to visite him; there is nothing at all doone, and therefore they know not how to conceiue of the Physition.

Now, to heale or recouer a man against opinion, consisteth of two partes: One is, to heale in least time, and (as it were) at vnawares. As, if the disease last commonly with so much access, or so many daies; to cure it in much lesser space. For otherwise, say they: Well sir, the malady hath made his full course, and yet the Physition hath doone little or no seruice at all; as well might it haue bene done within the same time. Poore iudgements, doe yee not beholde, that in one and the same kinde of infirmities, some are short, and others long? There are tertian Feauers or Agues, and of continuance

Two imagined reasons of this base ingratitude to well deservers

Recovery contrary to opinion, is distinguished two wayes. 1. Of healing in lesser time, then the disease lasteth.

Of tertian Fevers, and them of continuance.

nance also, which last and hold for a month or two, you imagine, that the Tertian should not exceed (at the most) a few days, which are fourteen daies, and the continuer to consist of leauen, eleauen, or foureteene, as you haue heard Physicians speake, which is the terme of exquisite feauers. But you know not, that of a thousand, we shall hardly meete with two such, because the most part are confused and mingled, whereby their terme is much more lengthened, as in all diseases engendered of diuers humours.

You imagine (and it is true) that if the tertian Aque doe end within three weeks, or a month, being well beaten by our remedies: that (but for such encountering) would haue endured two or three months, as hath bin seene in many others. Was it not well rebated, and cunningly out-kept for the patient? Yet nothing at all is done (saith he) if much more be not performed, then he pretended. For he is of the mind, that a Physician may handle sicknesse, as men doe Stirrop-leathers, in lengthening or shortening them as they list. The acte is not sufficient to abate or extenuate a quarter, a third part, or the moiety of the paine, and to hinder or appease those diuers accidents, which commonly happen in all kindes of diseases, deliuering found and probable reasons, for the best account that can be possible, and the charges equall to his owne desire.

Yet this is falling into an other part of vulgar opinion, as namely, that all is nothing worth Sir, except ye can heale such as are held for dead. For, admit the sicknesses to be deadly, as all diseases are, which we call eager (that is to say, curing, goes on swiftly, and is not without terrible accidents) if the patient or his visitants hold opinion, that this great danger may be recovered, and it prooue to be so: yet still nothing is done. Contrariwise, if the sick man chauce to die, then the Physician is in all the fault. For the assistants were persuaded (though the Physician found the contrarie in his prognosticke rule) that he might be recovered. But if they imagine that a man will dye, or hold him already for dead, then the Physician beholdeth great wisdom. For, though he doe nothing else, but appoynt Broaths for him, with some drogneries or confectiones, especially restorative and cordiall things (albeit they are not to any purpose,) yet hath he performed a chiefe piece of work. Here is a rare cure; hee hath recovered such a man, giuen ouer for dead: he hath rayed him agayne: Oh, he is a great and worthy man, & pittie it is he should wand.

The same Doctor, at the very same time, hath another patient, whose sickness is not reputed deadly, because the euill lies more closely concealed. He takes very great payns to restore his health, and to compasse his intent, imployeth all his skill and industry for the patients safety: whom he knoweth to be in greater danger, then all the friends (standing by) doe or can imagine. At the last, he dyeth, quite contrary to their common opinion. Look then vpon Maister Physition, his reputation is suddenly lost, and then they tell him: That hee meddled with too many matters at once: The other man was much better gouerned. Thus, neuer is any thing doone of value, if it be not performed, against the hope and expectation of the vulgare.

An other error propounded in this Chapter, is, the attribution of the successe in the cure, to the latest administered remedies: euen as they refferre the occasion of sickness, to the last hurtfull acte that the party committed. As if a man had fed on some fruit, salad, or other thing lesse ordinary, & (soon after) the party falls sicke, of some disease more then of a months continuance) yet that must be the only cause: neuer remembering other precedent disorders, which procured the greater part in preparation. For, euill humors will haue a meeting together by little and little, till they come to a certayne quantity, against which, nature hath power to resist no longer. Euen as wee see a Glasse (set in the raine) to fill it selfe by many drops of water, so long as till they come to the brim: but being full, the least drop then following, makes an ouer-flow. Euen so, the least addition, to that which nature hath already supported, makes hir to sinke vnder the ouer-plus: as a yong Mule, vied to a common charge: how little sooner is added to her vsuall burden, she is (by no means) able to beare.

It was not then the last morsell, meate, or disorder, that did the harme, the precedent riots had performed their parts before. Euen as in the felling of a tree, 100.

CURES

The recovery of one patient, is more warrant for all others in the like case.

3. The third proposition.

Sicknesse imputed to last occasion, while the infirmity had bin of longer continuance.

Nature is so sufficient of itselfe, that needfull addition breedeth but diseases.

Perfession may do somewhat in physick, but not absolutely performe the Cure.

The Arguments still holding between Physicks and Skill stay Difficultie.

It is not the last application in physick, that is the Master-piece.

Sicknesse may seeme sudden, but they haue other precedents occasions.

cure (giuen with an Axe) appeare to be in vaine, and fill it stands; for tis the blundered and cleaneueth stroke that ouerthrowes it. Now, if a man shall say, the last oide blow did the deed; should he not do great wrong to all the rest? As also, when a strong Tower hath endured 1000. discharges of the canon, and at the last shot of all, it falleth: Did the last do any more then the first? It is all one in iudging of remedies, which abate the harme, and expell sicknesse out of the body. The last application (whatsoever it was) may haue the honor by vulgar censur, speaking according to their capacity: but what was the labour and paines performed before, of purging, glysters, drugges of diuers kinds, administered both within and without, did all these nothing? In the end, some one thing is added, and then the man is made well. Popre idle opinion, if this last admired acte had bene done at the first, it had serued to no vse at all: but after the hor seruice of so many other remedies, which controuled and disheartened the euill, shaking, and renting it from the root; the least thing in the world could then quite displace it.

Like to poore belied people, no longer able to hold out; let but a man be slain among them, and they yeelde themselves immediately. Shall it therefore be said, that all the battery, all the assaults, cutting them off from vitailles, and other good means for conquering; these serued to no purpose at all? But only he did the deed, that discharged the last Musket, and yet (notwithstanding) he killed but one man: If he had slaine a chiefe Commaunder, it had bin a matter of much more moment; Euen so, a bribe or ricker, hung about the necke; or drugges tied about the writh of a man; shall haue the honour of healing Agues, affirming, that they could not be cured by any other applied good orders, directions, remedies, and great medicines. This is all one, as if the disease hung by a twine thred, which may easily be broken by perswasion and opinion; and thereupon the sicke man restored: but if this had bene applied in the beginnings, the patient could not haue bene cured, by an hundred times as many perswasions, or the very strongest imaginations. Perswasion & imagination may do somewhat in healing, but not all, nor alone of themselves. Thus you see how true and certaine remedies, are robbed of their due honour, by iudging ill of the successe, because men would be cured suddenly, before any thing at all is done to effect it: otherwise, all induer else is but in vaine, & serueth to no purpose. He only is the author of the happines, after whom (immediately) a man findes himselfe to be recovered.

And because it is commonly said (which is the fourth point of this Chapter) Happines is the Physition, that comes to the declining of the disease, we must imagine, that what soeuer was done before, health stood at the doore; tarrying but for his entrance; healths introduction is attributed to him. And although that Physition shall do nothing at all, nor appoint or giue direction; yet (say the people) he is the cause of the happines: and if he had bin sent for at the beginning, the sicke man had sooner bin got on foot. But if the Physition be wise & honest, he will not be bonneted with this honor, consenting to theiue's larceny and detraction, against them that well entreated the patient, & (vnder God) were truly the Authors of his restoring. Rather he will reforme those poore opinions, by shewing them, that the accidents formerly past, were of the nature of the sickness, which hath had such a course; and that (by good directions already administered) all succeeded well, and to the aduantage of the patient.

If he doe otherwise, and attribute that honor to himselfe, or accept it from their vulgar ignorance, he commits a shameful wrong, and the like leueth may afterwards hang at his owne ease. For, of what sufficiency or reputation farther he be, it may so come to passe, that another Physition shall be called, vpon the ending of the cure by him taken in hand at the first, and he may ascribe him the same kinde. Euen as a man, therefore ought to be well aduised, and honestly consider his selfe, with such honor, as is due vnto him; boasting his colleague or fellow-labourer in painfull endeauours, yelding good and faithful testimony, of each others laudable performed actions. Accounting himselfe happy (newer than euer) that he came to the declining of the disease; where, taking no more paines, yet he shared a part in the gratefull acceptance, due vnto them that were employed from the first beginning.

CHAP.

4. The Physition is esteemed a happy man, that comes to the ending of an infirmity.

No honest man will be the bane pretturer of another mans truly deferred reputation.

Who soeuer doth another man wrong, may meete with the like himselfe.

A duty necessarily requir'd among learned and honest physicians.

The sick man accounteth nothing to be well done, if it be not answerable to his owne opinion.

It is nothing to cure sicke men, except they be reputed for dead, or very neere it.

Men repute themselves iudicious and wise in their owne conceits.

CHAP. XI.

Against such as censure and iudge of Physicians sufficiency, by their success: which oftentimes is more due to a happy chance, then skill or knowledge.

Badly can a blinde man iudge of colours, no more can a foole of Physicke.

HIS is a great matter, that the Science of Physicke should be so obscure & profound, as nothing more: and yet notwithstanding, there is not any so foolish but will take on him to censure the knowledge of a Physician. To iudge soundly & iustly, concerning the sufficiency of anie man: it behooveth him (at the least) to be of the same profession, and to know something therein too. It must needs then be great rashnesse, for men that vnderstand nothing in Physicke, to enterprize to iudge, who are the best and most skillfull Physicians. Their eye and censure waies on the success of their practise; & if from one hitale (by chance, or sodainly, as we said before:) he is censured for a singular Physician, although he did not any thing deserting speech. On the contrarie, the Physician little knowes, whether the patient shall die, or linger long in the agonies, which the vulgar esteeme lightest of all. Modesty will neuer say, such a man is more or lesse skillfull, if he be repared among men of knowledge: but will rather say, he is not happy among these men, and consequently, no great Physician; euen more censuring by the success.

Good and ill hap awaiteth vs, by the actions of al men, and consequently vpon Physicians.

It is vndoubtedly true, that in all things there is a happinesse and unhappinesse, & (as the Italian saies) La buona e la male fortuna, Good fortune and bad. And the best happinesse for the Physician is, (not to be called or employed for such as are certain to die: For, there is no reputation to bee had, no, nor in respect of friendship; neuertheless, he shall be sure nor to escape blame, although he hath done his very vtmost endeavour; and ought to bee no lesse esteemed, then if the patient had escaped. Euen as we may say of a Captain, that shall defende a Town to the very last Effort and labour, hauing enter vp all the horses, Affes, Dogs, Cats, Rats, which the besieged place could afford, hides, parch-

ments, and other vile foodde (as is sayde of them of Santerre, in the yeate 1573; who fed vpon the very tiles and flates, making bread of them, as I know not how.) Hauing lost the most part of his men, the wall all battered, and no meanes whereby to resist any longer; constrainedly (in the end) renders vp the Towne. Shall hee deserve lesse commendation (nay rather not farre more) then he that sau'd his own towne, being well munitioned and provided of all things needfull, which he preferred without any paine, & very easily might do so?

If this case should bee controuersied, it were easie to be decided; provided, that the censurer be a man of iudgement, and not transported with affection, as the most part of men are, in being wilfully blinded. Wherevpon ensueth, that they will not bee perswaded, but that there must bee a fault in the Physician, if the patient (of whom he is most carefull and diligent) amend not as they desire and hope. Nor doth this case differ from the Captaines, that was the Governour of the lost Town, against whom remaineth continuall rancour and discontentment; because he did not sufficiently foresee the sieges affaires; but thus is all his paines busshle in particularities of opinions, euen to the valew of a straw: Whereas contrarywise, he shall be accounted for a valiant man (although hee bee the basest villaine in the world) if hee haue but good success in his enterprizes.

Assuredly, it is no meane matter, for a man to bee happie in his attempts; but this happinesse dependeth not vpon his knowledge or sufficiency, because it is an especial gift of God; without which, he may be called to succour such as shall escape, continuing and effectuating the vertues giuen to remedies; as also, in not being called to such as shall dye: to whome the greatest paines and skill profiteth nothing. It is then verie ill done, to censure the sufficiency of a Physician by success, which is more due to happinesse, and to the grace of God, then to all the knowledge that can be in man.

And yet wee may not from hence inferre, or conclude, that it is all one, whatsoever Physician is called, to say; If God will that the sicke man shall recouer, hee will bestow his blessing on the remedies, if they bee misfitted by the most ignorant

No thanks for Generall cause a Town, which is able to withstand all resistance.

Men are our much add, and led by their own passion, as willfully blinded.

It is a great matter for a man to bee happy a life, and a life of such a nature.

For such as desire all good measures, they are dayned for their localities.

Impatience is vpon diuers other accidents, by ignorance of such as are severe censurers.

man in the world, and they shall prooue happy. It is very true, but yet it is to tempt God, as we haue formerly alleadged. As if we would haue him, that of stones, he should make bread; and, of a remedie to no purpose, make it profitable. It is a common saying: Helpe thou; and God will assist thee. Let all the best meanes bee sought that may be vied, and referre the issue to God, in whose hands are all things.

CHAP. VIII.

Against such men, to whom all things are specified, and Physicians slandered, in the most part of these accidents, which happen in diseases.

NONE of the very great paines, which a Physician (being the most generous, and of the best spirit) hath, is, to support the reproaches, and false accusations of the sicke person, or of his assistant friends, who are so unreasonable; that all the accidents which do happen in sicknesse, they attribute them to the remedies; and those of good success, they doubt whether they are due to the Physician, or no.

For, first of all, when they see the person very weak, they accuse the abstinence and paucitie of food, appointed to him by the Physician: or else letting him bloud, or the purgation; and that they are the causes of the weaknes, imputing no vertue to the remedies, which (in diminishing the euill and bad humours) sustained the sicke body in farre greater strength; for, but by the vfe of them, his estate would be a great deale weaker. That this must needs be so, do we not see some, who, condemning abstinence, bloudletting and purgatiues, become in farre more feeble condition? If they that make no vfe of such remedies, maintaine themselves in greater strength then other; one then might better say, that the remedies are the occasion of weaknes; but on the contrary, we behold those despisers to be more feeble, and (in the end) to die sooner then the other.

So is it of the other accidents, imputed vniuually to the remedies, as vomiting, flux of the belly, distaste of meates, alteration, paine, want of sleepe or watching, raving and such like, happening by reason of the disease properly, & from the nature thereof: but not from applied remedies as ignorant people suppose. For, if after the patient hath taken something, by ordination of the Physician, or onely some matter is applied vnto him, and then (quickly after) he hath a casting, or fluxe in the belly: this was the cause, by reason he did it not before. After such a medicine receiued, this Syrope, that Restauratiue, this Cordiall potion is so distastefull, as nothing can be more, alteration hath made the impressure far greater then before.

It is true, that these occurrences happen after, but not thereby caused. And is it not as ill argued, if a man should say: Since it is snowed, my cloake grew more warme then it was before; therefore the snow was the cause thereof. Or otherwise, Since I fed on that Capon, I haue had the head-ach, the Collicke, or fluxe in the belly; therefore the Capon caused all these accidents. Sillic capacities, whatsoever commeth after, proceedes not from all that which hath preceded. The fluxe in the belly, the casting, distasting, alteration, lacke of sleepe, raving, and the like other causes (to you vknowne) which produce such effects in their due time; was, as the learned Physician knew how to direct the medicine, by breaking the course of the disease, foreseeing the dangerous accidents, and diminishing them. All which notwithstanding, in despite of what hee hath done, the sicknesse will make his part good against him, and encrease it selfe to a certain point commonly called, the estate of the disease: but that may grow on more gently, then is to be permitted.

And if alteration, distaste, and other accidents doe encrease, after the vfe of some medicaments well appointed: beleaue assuredly, that they are from the diseases further progression, notwithstanding all the re-trenchings and resistances formerly made. Credite also, that the sicknesse would haue bene more furious, and the aforementioned accidents lesse supportable, if no meanes had bene made against them: as we see by good experience, in such as mis-prise those remedies. For if it be true, that many do die through want of helpe (which is a Maxime receyued generally) it must needs fall out then;

Vvv 3 that

When the sicknesse is violent, it checketh much skill in the physician.

Willfull refusal of helpe killeth many, and diuers dye for lacke of helpe.

that they haue had more accidents, & more tediousnes, then such as escape in the like perils. There is no need then of suspending, or calumniating the remedies, which haue bin, followed by some accidents, olde or new, and then to say: This frontall (after the vse of it) he hath slept lesse, or rauced more, for the frontall was no cause thereof, but the sickness is selfe, that could not by the best meanes then be tamed.

Faults are easily found, but few good reasons can be shewne for them.

Next, after the Cordiall portion, he had the hiccok, the disenteric, or the cramp. It is very true, but this taile belongs not to this Calfe, as we say in the common Proverb, this is another maner of straine. I deny not, but remedies may be shewed occasions sometimes, for they may be ill ordered, and but badly to the purpose. But Ieter presume, that the Physition should be learned, diligent and affectionate: of all which he should continually relish, for the better interpretation of his ordinaices, and recueing them in the more respect; attributing rather to the disease, or the expresse will of God, those accidents which happen (be they new or olde) then to the remedies. For there are diuers sodaine encounters, and which cannot any way be foreseene, to make a garde or prevention of them: as sometimes of a very light medicine, we shal proceed so far as bloud, because the patient was then vpon the poynce, of hauing the fluxe in his belly.

Of diuers encounters, no way to be foreseene or prevented.

The Physition, who can not diuine, especially on a neutrall body, neither sicke nor sound, that keeps not in bed, because he would be no sicker then he listeth: if nature make some euacuation of it selfe; hee (knowing it needfull) makes his medicine light enough. It hapneth hereupon, that after the operation, nature passeth on further, and makes a flux in the belly, which continueth inordinately: because the expultrix vertue, being pricked by the eagre and mordicant excrements, cannot of her selfe retraineth them. And the matter being corrosiue, cuts out the way as it passes along, that bloud ensueth of it. The medicine must endure the accusation of all this, which (notwithstanding) gaue but two or three small sieges: all the rest was but a surrounding, & as a meere torrent of humours, gathered together of longer time. As sometime it comes to passe, that a man pulling but one stone out of a wall; a fadome or two follows after, because it was so old and ruinous. Against a strong wall, there needs a Cannon or double cannon; but for a weak and feeble wall, a silderpece there will make a great breach.

And also, to iudge well of the effects of medicins; their true condition & estate must first be knowne, which none can so well do as the Physition, and not to iudge only by the effects. For, if during the operation, or soone after, we see that happen, which is not of that nature, caried or forced from the medicine; it is not to be attributed thereto. No more then as if a child, should giue a blow with his fist to a drunken reeling man, and hee should suddenly fall to the ground. It was not the stroke of the hand, that had such strength; but the wine or strong drinke which had ouercome him, whereby the fall happened to him.

Neuerthelesse, some one may reply by the selfsame comparison, that in like manner, to a sicke man (very weak) a light medicine being giuen, it hath the power to ouerthrow him to the ground. Then may we well couple therewith this other comparison; If a man should giue a fillop on the arme, to a woman being great with child, immediately after the should miscarry. Hapned this by the fillop? The arme is far hapned from the belly, & the fillop too light to enforce it: It is to be vnderstoode then, that from some other inward occasion, this so sodaine mis-hap received such vigour. Euen so, many other things doe meet together of themselves, not any way depending one vpon another; but casually & accidentally, & the causes (commonly) neuer preceded, or by any means discerned.

The quality & condition of remedies must be knowne rather then their effects.

Comparisons that hold no true correspondence with the rule of physick.

The policy of Gonello, to make good what hee promised to the Duke.

Many are moderns in giuing counsel; but few or none can giue right direction.

The fool cunningly beguiled the Duke in his matters, for the winning of his wages.

CHAP. IX.

¶ Thus there are more store and plentie of Physitions, then of anie other sort of people.

Finderecorded, that Alphonso de Este, Duke of Ferrara, being on a time in familiar conference, demanded; of what trade or profession there was most people. One answered, of Cordwainers or Shoemakers; another saide, of Tailers; another, of Carpenters; another, of Mariners; and another, of Lawyers. Gonello, a famous Buffone,

A pretty question asked by the Duke of Ferrara.

Buffone or Iester, replied, that there were more store of Physitions, then of any other kinde of people: and waged agaynst the Duke his matter (who was far off from any such conceits) that he would approue his wordes, within the compasse of foure and twenty houres.

On the morrow morning, Gonello went from his lodging, with a great Night-cap on his head, and a Kerchiefe binding vp his chin, and then a huge harte covering them all, beside a warme cloake about his body. In this furnishment, hee tooke the way towards the Pallace of his Excellencie, along the streete called La rue des Angers. The first man he met withall, demanded of him, what he ayed? Where to hee answered, that he had an outrageous pain in his teeth. O my good friend (sayde the other) I know the best receit in the world for it, telling him the matter & the means. Gonello wrote downe his name in his Tables, making shew, as if he had set downe the receipt. Not two paces further had he gone, but hee found two or three talking together: who demanding of him the same question; each man declared to him a seuerall remedy; he writing downe their names, as he did the first.

As he held on his way along the same street, going a soft and gentle pace, euerie man he met withall, stil gaue him counsel for seuerall receipts, and no one agreeing with another; yet still each friend assured him, that (what he spake off) had bin approued certaine and infallible; and still he wrote downe euery mans name. Being come to the low Bulwarke of the Pallace; hee was round engirt with many people there attending; because he was most familiarly knowne to them all; and euerie man pitying to see him thus distressed, (vnderstanding the reason of his pain) aduised him to many receiptes, which each man aouched to be the verie best in the World: he writing downe their Names, gaue them infinite thanks at his departing.

Being entred into the Dukes chamber, his Excellencie no sooner sawe him, but running to him, saide: How now Gonello, what aylest thou? In pittifull manner hee replied (euen as if he had bene scarce able to speake): Ah my Lord, I haue the tooth-ake, in the most cruell manner that euer man had. Whereupon, his Excellencie saide vnto him; Alas poore Gonello, I know a thing that will helpe thy paine presently, yea, if thy teeth were spoiled and rottens. Heefer Anonio Musca Brassano, my Physition, neuer found a better in all his practise; take it, and it will immediately helpe thee. Sodaynly, Gonello threw off all his sickly outside, laying out slowde: How now my Lord, what are you become a Physition too? See heere my roll of Physitions, how many I haue met withall, betwene mine owne Lodging, and your Court: they are in number almost two hundred, and yet I haue past through but one streete only. I will page as much more to my wager, to finde about ten thousand in this Cittie, if I should but go thorow it, as I haue done this one streete: finde you out as many more my Lord, of some other profession.

A history well met withall to our purpose, and verie true; for, euery man will be a Physition for one thing or other, and there are very few people, but they pretend to knowe enough, nay more then some Physitions do. I set asid some Chirurgions, Barbers, Apothecaries, Nurses, or attendants vpon sicke persons, wife women, Mountebanks, and other Empericks, euen to very Merchants, who, to make some profession of a part of Physick become meere Polypragmons; pretending to vnderstand more then Maister Mouche, making great outward shewes, and medling with many diseases, accompanied with shamelesse assurances, and no meane promises. I would leaue them, but that they are such a goodly number, and daily they increase by multitudes, out of the basest mechanical trades; as it is most lamentable to behold, and many liues perishe by their meanes.

There are diuers of them, that will controule the directions of a Physition, presuming to handle the patients pulse, and obserue his Vrine. Deliuering their own aduices, quite contrary to that which the Physition appointed. If there be any, who are better aduised heerein; I thinke the number of them to be so small, as a man had much rather be of those presumptuous companions, making vp a role of so manie vnderakers, as (indeede) they would appeare to be infinite. Some of the are so bold and impudent, as before the learned Physition (yea, euen in his presence) sence) they will deliver opinion, whether the patient should be let blood, or no; and when he bleedeth, that so much may be taken, and no more: That it is not good to purge, the season is not proper, but fitter for nourishing; when to minister restoratives, diets, coullises, prestis, Orges mondes, &c. which must be given by their order, or else the patients friends will never be quiet.

Euery man perfwadeth himselfe, to haue much more knowledge, then diuers Physitions haue.

The verie
chiefest controller of all Arte
and knowledge.

In briefe, the great controller, even the prime and chiefest Iudge of all, is, the ignorant vulgar, most vnusitt and vnindifferent, who (as Terence saide) Think nothing to be well done, but what they do themselves. And if their aduice be not followed, it is attributed to the Patients death, or to the prolonging of his sicknesse, if that some other course is not taken. Let the but imagine, and the Patient bee perswaded (by them) that it must be so; all other proceeding is absolutely erroneous, and things else is blamed, be they applied to the true purpose indeede. Is not this a miserable case? In other Arts, which are lesse obscure and difficult, and all things (well-neere) apparant to every eye; the Artizan is permitted to follow his owne mind. In Physicke, the most secret and hidden of all, and wherein the people cannot discern a lot; every man will dominere, like Rats in straw. Nor shall we euer see better successe by the order of Nature, for the most part of diseases, in persons of degree, that haue great visitation of followers: but alwayes they haue health foonest of whom the least account is made.

CHAP. XIII.

That it is not for the sicke Patients profite, to haue many Physicians, as in ordinarie: but one Physician sufficeth, being assiduous and skilfull.

The Author
writeth here
so such as are Physicians in decide.

His proposition may be vnderstood, by what we haue lately saide, touching vulgar estimation of Physicians: but I would not be mistaken, because my meaning here properly is, of such as are truly Physicians, in skill, knowledge, and profession. It is very reasonable and necessary, that the aduice of many should bee had, in difficulties, and matters doubtfull concerning a sicknesse. For (as the common saying is) Pour ce que l'on voit plus d'yeux, on voit plus clair. I suppose them all to see clearly; for, one may aduise one thing, and a contrary party another; whereby, their meeting and agreement, is to the profit of the patient. But to haue many Physicians, in ordinary (as it were) and all to haue equall care of the sicke person; can no way bee for his good and profit. For, in euery purpose, they may contradiet one another in some thing, or else about a matter indifferent, one in enuy of another, and more for ostentation then necessity.

Aduice of one Physician to another, can not be hurt-
full to the patient.

Pliny did very well obserue and note this writing thus. It needs not to be doubted, that Physicians (coueting reputation by some novelty) make a (sadaine Traffick of four souls. Hence ensueth those miserable contentions, about sicke bodies; none of them being of one and the same opinion, because no reputation must be made. Thence came that supercription on the unhappy Tombe: I was spoile, by hauing too many Physicians. Meaning thereby the Emperor Adrian, who (in dying) cryed out: That the multitude of Physicians had killd him.

The words of death bed.

The reason of this mischeefe is diuers waies vnderstood. As first, the enuy or ielousie, which (commonly) one man beareth to another; especially such, as are the worst created, ambitious, and couetous, beyond the ordinary course of other Artificers. For, it is usually seene: That one Potter is enuious at another, according to the ancient Adage. But much more (without comparison) the Physician, because he desireth, that the whole honour should be referred to him, of well predicting, well ordering, and well finishing the disease. Wherefore, hee cannot willingly endure, that any other should share a part with them. I speak of the couetous, ambitious man: who is likewise (commonly) quarrellous, a detractor, and insupportable.

Of couetous, ambitious, & quarrellous
Physicians.

You haue some men very modest, but yet ielous of the honor, which they conceiue is due to them; chiefly, in such occasions, which they thinke may bee done by themselves, as being cases light, common, and ordinarie. They can bee well con-

con-

contented, not to be contradicted; & yet notwithstanding, they will giue consent, and yeelde to the desire or pleasure of the Patient, or those friends that are about him. But this is not for the sicke parties profit, as I haue vnderaken to proue. For, although there be three or foure Physicians; one assisting to another for cure of the man, being all modest, peacefull, and skilfull: yet notwithstanding, wee knowe not how to preuent and auoide, the most part of such inconueniences as I will sette downe, and are (oftentimes) ordinary. For I leaue to them, who haue obserued it by others, to iudge, how much this manner of proceeding is incommodious, and hurtfull to poore patients.

Of the first in-conuenience
by multiplicitie of Physicians.

First, if there be but one or two Physicians ordinarily employed: they will (no doubt) be most careful, most diligent, most affectionate, to come off with theyr credit and honour. And yet one man alone, who shall haue the charge layde on his (shoulders, may be there much more attentue, because the trust is wholly reposed in him, and all the worth must redound to him: If that man haue a good heart, he will studie and labor, to do much better, then if he were comforted with another; considering euermore (as he ought to do) that in all difficulties he may quickly haue counsell.

Of the second inconuenience.

Another discommodity is, that manie Physicians can hardly meete together, to visit the sicke patient, and all at one hour. For each of them haue other cures of visitation, beside some hapning in the meane while, and other affaires of importance: whereby, men are oftentimes compelled, to faile of the appointed time; that all cannot be present with the sicke person. In this case, the Physician most vsed, or such as meete there, are greatly hindered in giuing their aduice, or for ordering against some occasion which may happen; fearing least the absent parties or parties, shall nor allow their iudgement; whereupon, it may breede an error in the patient, or his assisting friends, who will after knowe his opinion, and demand it alone by himselfe. Sometime, this may chance but about a Cherry, or a difference of as small moment, deferring of it selfe not to bee spoken of; but yet all must agree together, and giue consent in the case. This keeps the attending Physicians in no meane affection, and many times the patient in much more.

In like manner (comming now vnto a third point) they may endure many small things, which the ordinary and present Physician would order otherwise, following such occasions as present themselves at euery moment. I do call them small of themselves, yet often might bee brought to the patients great benefit; but hee dare not apply them, dreading discontentment in them which are absent. Hereby the patient may passe thorow diuers afflictions (from which hee might haue bene freed) as, during too much drought, or being kept ouer-hot, or too much pressed with fooode and Medicines, or prohibited of some pleasure and recreation, no way preiudicial to his healing, and such like. I hold my selfe satisfied, in setting downe these three inconueniences, which are ordinary in the plurality of Physicians; to shew and approue, that it is much better (without comparison) to haue but one Physician; provided, that he be assiduous and careful.

The 3. inconuenience.

It is the greatest happinesse for the sick man (that can be) to haue but one Physician, that goeth not away from him: For, by visiting him once or twice in a day, the patient cannot bee well cured: this may be called healing in grosse, and not exactly. For the present Physician, obserueth many particularities, which causeth him to change opinion euery houre; as well of his nourishment, as in other Remedies. Wherefore Celius saide very well, where he sheweth, what diligencie a Physician ought to vse, in well directing the patients fooode, for due houres, and measure of them, because it is one of the chiefest points in the whole cure. For (as hee writeth) Food fit to purpose, is a most singular Medicine and remedy. It ought alwayes to be obserued, and generally, that the attending Physician do continually respect the Patients strength: When it shall be good & able, to vse abstinence; and when hee beginneth to doubt his weaknesse, then to make supply of food. For it is his duty, that he surcharge not the sicke body with superfluous matter; higher to betray it to feeblenesse, by fasting, or starving, &c. Hereby may easily bee vnderstood, that many (together) cannot bee cured by one Physician: & that he (if he vnderstand truly his Art) is most proper, that neuer par- teeth from the sicke person. But such as are addicted to gaine, because much is to be had by a multitude of people: they willingly embrace those Rules, which require no such great curiosty, as in this case. For it is verie easie, to account daies, and houres, and other times of access; especially in such, as use not often to see their patients. But it behooueth him to be attendant, that must haue a care of all needfull things, and when the patient shall bee once feeble, to see that hee haue good nourishment.

The great importance of the sick mans seruice.

Hereby you may perceiue, how important the sicke mans seruice is, that he must alwayes be assisted by a good Physicion, both for his gouernement, and also for the vse of remedies. For, by being present, hee may aduance or tardie, encrease or diminish, and doe many things in other manner, then when the sick-man is seene but by starts and leysures, as is too much practised vpon the people. Wherefore, it is best to haue but one Physicion, though he be of the lesse sufficiency or reputation (and consequently of lesse presure; so that he be honest, most frequent, and diligent. For diligence, vigilancy, & careful obseruation in the ordinary Physicion: may counterpoize one of greater knowledge, that is not halfe so much imployed.

CHAP. XV.

Against such as complaine on the over-shore visitation of some Physitions.

Hip. in Epist. ad Demag.

In life is full of contrarieties, according as Democritus declared to Hippocrates, in the conference which they had together: as Hippocrates writeth to Damagetes in his Epistles. For, that which pleased vs now, will discontent vs within an houre. The labourer would bee a souldier, and (in short time) fall to his former condition againe. The Merchant would be made a Gentleman, and (soone after) returne to his Merchandize againe. But contradiction is yet more palpably discovered, when wee see contradictorie quality in one and the same thing. As, to be a souldier, and yet not engaged to follow war, to be a great landed man, and yet not subiect to suites in law; to haue Vellies and Drabs in the house, and yet to be free from robbing; to liue dissolutely, and neuer to be sicke. So is it in many, who would haue Physitions of greatest following, and most reported of for practice, (of whom the vulgar giue great iudgement, that they are men of singular knowledge, as oftentimes it so falls out, though not alwayes.) And sodainely they make complaint, of their too short or seldome visitation, and that they come not (so often as they ought) to see them.

All conditions are full of contrarieties.

This is a complaint commonly made of our Parisian Physitions, being the most famous, who in so great a Citie, haue ordinarily such plentie of patients, as it is vterly impossible, that they should stay long with any one of them. For, if a Physicion haue twentie patients to visite in a day, is it not much, if hee abide with each one a quarter of an houre at a time? For, in the longest day, which may consist of xvi. houres, I would haue him begin to visite at five of the clock in the morning, and to continue vntill ten: then begin againe at noon, and hold on till five in the euening, heere are ten houres imployed in visitation. It is verie necessary, that hee should haue some time of rest, as from tenne to twelue for his dinner, & refreshing from five to seauen in the same euening, and then to sleepe in quiet: for if he cease not day nor night, it is not possible for him to haue long continuance.

I will yet allow six houres for the morning, and six more after dinner. For, to go from one house to another, to mount and descend againe all the staires; importeth wel the space of two houres, in visiting of twentie feuerall persons. For no man whatsoever, can ride in poste quite thorough a Citie; and then in the Sommer, when the dayes bee long, the swiftnesse of motion is very dangerous, by over-heating, sweating, alteration of body, and other such like accidents. There remaineth then ten houres wholly cleere, that the Physicion may bee by each sicke mans bedde, and that is the most for such imployment: And howe much time is heere allowed then to each of the twenty? If I could account well, there were (for euerie one) a quarter of an houre in the mormorning, and as much againe after dinner.

But very certaine it is, that the most famous Physitions, haue to visite (som such dayes) about thirty patients; and besides that, to vie consultations, where a man is constrained to stay longer then a simple visiting. Whence ensueth necessaries, yea, and inevitably, that each of the other visitations, cannot bee halfe a quarter of an houre. For, hee must content euerie man, and he that imparts himselfe among so many, must needs allow euery one a little. Thus the Physicion doth but enter and depart, and (cursorily) informeth himselfe of the patients estate; feels his pulse, obserues his vrine, speaketh a word of that which is to be done, and then away to another.

He is not iustly to be blamed, for his celerity and summarie visitation, seeing it is not possible for him to doe otherwise; and they that call such men to their cure, are not well informed. Nay more, if the Physicion answer sometime, that hee can haue no leysure, considering the great number of patients he is to attend: some one or other will reply, O good Sir, if you do but looke in a doore, and then depart; the sicke man will thinke, that he shall bee healed by your verie sight only: if you would but once in a day see him, as you passe along, hee were well satisfied. As much saith another, yea, three or foure: What shall we say to such a man?

But some one will answer mee: He ought to haue regard of the persons quality, and make longer stay with a great Lord, Byshoppe, Abbot, Earle, Baron, President, Councillor, Treasurer, Generall of the Finances; and other men of Honour, who haue where withall to acknowledge and recompence him better, then ordinarily other men doe or can. I heare one make reply, that he ought to do his duty towards all men, and to acquire himselfe faithfully of his Charge. Beside, that (by some) he is to be much more commanded; as his parents, neere Kindred, Friends, Familiars, and some to whom he standeth in high degree obliged. Such persons indeed (according vnto humane sense and iudgement) ought to be preferred before the other, what ranke or degree fouer they hold. And such, of whom no money is to be taken, in regarde of the fore-named obligation; do iustly require of the Physicion, much more care and diligence, then they from whom hee may expect recompence. And therefore, it is no small matter, to haue a learned & wise Physicion obliged and affected vnto anie one, who will alwayes make more regard of friendship, then of greauesse.

And although the most part of our greatest personages, haue no other knowledge of the Physicion, but by his Fame onely, and are much lesse knowne to the Physicion; yet such knowledge being not reciprocal, and having no familiaritie, friendship, nor mutuall Obligation; the Physicion is no more proper to them, then any other beside of the same profession; who haue fewer crowds following them, may (happily) as soone minister succour, and giue more respite. But passion is so prevalent in these our dayes, as none must bee had, but hee that is in most request; and euery man would verily willingly haue him, which properly is no way possible, and yet they complaine of his slack attendance too.

If a man say, I am none of the meanest persons, and I haue where withall to pay him, as well as another: you shall haue an hundred to speake the same wordes. What shall the Physicion then doe? But diuide his visitations into so many pieces, as euery one may haue a little. But euermore let him reuerse the longest, for such to whom hee is most obliged, and standeth engaged; as reason and humanitie commandeth him.

Wherefore, it were much better (in my minde) that men heerein would take more aduisement, and to desire y which they may haue: that is, a Physicion easier to bee had, among them that are accounted learned and expert, and yet haue not such busie employment; because their season is not as yet come, being post-pozed to others, that haue more name, and longer time. And if there bee any difficultie in the disease, it may as iudiciously bee consulted on, as they that bragge most, and performe least. Beleuee it vndoubtedly, that if the Physicion be an able ma, he can soone vnderstand, and hath fewest wordes, which he had rather should appeare by prooffe, then waste the time in vaine lip-labour.

This is the best aduice that a sicke patient

tient can take, of what quality soeuer hee be, for his soonest helpe and succor. And if this meanes be such, as to haue the Physition still with him, or that hee goe but little from him: it will be much the better for him, imitating what hath bin discoursed in the precedent Chapter.

CHAP. XVI.

How much it importeth, that the sicke patient should repose confidence in his Physition.

The Authors clearing himselfe concerning the former chapter.

SOME may mis-vnderstand, that which I haue set down in the neighboring Chapter; as if I reprehended the affection which many haue to be visited by the most famous Physitions, and who (for their great reputation) haue most access in the best Cities. God forbid, I should therein do wrong to very venerable and rare persons, who (by their merit) haue acquired such renowne: And I should also offer iniurie to the sick if I perswaded them from affection, and recourse to the healers of their harmes. For, on the contrary, if men may ioy plainely, and so much as neede requireth; none in the Worlde may better doe it then they.

He taxeth nothing but vulgar complaints onely.

I taxe onely vulgar complaint, and in such as (to their owne shame) are discontented, because they cannot enioy what they would haue. I alwaies maintain, that they are onely the meekest men, in regard of themselves, and for their respect. Onely this is my desyre, that men of such fame and reputation, remaining alwaies in so great request: should also be most skillfull and expert, happy in their practises, and conformable to their patients. For otherwise, their high fales will strike, and their reputation (badly grounded) will sic vp in smoke.

In commendation of the renowned generally by the world.

But for the choise men themselves, they are verie meeke, apt, and correspondent, to cure the greatest diseases, and in the worthiest personages: in which respect, they holde reputation, and the cheefest ranke among Physitions, onely for happinesse in their cures. Because opinion conceiued of them, giues certaine confidence to the sicke man, to bee recouered better, and more securely by their means, then any other whatsoeuer. Whereupon, we commonly say in our schooles, Hee healeth most diseases, in whom most confidence is reposed. And this proceedeth from strong imagination, which hath mightie power, to make impression in vs; as I sufficiently haue shewne, in the Preface to my a booke of Laughter.

It is a power of the soule, which strongly moueth the blood and spirits, in such a strange manner; that if she walke along (hand in hand) with firme opinion and confidence, the very powers of Nature assemble, to fight against the sickness. And thereupon, great changes are noted in the Patient, onely at the very presence of a Physition deuoutly attending. For, desire and hope being satisfied, the soule releueth it selfe, and re-enforceth against the sickness. So that (verie often) Nature maketh some braue fallie and effort; chasing the matter of offence impetuoussly, by a Crisis as we vse to call it, which is the conflict of Nature and Sicknesse. Contrariwise, if the Physition be not verie answerable in liking to the patient, perceiving him not so succourable, as hee desireth or would haue: such a Physition shal neuer proceed successfully, and the sicke man (contrifing and discouraging) will become much more feeble then euer hee was. For his spirities being danted, they haue no vigour at all; onely by the feare and distrust which hath before seized vpon his heart.

There is another benefite, which returneth to the patient, by hauing a Physition at his owne deuotion, and according to his wish and liking; because from him hee hopeth to haue great comfort. For, hee willingly apeth and accommodateth him selfe, to whatsoeuer he ordaineth for him: with a chearefull confidence, that all this will surely helpe and heale him. As on the contrary, what hee receiueth (from another Physition) all is in mislike & disdain, whereby, nothing can be profitable vnto him. For, although it were the best, and most delicate thing in the world, if hee haue not a good opinion of it; the stomach falls to a loathing, and neuer can it come so glad some to his heart, as when he takes it with a chearefull disposition. Wine, the brothe of a Capon, and the Brawne of a

CHAP. XVII.

Of such as will haue Physitions, and yet deny to do as they appoint and direct them.

NOT long since, I met at Narbona with a Gentleman of Venice, who was Ambassador to the Seigneury, and he talking purposely concerning Physitions, pleasantly said: That hee would beleue them well in their Negatiues, but not in their affirmatiues. This was a good old man, gallant and pleasantly disposed, who came from Spaine, hauing accomplished the terme of his legation with King Phillip. Hee thus interpreted Negatiues prohibited by Physitions: As not to drink Wine, nor cate fruite, nor to feede on windie meates, and such like. And their affirmatiues were, to take medicines, glisters, Inleppes, and other things by them appointed. Was not this a googly proposition, which many put in practise, to their extreame harme. For, they are willing to haue Physitions: but go looke for such as shal do as they direct them. Hardly will they keepe within the boundes of this Venetian, who (at least) would abstaine from what he was forbidden: but the most part of patients now a dayes, do quite contrary. What auaieth it to haue a Physition, if a man bee resolu'd, not to execute and accomplish his counsell, for the defence of his owne life?

Some will answer, that the presence of the Physition comforteth, delighteth, and encreaseth courage; whereby they feeble the infirmity to diminish, & their strength to augment. Another saith, I will doe something that the Physition doth aduise mee, at least of foode and gouernement; but of his Drugges I will not heare him speake.

Well may wee compare this case, vnto people besiedged in a Towne or Citie; calling some good and expert Capitaine for Commander, for their succour and defence. Hee being come to them, they will not obey him, nor accomplish any of his

Partridge, are most excellent nourishments, delicate, and dainty: but if a man take them frowningly, with an ill opinion of the Butlers bringing them, or that the Cookes dressing them is not agreeable; all will doe no good, the stomach being directly opposit vnto them. What will hee thinke then of things, which (are of themselves) very vnpleasing, and sickness abhorreth naturally, as medicines & other druggeries?

It followeth moreouer, that the patient will endure many annoyances, wherein hee shal be greatly impatient to his owne prejudice: if he haue not a good opinion of his Physition, and be confident in him. For, hee may approue him to bee such a man, as the credite of any other could neuer perswade him. Therefore, it is not in vaine, that poore sicke men should desire such as holde great reputation, and of whom (commonly) passeth good opinion; for such haue the best efficacy in their proceedings and directions. But yet they are not so much to bee affected, as no respect at all should be vsed of other: whereof choise also may be made at a second or third time of occasion, and they then must needs bee vsed, for want of the former. When any such man happens to be called: the patient must likewise repose his trust, confidence, and affection in him, without desiring any other; relying onely vpon God, who giueth vertue to remedies, at his owne good will and pleasure.

For, in marriage, Maids couet to match in great houses; but if it will not come so to passe, they must content themselves with meaner place, giuing all their loue and affection, to the husbands chosen by themselves. And God may giue them as much (or more) happinesse and contentment with their meane match, then if they had the richest husbands in the Worlde. This may redound to an honest household life, whereas the other might haue procured iust nothing like the Physition, standing out of his patients affection, being daily desirous of another.

ordinances, but say: That they are well pleased with his presence, and they are sufficiently fortified; it is enough for them, if he but take order for victuals, & be provident in policie. As for fight, mounting the Artillery, and other needfull preparations, they will not heare a word of that. Is this any thing else, but meerly to mock a brave soldier for his paines, & send him away with losse of credit?

Ecclef. 38, 4.

By tasting sickness, we know the better how precious a thing health is.

Small errors may grow or uer great to be easily appeased.

Contemners of Physicke seek for helpe thereby, when it is too late.

I durst not terme this folly, if Ecclesiasticus had not taught me, saying, Hec that is wise, will not abhorre the Physitian. Oh, but Physicke (say some) is very irksome to take. It is true, and God hath so ordained it, that it may the better fight against the euill. For, as health is pleasing and acceptable, so is it entertained with as acceptable things: and as sickness is vnpleasing, so must distastfull things helpe to conquer it. It is not wisdom, if we apply not our willes, to whatsoever the Physitian appointeth, without condemning any thing. For oftentimes, thorough defect of one obseruation, which may seeme but small: the disease impaireth, euen to death. Like as a Towne may (sometime) bee lost, by lacke of a Sentinell; or by the meanes of a little hole or passage, which appeared to be of no importance. Sometime, a sparke of fire enflames a whole heape of Straw, and thereby a house, and of one house, a whole Burrough or Towne. If a small fault grow into excess, or faileth of help in due time, no meane disorder ensueth thereon.

What then (shall become of such as despise the Physitian, when he (many times) hath worke enough to doe, to saue them, that are willing to doe whatsoever hee would haue them? Commonly, it falleth out with them who are so difficult, that (in the end) they would yeeld to all, & more, euen then when there is neither meane, nor time, and can no way bee preferred from death, as they might haue bene before, by Gods gracious assistance. Euen like to besieged people, that began but coldly in their owne defence, not employing all their means; but sparing their bedtickes, balles of Wooll, Chelits, Cuppeboards, and other moueables, for re-impairing their vittualles and money, that their Soldiers, Armes, and persons might be the better secured, and to fight valiantly. But at length, beholding themselves constrained; then they can offer bags of Gold, Plate, Jewels, yea, all to their verie bowels, onely for safety; when there is no remedy at all to sted them, but become wise too late, with the Phrygians, according to the Prouerbe. Wherefore, let euery man determine with himselfe (euen in the very beginning) to doe willingly what the Physitian shall counsell and ordaine for him, without restriction, or distinguishing Negatiues and affirmatiues, that God may the better giue him blessing, to concurre with the Physitions true endeavour.

CHAP. XVIII.

Of such as in their sickness, will admitt no medicine or remedy, but only for the present paine and anguish.

Obserued / this opinion, in a Gentleman of Viueres, affected greatly to his pleasures. He made no particulare account of infirmities, which were without greauance, thinking remedies to serue little or nothing at all for them; euen as if it were necessary, that the disease should haue his course. And whatsoever was done, the infirmity would passe his foure times, if it were recouerable: but if it were deadly, then there was no remedy that could bee proper for it, which were eronious speeches, grounded on those folies heretofore refused. In breefe, he would not allow of any Physitian, nor any medicine; but to take away instant anguishes. But, if he were false into a palsey, which is a disease without paine, I beleue he could gladly haue desired, that it might be cured by medicin, or any other helpe else whatsoever.

Now, concerning dolorous and painefull diseases, it is to bee vnderstood, that greefe there is not the principal (although of very great importance) and that the euill must and ought to be taken away, from which the anguish proceedeth, if men do deale iustly in their cures. For, if one stand trifling simply vpon the paine, & the cause is mistaken (which is the foule, root, and mother of euill:) there are then but two meanes, the one is by Anodyne medicines, which diminish the pain in some measure, and causeth the party to endure the rest more patiently.

The other is by Arcotick medicins, that is to say stupifying, making the member sleepe, in attonning the Naturall heate. Which is not to be vsed, but in extreme necessitie, and very wisely: but, as wel the one, as the other, do not let passe or lessen the greefe, but onely for a time.

Euenmore, wee should come to Cure the principall, otherwise it is still to begin againe. And if our remedies serue not to take away the euill, which is without paine, or which causeth paine: that were the greatest falsehood in the worlde, as I haue apparently proued before, where I quethrew the idle imagination, that Physitions serued to no purpose, but abused the world. If any yet shall reply vnto me, that many are well re-cured, both without Physitions and Medicines: I answer also in the same manner, that as many lose their greeuances, without Physicke, or any other applied remedies, whereby that proposition is meerly confounded of it selfe.

CHAP. XIX.

That such as are subiect to diseases, are in like manner subiect to Physicke: and others not.

A. N. Y. throw aspersions of blame and reproofe, on such as obserue some orderly rule and government, subiecting themselves to certaine remedies, to maintain their healthfull condition, and prevent some knowne euilles, whereto they are subiect. They that condemne those meanes, are (doubtles) verie healthfull, and of good Complexion: in which respect, the position is verie true, according to that which is saide in Sacred Scripture, The law was not giuen to the iust. But more exprefly, where it is saide, The whole need not the Physitian, but they that are sicke. These words likewise do confirm the contrary, to wit; That such as are sick, haue need of the Physitian; & such as are subiect to any sickness, are also subiect to some rule. Euen according as we are subiect to sin, so are we subiect to the Law.

I shall alwaies giue content with most eloquent Celsus: That the healthfull Man, while he carrieth himselfe well, and is truly himselfe: needeth not to be tyed to any Law or Government, nor to imploy the Physitian. It is very expedient, that he should haue diuers manners of life; one while in the field, then againe in the City, but more often in the field: To Navigate, hunt, to be at rest and ease sometimes, but yet to exercise himselfe more oft. For, sloath and idleness, maketh the body drowsie and dull; but trauell confirmeth it: The one is the hastner of Age, the other is the continuer of iolly youth.

It is good also sometimes to bath, and sometimes to vs cold waters; one while to anoint, then againe to forbear. Feare no kind of meats; that are vsed among ciuill people; to be sometimes present at Feasts, another while to reframe them. One while feede some what immeasurably, and afterward sobriety. Make two meales a day more often then one, and alwayes eat well, so long as it may haue digestion, &c. As concerning carnall Copulation, it may not bee desired too much, nor too much feared neither: That which is rare and seldome, excitieth the body; but more frequent dissolueth it, &c.

These rules are to be obserued by such, that haue their health firme, and can keep themselves; that remedies ordainned for euill carriage be not employed & consumed in vaine. In this manner are men of sound health indifferent to all, and subiect to nothing, while they beare themselves well, and are so firmly in health, as Celsus hath limited. It were very great shame for a man, to make himselfe delicate, soft, and tender, souping and encreasing his good and strong Complexion; which would extend it selfe a great deale more, by bolde, valiant, and manly exercises. But for valedudinarie personnes, vnhealthfull, subiect vnto manie Diseases, as Epilepsies (commonly called, Mal de St. Jean) Megrimmes, Rheumes, Catarhs, shortnesse of breath, Ache in the bones, Oppilations in the Liuer or Spleene, the Winde Collicke, or Stone, Gows, and the like infirmities (whereof the most part are Hereditarie, yea, and the Leaprofite too); who makes any doubt or question, but that such men ought to liue within rule, if their owne ease they be not enuious of, and desire to see manie dayes?

Such also as additt themselves to studie, or vnto publike charges in the Common-wealth, because they are subiect to many necessities, ought to be gouerned; otherwise, they often fall into diuers infirmities. For they tie & constraîne themselves to store of things, which are verie hurtful for them. And Celsus in the words before alledged, presupposeth, that the healthfull man, must also be wholly himselfe in all respects.

How we are to understand our being sub-
iect to sickness

Now, in the position formerly alledged, saying, Subiect to diseases; we vnderstand a particular subiection & aptitude. For all men in the world are subiect to all kinds of sicknesses, euen as we are all subiect to death. But we say, some are subiect thereto particularly, that haue an inclination and disposition to some euil, the rudiment wherof is in them: not that they are already sicke, but because a small matter will throw them into sickness; and therefore, they ought the more respectfully, to carry themselves. By example of him formerly spoken of, who being the only sick man in his time: made shift yet to liue an hundred yeares, by great cunning, and exquisite manner of life.

CHAP. XX.

That such as know some little matter in Physicke, are more dangerous to be neere sicke persons, then they that know nothing at all.

Must confesse, that this error ought to haue followed a former Chapter, where we declared, that there were more Physicians, then of anie other profession. But fearing to offend any suecorable people, I had a long conflict with mine owne cogitations, whether I should taxe and reprocue them in such publike manner. At length, I concluded to holde on my courtesy, knowing, that there is more danger (then we wold easily think) in such as know something, and imagine to know all things. For out of this ouer-weening, either they presume, and vndertake the very greatest cures; or withstand and hinder Physicians, from beeing employed in principall remedies, necessarily requiring quick and sure healing. But these insolent controllers, keep them so engaged to fear; that they neither dare, nor vwill adventure.

There are some persons, who know not any thing in Physick, in regard of discourse and reason; as ignorant women, who can neither write nor reade; but onelic haue certaine obseruations and rules, knowing how to make a good Broth, a Cullisse, a Restorative, to make a bed well, and knit a kerchiefe about the sick mans head. Beside, they know some infant remedies, against itch, scabs, burnings, falling of the Paula, wormes, the Mother, &c. Hereupon, they imagine themselves compleat in knowledge, and make many things out of their owne braine and fantasies; and if their experiment succcede ill, they spare not to yaunt, that the Physicians great Gowne shall couer all this.

It were very good and expedient, that assistants about sicke patients, did know nothing else, but to obey the Physicians directions. It were a knowledge very beneficiall to the patient; for, such as do not presume of themselves, will neuer attempt to execute any thing, but what is prescribed, ordained, and commanded. Others, that dreame they haue knowledge; they will adde, diminish, alter, or else do iust nothing at all. Like to lewd Apothecaries, who execute the Physicians directions at their owne pleasure, as presuming to know the curing of the disease, and the nature better in course, then he doth; being drunke with some opinion concerning the like; as hauing obserued diuers the like sicknesses, attended many Physicians, and seene the successe of the like receipts.

O dangerous ouer-weening! see here the verie ruine of most sicke persones. It were much better (before God I speak it) not to know any thing, then to know thus in this Empericke manner. What more vnhappy is for the patients life, and honour to the Physician, then to haue an Apothecarie so ouerweeing, temerarious, and presumptuous? In Italy, and in Spain, the the sicke are in much better manner serued. For, the Apothecary goeth not to see the sicke man, except it be in courtesie and friendship; and yet not as an Apothecary neither: nor do the Physicians vnder write their bills of receipts, by or for who the remedies were compounded. Whereby, the Apothecarie knows as little of the Physicians intent, euen as if hee were acquainted with nothing. By this meanes, hee cannot abuse the Physicians directions; or, much lesse then our Apothecaries, to whom all is imparted ouer familiarly.

Next to Apothecaries, I speake of those vile and bad (not good, proud, modest, and honest people, that meddle not, but what they haue to doe withall) yea, most dangerous keepers or seruants, attending about poore weak patients, who thinke they haue more knowledge then the Physician (especially, if they be anciently traded in the businesse) touching nourishing principally; because it ought to be of inestimable importance, quality, fit hours, and measure. True it is, of the quality they credite enough by the Physicians order; but for the houre and measure, they do all at their owne liking. I spare the drugeries they covertly vie, and the omissions of Ordinances appointed to them, when they meete with patients fitte for their purpose. Such people are most dangerous, and much better to haue them that know no such cunning, neither haue learned any other lesson; but to doe what they are appointed, which is the main article of their duty.

CHAP. XXI.

The manner of knowing Opportunity truly, for vnderstanding or performing such actions, as we would haue to be well done: And how our graue Elders vsed to depict or figure Occasion.

Opportunity is the greatest matter, belonging to the life of man.

Here consisteth no meane wit and iudgement, in knowing how to make vse of Opportunity; & to perform our actions in due time: because great care is to be had, either for doing, or not doing a thing at a time; in regard there is no alteration or returning backe, when defect falleth vpon the adventure. Heereupon, the Grecian Philosophers leste vs many notable sentences in writing, making to that purpose: in regard that they truly vnderstoode, what wisdom depended vpon knowledge, for doing a businesse in apt opportunitie, and taking occasion when it is fairly offered.

Salomon faith in his Ecclesiastes: To all things there is an appointed time. There is a time to be borne, and a time to dye: A time to plant, and a time to plucke up that which is planted: A time to kill, and a time to heale: A time to build, and a time to ruinate: A time for warre, and a time for peace. In breefe, many examples might bee alledged, whereby to demonstrate, what losse relyeth on dooing any thing out of due time; and what benefite redoundeth vnto men, when things are accomplished aptly to time and place.

Menander, a Greeke Poet said; That all things done to purpose, & in time haue great grace, for Opportunity hath more power then Law. So that a little attendance giuen on time, is esteemed highly worth. Hesiodus, a Greeke Authour also, appointed vs to keepe meanes and obseruation of times: For, the importance of all affaires (saith he) consisteth in attending on time and opportunity. Pindarus said; Time hath great power in all things. Also (according to Horace.) A man should alwaies set forward his affairs, when he seeth due time. Socrates, writing to Democritus, said; All things are naught, being done out of due season. In breefe, there is no man of iudgement or experience, but will pursue his busines in fittest times.

All which notwithstanding, it is to be noted, that as it is good to waite on Opportunity, and aptest times to performe any thing: so likewise, the point or instant is not to bee slip, for exact executing any matter when it cometh. This is that which hath commonly bene sayde, Occasion is neuer to be misprized. For, all things y^e are done out of their constellation, & content of the stars (although occasion cometh otherwise) can neuer grow to good perfection.

And to speake seriously, occasion and opportunity for our actions, was in such high esteeme with our Ancients, as well Greeks as Latines; that they had alwaies her portraiture, like as a Mirrour before their eyes. The Latines figured Occasion in the form of a woman; but the Grecians figured her in the shape of an infant, holding one foot vpon a turning wheele, and all before the face couered with Hayre, & dangling downe in long tresses; but at the head behind was bald and shauen. This shape was giuen to occasion or Opportunity, by Pofidius, or Pofidippus as some called him, a Greek Poet, translated into Latine by the learned Erasmus, and Anthonius the Lombards Poet. Whom Sir Tho. More of England, a man much renowned for wisdom and learning, translated into the Castilian tongue, in forme of a dialogue. For More said, that Occasion, standing fo vpon a wheele, declared thereby her instabilitie, and hauing wings both at her handes and feet, shewed, how lightly shee past away, without tarrying. Moreouer, said he, her forehead and face being couered with hairy long locks, expressed, that she might easily be held, by such to whom she presented her selfe; but being vnwilling to be known to others, shee kept her face fo couered, because she would escape away vnknewen: being also bald and shauen behinde, for feare she should be stayed, after shee was once past. Whereby may be comprehended, that Opportunity once lost, is not to bee recovered, by all our paines applied afterward.

Anthonius making a further addition to this picture, placed the figure of Repentance, sitting vpon the shoulders of Occasion: declaring thereby, that whatsoever happeneth by the losse of Occasion, may well be repented. And truly there are two kinds of people, who might make good vse of this example. For, some are so foudaine in their affaires, that they can neuer bring them about, by not tarrying for opportune time. And others (on the contrary) are so long and tedious in concluding their businesse, being troubled with so many inconueniences, which may happen; that in the time of this lingering negotiating, Occasion hath past by the. Both which extremities are to bee auoyded by men of good iudgement, who, in waiting the time for best performing their businesse suffer no occasions (in the meane while) offaire offer, to ouer-slip them. For other wife, they may fall into a tardy repentance, which will be little to their credite and benefite.

CHAP. XXII.

Of Favour, Grace, or Good opinion: How it hath bene described by picture, and also concerning the Morall signification.

The precedent discourse, concerning the portraiture of Opportunity, or Occasion, hath brought that to my remembrance, which the ancient Romans gaue and granted to Favour, Grace, or good Opinion: as well for the great conueniency which these two things hold together, as also because the true time and very occasion of well-doing any thing is, when Favour standeth fairest for him; as much to say, as when the Prince lendeth an attentive eare, and vouchsafeth (withall) a gracious countenance: For, a man that is in credite with a Prince, is very much made of by all men, euery one thinks well of what he doth, or saith; because all things succede to his good and honor: for all are full of fauour towards him, either with an honest heart, or else in outward ceremony.

Little need is there to produce Histories or examples to this effect, considering that (at all times) it hath bin in practise, & euery yeare is a breuiate thereof; wherefore it shall suffice me only to represent the true figure of Favour, according to the draught of our graue Elders, which may som way conforme it selfe with that of Occasion. For, in their truest picturing Favour, they figured a yong infant blind, being alone, & without any company. Bartholomew Dardanus, moralizing vpon this picture (introducing himselfe) speaking to the Painter Apelles, by way of dialogue, in this manner.

O Apelles! Perceyuing the great paines that thou hast taken, to portraiture truly the Image of Favour: I pray thee tell me, of what race shee is descended? Whereunto Apelles (sodainly replying, sayde; Her Race is knowne, but to vertie few people. And indeede, the Originall of Favour is hardly to be found. For some say, that fauour cometh by corporall beauty: Others hold, that she cometh by adventure, or good hap. Yet some will haue her to be the daughter of Fortune, or of accident. And yet neuertheless, many are of the minde; that shee issueth from true Noblesse of the minde. As is easily discerned, by this short Dialogue following, where a Poet, speaking to Apelles, beginneth thus.

A discorsiuue Dialogue (according to Morall sense) betwene a Poet and Apelles, concerning the true Image of Favour.

Poet. What is that Woman, standing on yonder side, who is neuer forsaken, but still hath store of company?

Apelles. Her name is Flattery.

Poet. And what is shee that attendeth, or followeth after her?

Apelles. Her Name is commonly called Enuie.

Poet. What people are they that so round engirt her?

Apelles. They are such as continually keep company with Favour, and are especially obedient to her: As namely, Riches and Pleasures, the source and originall of all vices.

Poet. Why hast thou (in figure) giuen wings to Favour?

Apelles. Because she cannot step a foote abroad, but she mounts aloft, when the wind of good Fortune raiseth her.

Poet. And wherefore hast thou painted her blinde?

Apelles. Because such as are in credite, will no more take knowledge of their ancient Friends.

Poet. And why hast thou placed hir feet vpon a wheele?

Apelles. Because she followeth the steps of Fortune, being euermore as inconstant as shee.

Poet. But why dost thou make her puffed and swell so proudly?

Apelles. Because prosperity blindeth the understanding of all men.

This Dialogue, reported in the Language belonging to it, would haue much more grace, then any tongue else can be-flow vpon it. Neuertheless, the most gracious Favourites may hereby take aduice, to know, what companions attend vpon Favour, and the instabilitie both of them and her. To the end, they may the better gouerne themselves with modestie in their credit, without puffing or swelling vp into pride. For, ouer and beside, that God is greatly there-with offended, there are many other dangers else, by the obseruation of passed times: as true testimonie hath bene made, by the vniuersity and lamentable end of many Princes Favourites, that knew not howe to vse their credit so wisely, as they should haue done.

The greatest Favourites of Princes, haue bene subiect to many misfortunes.

CHAP. XXIII.

Of those fauourable men of Greece commonly called the seven Sages: With many notable Sentences which they left behinde them in writing.

Among the ancient Grecians, such were called Sages, or Wise men, as now we vse to terme Philosophers. But Socrates, accounting the title of Sage or wife to be ouer-arrogant (because it was onely proper and peculiar to God, to bee absolutely called Sage or Wife) invented the name of Philosopher, as much to say, as a louer of wisdom; and being somewhat better qualified, and more moderate then the name of Sage or Wife; so that all wise men, which were since the time of Socrates, were well contented with the Title of Philosophers. Notwithstanding, there were seuen seuerall men, vnto whom the name of Sages or Wise-men, were attributed, by common consent of all Greece, in regard of their Knowledge and Vertue.

And indeede, many Authors (as well Ancient as Moderne) do make mention of them, and of notable Sentences left by them for memory: whereof (I purpose) to set downe heere a breefe summarie, that vnderstanding Readers (yet ignorant in the originall Language) may the better be acquainted with their wittie sayings.

Setting aside then that vaine and foolish Booke of the Seauen Sages, which hath runne thorow too many Countreys, with many opinions divulged, concerning their liues (which yet were discredited, and rent in peeces by Diogenes Laertius) I will shap my courte, according vnto that which hath bene auouched by Saint Augustine, Erasmus, Phillip Melancthon, Beroaldus, Raphael Volateranus, and many other Authors of great fame. The names of those seauen men, were Solon, Chilo, Cleobulus, Thales, Bias, Pittacus, and Periander, and they are all liuing together at one time: although some of them were more aged then the other, and (happily) liued longer then the rest did. For, all of them were in perfect beeing, during the reigne of Cyrus King of Persia, at such time as the Iewes remayned captiues in Babylon: which was about the space of fife hundred and fiftie yeares, before the coming of our Lord and Sauour Iesus Christ, as Ensebius saith.

We purpose to speake of them particularly, and likewise of some of their principall Sentences, which they left respectiuelly for vs: albeit memory hath embred infinite common sayings of theirs, as ordinarily all Authors haue concluded in their writings. Aufonius, a famous Poet of Lombardie, verie elegantly reduced into verse, many notable Sentences of those Sages, whereof he maketh very ample relation, in three seuerall Bookes published by him.

If it then, we will begin with wise Bias, who was borne in Priene, a Sea-coast towne of Ionia, a Region in Greece, hauing a very poore man to his father, named Tolamius. This Bias was a great Oratour, a good Aduocate, and well seene in all the Sciences; beeing otherwise endued with many vertues. Among which, he held in highest estimation, to contemn the riches and honors of the world. Cicero, speaking of him, saith, that when the enimy destroyed the towne where he dwelt, and euery man labored to faine and carry away the best of his goods: Bias would not take any thing belonging to him. And being demanded, why he was so respectlesse of his goods: he answered, All my goods I carry with mee: meaning his wisdom, which (indeed) is the greatest wealth of all.

About all things, this man fought still to maintaine loue and amity, & therefore he was held the chiefeft in the Common-wealth: he would say, he had much rather be a iudge between two of his friends, then between two of his enemies: for in condemning a friend, he should loose his friendship; but in iudging betwixt two enemies, hee for whome the sentence was giuen, would become a friend.

A lewd man once demanded of him, what was to be pittied in religion? wherto Bias answered, not a word: the man growing angry, moued the same question againe; and Bias replied, Why dost thou aske such a case of me, as concerns not thee at all?

He veld oft-times to say, that the greater part of men, were the worst men; and Aufonius took great paines in confirming this saying. But it is so manifest and true, that it needs no other confirmation, then what is auouched in the Gospell, where it is said: Many are called, but few are chosen. Cicero also maintaines it to be true, affirming the race of the wicked to be great. Plato also saide to the same purpose, That good men were gone, and growne to nothing: but contrariwise, the vices of the wicked encreased daily, euen as if they were watered hearbs.

There are some Authors, who alledge many other sentences of Bias, very singular, and necessary; as, Attribute to God all the good thou doest: Neuer be enuious at the rich. Hee may well be called a good man, that hath no remorse of conscience. The greatest danger that happens to a man, cometh from man: The very richest gift in a woman, is to be vertuous and honest.

Aristotle attributeth this to Bias. Degrees of honor and offices, do most manifest what a man is for; many appeare to be honest men (as indeede their actions shew no lesse) beeing priuate persons: but hauing power to command, doe manifestly declare the malignitie of their hearts: He addeth also. That a man should fo carry himselfe to his friend, as if (another day) he should become his enemy: and fo to deale with an enemy, as hoping (one day) he may be his friend. Yet Aristotle himselfe reproued this saying, in his Rhetorike. Notwithstanding, in due consideration of managing friendship in these dayes, wee shall finde this Sentence to be most true.

There are many other sayings, well deservin memorie, which are attributed to this Philosopher, & would aske too much time heere to insert: and therefore I will leaue them, hauing first informed the Reader, that after the death of Bias, his funeral was solemnely performed, at the cost and charge of the Common-wealth, in signe of his perpetuall honour.

The second Sage or wiseman of Greece was Solon, although some ranke him in the prime place. Plutarch, and many other haue written at large of his life, saying: That hee was borne in Salamina, an Island in subiection to the Athenians, issued of an auncient and most Noble house; his fathers name being called Acroetides. The Athenians made such pretious esteem of Solon, atwell in regarde of his wisdom, and the victories which he had obtayned against them of Mytilene, with sundry other enterprises, which hee had finished very dexteriously; that they limited themselves to his ordinances, which were great (as Plutarch affirmeth) recording many of them by particular mention.

Especially he moderated the Lawes of Draco, which were very rigorous, so that for the very least fault committed in Athens, life depended thereupon. For, Demetrius the Oratour sayd, That the Lawes appointed by Draco, were written downe with the blood of men. Solon therefore corrected them, and confirmed in Athens, the Councell of the Areopagites, according as Aristotle and Plutarch do plainly maintayne.

Hee had a concurrent or corruial in Athens, a kinsman of his owne, named Pisistratus; so that, the more Solon labored the libertie of his Countrey, so much the more did hee slyde and endeavour to oppresse it. Neuerthelesse, in conclusion, the cloquence of Pisistratus had more power, then all the approued goodnesse in Solon, whereby hee possessed himselfe of the Seignoury and Rule of Athens; which Solon might haue done (much more easily then hee) if he would haue vied burth his owne meanes. For, when the men of Athens offered him the soueraigntie of their City, hee made them answer thus: The house of tyrantie is very pleasing, but it must haue a winding steyres to mount it: And therefore, I will neither be a tyrant, nor subject to a tyrant.

Heereupon, after that Pisistratus had gotten full possession of Athens, Solon departed thence, and trauelled Countreys for the space of tenne yeares, as well in Egypt as in other places. Till at the length, he came to the Court of Croesus, the rich and powerfull King of Lydia, who hauing shewed him his abundant treasures, demanded of him, if euer hee had seene more Royall possessions? Whereto Solon (like a Philosopher and Free-man) replied: That he had seene the possessions of diuers Fowles, Cockes, Capons, and such like, which seemed goodlier to him, because they were naturall to them. Againe hee demanded of him, If euer hee had seene any man more rich, or so happy as hee was? Solon answered him (without flattery) that hee had seene a man in his owne Countrey, named Tellus, who (in his opinion) was more happie then Croesus; for hee was an honest and vertuous man, and had seene his children, and the children of his children fo well aduanced, that hee receyued seruice from them in his age. Nay more, being growne into the extremitie of yeares; he dyed in the defence of his Countrey, and repelling the enemy.

The King being much displeased at the answer of Solon, layd vnto him: Why dost not thou attribute to me some degree of happinesse? Wherunto Solon replying, shewed him the great traueses and mutations; which may ensue vnto such as are constituted in great Estates: and they being subiect to such alterations, he could not rearme them truly happie, alledging a common Proverbe, vied among the Athenians: That the end of life must first be seene, before any iudgements of happinesse passe thereon.

O most notable saying, though to Aristotle, it seemed not receivable: for, while a man continueth in life, hee is alwayes vncertaine of his estate and condition, as also of his fame and reputation: as it was well approued by the Wife man, who said, Command no man before his death, And our blessed Lord also, would haue his Apostles and Disciples to make stay in no place, or to salute any bodie by the way: which some expounded according to the saying of Solon, who affirmed, that man (in his life time) could not assure him selfe

Eccl. 12. 1. 4
Matth. 5. 19.

The sayings of Solon approved by many good authors. Plin in lib. 14. cap. 10. Ouid in Metamorph. lib. 3.

Solon departed from King Cresus, as a man vndergrated.

Cresus found Solon's words true, so the no mean hazard of his life.

selfe from falling into many inevitable inconueniences. Pliny also conforming him selfe to Solon, sayd; One day indgeth another, and the last day indgeth all. Ouid maketh the like affirmation, saying; Whosoeuer considereth the last day of man, which is uncertaine; it is not possible for him to say, that he can be any way truly happy.

But returne we againe to King Cresus, who, notwithstanding the wife answer Solon had made him, he regarded him not, neither what great benefit might after befall him, by enioying the companie of a man so worthy, as neuer respecting future occasions to follow. Whereupon Solon departed from his Court, with very vniuerse entertainment: but afterward, such an adventure hapned, as made him dearely acknowledge his error, and well to remember the words of Solon. For, Great King Cyrus waging new warre against him; and hauing vanquished and taken him prisoner, gaue Sentence, that hee should be burned aliue. Hee being vpon the pile of wood, and fire making readie to consume him: cryed soudainely out aloud, O Solon, Solon, Solon, remembering now in this extremitie, that his saying was true, and that no man could be happy while he liued! Cresus commanding the Officers to stay, and to keepe the fire from the pile: would needes vnderstand of him, wherefore he vied that inuocation vpon Solon, or expected thereby for deliuerance from death? Cresus reported the whole History to him, what Solon had sayd, concerning his imaginarie happiness; the truth whereof he had now too apparently proued. Cyrus being much amazed thereat, and entering into mature consideration, of the strange and vniuersall mutabilities of Fortune; deliuered King Cresus from death & captiuitie, doing him so great honor, that he made him his associate in his kingdoms. Wherby we may perceiue, that this wise and worthy saying of Solon, was the meanes of freeing one mighty King from death, and made an other also much wiser then hee was before.

Solon, hauing attained vnto the age of foure score years, dyed at Rhodes, ordaining by his testament (as Aristotle sayth) that his body should be burned, and his ashes scattered in the Ile of Salamina: because they should not be caried to Athens, for constraing them (by that meanes) to keepe his ordinances. Because, before he departed from Athens, he made the Athenians to take an oathe, that they should keepe his Lawes inuolubly, vntill he was returned from his voyage. And indeede, according vnto Aristotle, the Commonwealth of the Athenians maintained them selues very prosperously, so long as they kept the Lawes of Solon.

Now, as concerning the sentences and sayings of Solon, for the most part, they were conformable to Christian Religion, and all Ciuillitie. As, *Honour God: Be helpful to thy neighbour: Maintain the vertue of thy friend: Obey the Lawes: Bridle thine anger: Honor thy father and mother: Swear not: Keepe thy selfe from Enuy: Be not too light in confirming a friend, but learne to keep him when thou hast him. Marrye with thine equall: Reproue thy friend in secret, but publicly thou mayest commend him: Shunne the company of wicked people: Praise and follow vertue. Hee sayd moreover, That Lawes were like to Spiders webs, wherein poore little Flies were soone entangled, but such as were great and strong, could easily breake thorow. Such, and the like notable Sentences, are found among his Lawes and Ordinances: And so much for Solon.*

Chilo, son of Amaratus, was also numbered amongst the seauen Sages of Greece. He was of Lacedemon, a city highly renowned in Greece, where he was elected in the Councell of the Ephori, in regard of his great wisdom & knowledge: this was an Estate among the Lacedemonians, as the Conservatours and Tribunes were among the Romains. Chilo was very summary and succinct in his Discourse, as (ordinarily) all the Lacedemonians were: and hee was likewise called Aristagoras, in regard of that qualitie. When any one compiled an Oration, in few and witty words, they vied to say; That he had written a Chilonical Oration. He liued so long (as Pliny and some others say) euentill nature sayled in him. Neurtherlesse, he dyed with a conceit of glory, seeing one of his sonnes, to winne the prizes of Honour in the Olympian games, and after his death; the Lacedemonians performed his funeral with great solemnitie.

The singular wisdom of this man, appeared sufficiently, by the notable sentences tences which he had written; but especially in this, that he exhorted euery man to know himselfe. Which being heedfully obserued, men would not bee so vaine, nor so proude and inordinate, as usually they are: because all vices and disorders do proceed from selfe-conceite, and no man truly knowing himselfe. Hereupon the Christian Church tooke an order, that euery yeare (in the beginning of Lent) all men should bee admonished to remember, that from dust they came, and to dust they should returne againe.

Plato recordeth, that his saying of Chilo, Know thy selfe, was written in letters of golde, vpon the portall of Apollos Temple. Iuuenall faith, That this saying came frō Heauen. Macrobius, in his Tract of Scipios Dreame, faith; That the Oracle of Coultis being demanded the meanes, what course should be taken, for attaining to felicity, answered: Only teach a man to know himselfe. Demonicus, being asked, at what time he began to be a Philosopher, answered; When I began to know my selfe. O most necessary rule; for if a man would consider himselfe well, and study but to vnderstand his condition, estate and vacations, and frame his life accordingly thereto: hee could neuer bee so changed, to attempt such things, as he neyther shold or ought to do, neyther would there bee so much disorder in the world, as now there is.

Chilo also had an accustomed kinde of Prouerbiall speeches, to wit: Remember thou must dye, and therefore prouide for thine owne saluation. Honour olde men. Be no murmurer. Speake no euill of an offendor. Chuse rather losse, then dishonest gain. In violence and constraint bee milde and humble. Labour rather to be loued, then feared. Try Gold by the touch; for a golden-songed man, who speaketh all that comes into his mouth, men may often heare from him, such things as they would not.

Chilo being asked by one, named Æsop, what God had done, answered; Hee exalted humble men, and suppressed proud ignorant Fooles. Being demanded also, what was the hardest thing in the world to bee done, replied: To use and employ a mans time well, and to pardon iniuries and outrages received. In briefe, he would vially say, that he would so dispose the course of his life: That the greatest persons should not despise, nor the meanest feare him. Finally,

Chilo both wrote and spake many notable things in his time, which would require ouermuch leysure to report: And therefore, we will take our leaue of him, making way to entertaine our 4. man of Greece.

Cleobulus, who was also one of the seauen Sages, was borne in Lindus, a City in the Ile of Rhodes; or as some others say, in Caria, a Towne of Anconia, a Region in Greece; and his Fathers name was Eunagoras. This Cleobulus, beside his being a very singular wife man, was also of very goodly bodily feature, and wonderfully aduise of his person: so that eyther, or both these happy blessings together, made him admired, and esteemed generally. The loue of learning preuailed in such sort with him, that he forsooke his Country, Parents and Friends; trauiailing into Egipt, where (in those times) were many goodly and famous Vniuersities.

He had a Daughter named Cleobolina, that could inuent and write in profe, beyond ordinary compasse of men or women, and very skilfull there was beside, in propounding questions of difficult resolution; as this one for an example: A Father had twelue children, and each childe had thirty sonnes, all white by nature, and thirty daughters, all of them naturally blacke: all which were immortal, and yet (notwithstanding) were discerned to dye daily. By which Enigma, hee vnderstood the yeare, that hath twelue Moneths, and euery Moneth thirty dayes and thirty nights.

But come we againe to Cleobulus, who after his returne out of Egipt, deferred so highly by his learning and iudgement, as to be ranked among the seauen Sages of Greece: And many of his learned sayings and sentences, were held as rules and directions for mens liues. Among other, he vied most of all to say; That Mediocrity was without compare. And assuredly, these words greatly confirmed the saying of Chilo, who would haue euery man to know himselfe: For if we knew our selues well, and as we ought to do, a meane then in all things would easily gouerne vs. By this sentence then of Cleobulus, making such precious account of Mediocrity, we may well conclude, that all extremities are vicious. As much to say, when there is too much, or too little: whereupon our ancient Philosophers vied to say; Beware of

Aristle attributeth this sentence to wife Bias, and some other to Solon, but be it howeouer: Vertue alwayes consisteth in mediocrity: According to the saying of Aristotle Verumtamen est in se by too much or too little: For vertue is nothing else but a mean or mediocrity, consisting between two extremities. Horace appointed in his Discourses, that a meane should be obserued in all things. For (saith
he) all that goeth before it, or contendeth
to come after it, keeping neither meane nor measure, can neuer be said to be well accomplished.

An infinite number of examples may be alleaged to this purpose, especially concerning the four principall vertues, which are commonly called Cardinall.
For, Fortitude is lodged betwixt Feare & Boldnes, & Liberality keeps the mid-way betwixt Couetousnes and Prodigality; as the like may be sayd of other vertues, and humane operations, which ought to gouerne themselves by time and necessity:
yet with this charge neuertheless, to beware of over-much in any. This is a doctrine conformable to the saying of Hesi-
odus, oftentimes alleged by reuerend Era-
asmus, commanding all men to obserue a measure in their actions. As much maintaineth Plato, Terence, Plautus, and many other Authors both ancient and moderne, euery one of them auouching commonly, That happy men alwayes follow a meane
in their trauels.

And (in this case) the reason is peremp-tory, for all things are euen as nothing,
they haue their beginning and their end,
and so they passe away: Reason then fits them with an apte conclusion, that their perfection consists in the midst of the five Zones or Plages, which girdle round the whole wide Vniuers: the two extremest are held to be inhabitable: and yet contrarywise, those in the middelt are allowed to be most perfect. The Sunne which is held to be Prince of the Planets, is in the midst of the errant or wandering Stars. Among men, the place of honour is in the midst, & (indeed) it is hard to make any agreement, except there be a third, to serue as the means. To conclude, the meane is much commended to vs in all things, con-cernes chiefly Christ, that hee would be called the Mediator betwixt God & man.

He vied diuers other notable sentences beside, as, Beware of giving thy friend occa- sion to reprove thee: Shunne the ambushes of thy enemy: Before thou goest out of thy house, remember what thou hast to do: and upon returning home, consider what thou hast done:
match not in marriage, but with thine equall, for if thou takest a wife of a better house than thine owne, thou makest thy selfe a slave to her and her kindred: Pardon the errors of other men, and neuer be sparing of thine owne: The more liberty thou hast, so much the lesse use make of it: Be not prouide in prosperity, nor faint-hearted in aduersity. Inure thy selfe to bear the trauerses of fortune patiently. Many other singular Sentences are attributed to Cleobulus, which Ausonius and Diogenes Laertius haue recorded in their works, affirming withall, that he dyed at the age of seventy yeares.

NOW it remaineth to speake of Pittacus, of Mitylene, the capitall City in the Isle of Lesbos, and at this day called Mity- lene, his fathers name being called Hyra- dene. He was of such learning, wisdom and ingenuitie of spirit, that the Græcians placed him in ranke among the seven Sages. The loue hee bare to his Countrey, moued him to make warre against the tyrrant Melæger (who vsurped thereon) so that he enforced him to flight. In the war betwixt the Athenians and them of Mity- lene, about a field then in controuersie, hee was Generall for the Mitylenians, and became Conquerour, and slew Erinnes Generall for the Athenians in the open field.
Whereupon, the Athenians quitted vnto Pittacus, the contentious field which they quarrelled for, in regarde of the victorie which hee obtained against them: and gaue him the government of their Common-wealth, which he ruled worthily the space of ten yeares, ordaining many good Lawes and Constitutions for the benefit thereof. Which hauing done, he willingly gaue ouer his gouernement, as it was freely put vpon him: and liued vntill hee was seventy yeares olde, beloued and honoured generally.

His sayings and Sentences are no lesse considerable, then those of the other Sages, neyther the manner of his life. For, first of all, he made fo small account of the dignity, gold and riches of Cresus, King of Lydia, that hee would not receive any of him:

dand, that hee was sorry for his Brothers succell, which happened to him, because he affected his Brothers better then his owne welfare. His often saide, things things to come, were very difficult to vnderstand: and that there was nothing in the world more certain then the earth, and contrariwise, that there was no certain certainity in the sea. (as is to be seen in the life of a man, (quoth he) ought to forese

Thales, the first of the Sages of Greece, was a Native of Miletum, a City much renowned in Greece, and for the many vertues abiding in him, deferred well,
that the cheefe place among the Sages, should be assigned to him. For, in the first place, he was Soueraigne in Geometry, and the first man that discovered the principall secrets of Astrology: as the course of the Sun, the reason of his Eclipses, and likewise of the Moone, and the Equinocttials. In briebe, he brought to light the course of the Planets, and many other secrets of naturall Philosophy. Moreover, he was the cause, that the proud Title of Sages, remained to the seven learned men of Greece, by this accident.

Vpon a day, sundry young men, and friendly companions of Miletum, had bought a draught of certaine Fishermen, hauing cast forth their Net into the sea,
and these young men were to haue the benefit, of al to be drawne vp at that time. A most admirable case suddenly happened;
for when the Net was drawne vp, they found therein a Table of Golde, beautifull and enriched in most costly and sumptuous manner. They which bought the draught, pretended, that the table of gold belonged to them, by their bargain. The Fishermen (on the contrary) auouched it to be no fish, & that they bought nothing of them, but onely all the fish which should be taken, and therefore (in that respect) they had no right at all to the Table. A long and great contention grew between them, which should be the fower ended by full consent on cyther sides, they sent to the Oracle of Apollon, for a small resolution: where he, on the dullest speaking by him, made this answer, That the Table

must be given to the only wife of Greece.
Which hearing thus understood, the Soldian Table was sent to Thales, as being the only marrie Græcians. Thus he was so modest that he sent it to another of the Sages before named, for they were all living at that time, and he sent it to another, so that the Table of gold passed from hand to hand, vntill at last it came to Solon, who likewise would not enioy it, but sent it to the Temple of Apollon at Delphos.
As Ausonius, Callimachus, and many other writers, that shew the courtesie vied in the Sages one towards another, the Table returned againe to the hand of Thales, to whom at first it was presented, and that he sent it to the Delphian Oracle. But how-soever those Authors write diuersly, concerning this History, yet all doe agree together in this, that Thales was the first man, to whom the golden Table was sent.
And Aristotle making mention of Thales, testifieth many conceited sayings proce-ding from him, especially in his Bookes of Pollicies, and namely one, which he vied ordinarily, That when he pleased, he could be rich. Whereof he made good and sufficient proofe; for foreseeing by Astrology, that there would be a good season for Oli-ues, and Oyle of Oliues, (soone after) was likely to be deare; he laid out his money to buy Oliue Oyle, while the season serued, which afterwards hee sold at what rate he pleased. Not because thereby he would enrich himselfe; but to make a manifestation, that when hee listed he could be rich, considering what knowledge he had, both for times of abundance, & likewise of dearth, when they would happen.
On a time it came to passe, that as he was gazing vpon the stars, he fell into a ditch;
which an old woman seeing, & comming (vpon his outcry) to help him, in mocking manner said to him, Tell me Thales, how darest

sayings often

les.

See what was under thine owne feet upon the ground. And yet notwithstanding, he was knowne to be an admirable wife man. He was wont to say; That over-great assurance and confidence, is as evermore accompanied with repentance. For many times, such as trust too much to others faithfull promises, are faine to pay the debts, from which no other caution could prevaile with them. He sayd moreover; That the true meanes of living overbusily, is, by not doing such things, as we condemne in other men.

Being demanded, what was the easiest thing in the world to doe; he answered, To know other mens faults, and none of our owne. He sayd also; That few Tyrants liued to be old. Diogenes following the opinion of Hermippus, sayd; that Thales vied to thanke God for three things (though this Sentence is fathered on Socrates): First, that he had made him a man, and not a beast. Secondly, that hee had made him a man, and not a woman. Thirdly, that hee was borne in Greeke, and not a Barbarian.

Periander the last of the seuen Sages of Greece.

Now we come to speake of Periander, the last of the Græcian Sages, of whom I have no great matters to relate; because (according to diuers authors) he was not in the rancke of the seauen Sages; and yet a man of singular wit and vnderstanding. Periander was King of Corinth, and the son of King Cypselus; the manner of his life being rather tyrannicall, as liuing like a Sol-dior or Capitaine; rather then a Philosopher. And hence it ensued, that Heraclides, and many more beside, esteemed this Periander to be none of the seauen Sages of Greece; but another Periander, who was (indeed) a great Philosopher; and a man highly renowned for vertue. Neuerthelesse, the most voices gaue the title of Sage to Periander; for although hee reigned by power at Corinth; yet notwithstanding, he was so discrete, valiant and of so absolute vnderstanding, that thereby he won the name of Sage among the Greeks.

It was demanded of him, why he did not depart from his tyranny & kingdom; because (quoth he) I may fall into as great danger, by willingly leaving my kingdome, which none other can dispossesse me of by force. He vied continually many notable Sentences, and had the word Consideration very frequent in his talke, as declaring thereby, that the principall thing wee should haue care of, is, to consider well what affaires we vndertake. The Poet Aristonius, expounding the word Consideration, faith; A man should thinke vpon times on any thing, before hee presume to attempt it. For men (often-times) fall into great daungers, through much inconsideration; especially, when they will not be gouerned by wisdom or counsell, but rashly follow the persuasions of Fortune.

Vertue (sayd Periander) is immortal, but the pleasures of this world are of small continuance. In times of prosperity, be wise and modest, as in aduersity patients and constant. Live in such sort, that thou mayest haue honour by thy life, and that after thy death, men may account thee happy. Let ancient Lawes and Ordinances be rules for thy gouernement; inducing no nouelties into the Common-wealth. Profuse should alwayes be accompanied with good grace and homelie. Performe that chearefully, which thou canst not prevent but cowardly.

Complete he was in these, and infinite other of the same nature, which brevity maketh me spare to speake of.

CHAP. XXIIII.

¶ That sight is the chiefeft and principall sense of all the rest. And of many being blind, who neuerthelesse were men of great honour and renowne.

Aristotle had great reason to say; Sight is the very principall of all the other corporeall senses. For, it is seated as in the maine Cittadell, in the high & most eminent part of the body, whereby we may vnderstand, that it paraketh greatly with fire: by vertue and power whereof, it is placed aboue all the other senses. Touching hath a terrestrial participation, for the earth is most touchable and tractable; and of all the Elements, Tasting holdeth with Aquositie and humidity: for, without humidity, a man cannot taste any thing. As for Smelling, Aristotle attributeth it to fire, saying; Heat is the foundation of odour, and her end consisteth in vapour, joined to an Ayre grosse, and full of exhalation. Concerning

Hearing, euerie one well knoweth, that it paraketh with ayre, which entering into the eares, by sound, causeth hearing; but sight participateth with fire.

And although that the Eye were composed of a moyst and waterish bodie, yet notwithstanding, without Fire, it were not possible to haue sight: whereby wee may perceiue, that Sight or Seeing should be more of fire, then all the other senses doe beside. And because the eye (as Aristotle faith) doth more present the figures of things to a man, then all the other senses: to it is granted, the beginning of contemplation, and knowledge of all things. For from sight proceedeth admiration, and the consideration which a man hath by seeing, occasioneth a desire in him, of coming to vertue: So that (by good right) we may call the Eye, the Author and Inuentor of all Arts and Disciplines.

In the prime place, by the Eye, a man considereth the admirable Architecture of the heauens, & of all the other bodies: by the Eye we discern their colours and greatnesse, their formes, number, proportion, and measure; their sense, motion, & their resting. And although Hearing had some concurrence in this case with Seeing, so that it might be rearme a sense of doctrine and of discipline, because men learne vertue by hearing and vnderstanding: yet (for all this) that title appertaineth principally to the sight, as vnto her, that giueth the meanes to the vnderstanding, to enquire by the plenitude of things which the heareth, to come to the true knowledge of them; to the end, that this knowledge may afterward be communicated to other. Hereby then we may obserue, that the first source or spring of instruction, cometh from the Sight, who afterward maketh Hearing mistress of the worke, by comprehending those admirable things presented first to the eyes censure. Wherein also may be noted, that Hearing can comprehend nothing of it selfe, without vying the means of another, but the Sight comprehendeth all things (as it were) euen of it selfe.

Moreover, Seeing surpasseth all other senses, in swiftnesse and promptitude of her operations: for in an instant, and with no more then a cast of the eye, the perceieth her desseignes: whereas the other senses are long, & laborious in their working. For, Touching must haue one thing or another, to execute her power and office vpon, before thee can expresse her prerogative. Talking also must needs tarry, for some things answerable to his palate. And Smelling requirith such a ley-sure, in receiuing an ayre qualified, as may penetrate into her nostrilles: As the like doth Hearing, to comprehend a voice entering into the eares. But Sight only worketh instantly, and presently comprehendeth the images of things presented to hir in an vnspokeable and gracious manner. For, blowes may bee scene giuen a great way off, and although the sound or noyse of them bee not heard so soone; yet notwithstanding, there is nothing that can conceale sight of the strokes, for they are sodaine and apprehensie vnto the Eye. And therefore, Seeing surmounteth the other senses, because it extendeth it selfe so farre.

In this respect, by many Histories and examples reported by Pliny, wee may easily gather, that Sight hath a farre larger extent, then all the other senses, without any comparison, or wearying her selfe tediously, as all the other do. For the Taste tirieth it selfe by too much feeling. The Eare is easily offended, by talkative babbling. The Smell is trauailed extremely, by continuation of sweete Odors. But Sight solie, hath no sense of paine in her operations. Nor doth she at any time so wearie her selfe, as to close her lids retiredly; but rather, she is neuer satisfied with Seeing. In briefe, the excellency of Seeing is so great, that the name of Seeing is attributed to all the other senses, in their feuerall operations. For, men ordinarily say, Beholde the excellency of this sweete Odour a little while; or the Delicacie of this Musike; or the rare taste of this Fruite.

The name of Seeing, extendeth it selfe to the operations of the vnderstanding; for it is an vsuall saying; Marke how my intencion will come to passe. It is likewise sayde in the Gospell, that our Lord and Sauour saw (that is to say, knew) the thoughts of the Scribes and Pharisees. And verily, among the miracles & workes which our blessed Sauour did in those vnworthy Countreys; it is helde for the most especiall and singular, that he gaue sight to the blind. And therefore there is no labor, wherein our Physicians more gladly study and take paines, then to preferue and maintaine the sight of men.

Read of a holy man named Azarias, who being present in a consultation, that diuers Physicians made before Fredericke King of Naples, concerning the maintaining of mens sight. When it came to his turne to speake, he said; There is nothing better to comfort the sight, then enuy, because it will alwayes make the goodes of an other man seeme greater then they are. This agreeeth with Ovids saying; Enuy euer thinks his neighbours come, more goodly then his owne. Notwithstanding, according to the opinion (almost) of all men, Spectacles do greatly serue to defend the sight: and surely, they were a very good inuention, though the first deuiler neuer knew it.

I haue heard of a great Lord in Spaine, that would alwaies eat Cherries with his Spectacles on his nose; onely to make them seeme the bigger and more nourishing: but yet this gourmandise was exorbitant. An other Gentleman, being quoyt by K. Phillip, because he fed ordinarily with Spectacles on his nose; answered the king, Sir you count it not strange, that I vsemy Spectacles in reading a Letter, in which can be no danger at all: why then do you blame me, because I eat fish with Spectacles on my nose, wherein are such an infinite number of bones, as the very least is able to strangle me, & which I canot see without my Spectacles? Spectacles then serue to very good purpose many times. But to our former purpose againe concerning Sight.

Although Sight is the chiefe guide of man; yet notwithstanding, I haue read of diuers blind men, who were of no meane fame and reputation: Nature supplying their vnderstanding, for whatsoeuer wanted in their sight. Appianus Claudius the great Orator, highly honored and esteemed of Cicero and Titus Linus, although hee was blind was elected Censor at Rome, which office hee mannaged with so singular authority, as he only hindered the peace the whole Senate had concluded with King Pyrrius. Cicero discoursed amply in the fifth Booke of his Tusculan Questions, concerning the blindness of Appianus Claudius, and of remedies against diseases in the eyes.

Caius Drusus, the most famous Lawyer and Advocate, was blinde; and yet neuertheless, his house was continually full of clients and futers, who rather affected to be guided by his darke wisdom, then by their owne eye-sight. Caius Aufidius, a great companion with Cicero in his youth, was Pictor of Rome; and yet he not to opine in the Senate, and all his friends receiued counsell from him, in their very greatest and weightiest affairs. And notwithstanding this blindness, yet he digested a very notable Chronicle, of his own writing, whereof was made most high estimation. Diodorus a Stoical philosopher, was greatly renowned in his darkenes, and for all that imperfection, he could study in the night time, & play on his viole in the day; nay more, he taught Geometry publicly, a matter almost incredible, considering that it can not be practised but by the eye.

Antipater of Cyrenica, and Aclepiades the Critike Poet, were both of the blind; and yet bearing their disaster with patient foules, they neuer gaue ouer studying Philosophy, but therein spent their time to the benefit of many. And when certain Ladies (grieving at his hard fortune) late weeping by Aclepiades, hee said to them: Forbear (noble Ladies) because you know not what a pleasure it is, to dwell in darkness: they then demanding of him, what profit he receiued by his blindness, he replied; I haue a boy more now to keep me company then I had before. Homer, the Prince of Poets, was blind also, as his name imported; according to the saying of Cicero: neuertheless, tis vnkowne when he lost his sight; but true it is (as Ouid saith) that this disaster hapned to him in his old age.

Didimus Alexandrinus, may likewise be ranked with them that haue gone before, who being blinde euen from his youth, became (neuertheless) a most perfect Logitian; studying besides, in all other humane disciplines; and hee made a very notable Commentary vpon the Psalms of David. Such then, as wee haue before spoken of, perceiving themselves to be deprived of their sight, did yet strue and labour to performe things memorable, as Necessity is alwayes sayd to bee industrious.

But that which Democritus did to himselfe, made the world both astonished & smile

CHAP. XXV.

¶ That Auarice or Couetousnesse, is a most enormous vice, and subject to great dangers: With sundry examples of diuerse persons, who were extremely couetous.

THe Auarice of our instant dayes, induced mee to discourse on this sin, as a case of most perillous and extreme danger: and to intermeddle among my relations, certaine histories of many couetous men, which may serue as exampls to other yet liuing. Desiring all Readers (in the meane while) to consider the estate of a couetous man, with the like eie, as common people doe diligently looke vpon a monster, which some Juggler or Mountebanke bringeth into a city, for singularity & obferuation.

As entrance then into our discourse, it is to be noted, that Aristotle, Cicero, Thomas Aquinas, and many other Authours beside, haue diuersly defined what Auarice is; neuertheless, we may deliue this resolution from their definitions. That Auarice is an inordinate desire of a mans enriching himselfe, without sparing part of his goods to any other, so that we may well say, this vice is excoffice in desiring and griping; but very cold and slow in giuing or parting with any thing. Vnder the cloake of this sinne, march a thousand disorders, infinite iniustices and abominations, sheltering themselves there so safely, as they cannot doe the like in anie of the other vices. For as Virgil saith; Excrable famine of gold, is there any vice, which thou inducest not into the heart of man? S. Paul also saith: Couetousnesse or Auarice is the foule, or roote of all euilles, hauing made many to wander from Faith, which otherwise would haue kept and followed it.

That Auarice is a sinne most abhominable, appeareth sufficiently in this, because it makes a man hated both of God and men, being (of it selfe) quite contrary to Charitie: which is such a vertue, as conioyneth God and men together, euen as the opposite sinne maketh a man hateful vnto himselfe. For, the loue of our selues is so rooted in our hearts, that wee respect not any thing, in regarde of our selues felues, louing alwayes our owne profit, more then any others. And yet notwithstanding, Auarice hath gotten such preeminence ouer man, as he cares for nothing but getting money, beeing so full of himselfe, that hee will neyther eate, drinke, nor clothe himselfe decently; but rather is content to fast, and almost starue himselfe, because he will not allow the least leasure from the scraping goods together. Nay, he feareth not to hazard both his soule & body, so he may be sure to get money; which is a thing repugnant to the Lawe of Nature, who ordained and instructed vs, to affect and maintaine our felues, and contemne all things, before our owne liues. And yet the couetous man cares not to loose and condemne his owne soule; yea, and a bridge his life, which he will endanger in a moment, for the getting of a Crowne.

Vndoubtedly, it is much to be lamented, that a man should not respect himselfe; nor his parents, wife, children nor friends; provided that he may wallow in wealth and mucke of the world: such an one was the Rich man, spoken of in the Gospell. What a miserable and wretched follie is it, to endure hunger, thirst, colde, ill cloathing, and neyther sleep by day or night, but every houre to endanger life, and yet make no vse of golde when it is gotten? It ought, and should serue for the sustentation of life; and to that end riches were ordain'd: Obserue the words of our blessed Saviour; What mayleth it a man to winne the whole world, and loose his life; that is, his soule? Surely, fane of opinion; that this happeneth by the Diuine permission, calling such couetous men into a reprobate sence, to the end they may die in that avaritious will and desire.

And yet notwithstanding, God often permitteeth, that wealth scraped together, by such toyle and trauaile: shall fall into the hands of others, to scatter as prodigally, as it was gotten wickedly, and wonderfully spauing. This is that whereof Salomon speaketh in his Ecclesiasticus: Such as haue gotten riches, gotten by labour, leave them for other hands. For can that thing be good for a man, which is eall in him who hath it? Thou shalt also upon this very same word speaketh thus: Some doe gaine and make profit, and yet maintaineth their lives; and there are others, who live not but to gaine. In briefe, this wicked vice doth so captivate a man, that it robbes him of all love and respect to himselfe: so that there is not any wickednesse in this world, but it may well be expected in a couetous man.

"Dian the Philosopher saith, Auarice is the head of all wickednesse. Euripides saith, An ambitious & couetous Iudge, can neither thinke or desire any iust thing. Saint Augustine saith; whoeuer suffereth himselfe to be gouerned by Auarice, becometh subiect to all vices; and wickednesse." And this is conformable to good reason. For, the couetous man (by Auarice) becometh a tempter, periured, an euill payer, a v-furer, a deceiver, a traytor, a turne-taile, a thiefe, a tyrant, and an idolater: so that it is not possible, that a couetous man should haue any good being; neyther as Lord nor vassall, gouernour nor subiect, father nor sonne, nor friend or coufine, and in the end, neuer doth good, except when he dyeth.

"Lucilius sayd, An avaritious man is good to no bodie, because he is wicked to himselfe. Democritus maintained; That extreme Auarice, is worse then extreme Poverty. Aristotile in the first Booke of his Politicks saith; Desire to become rich, neuer hath ending; and therefore riches serue as powertie to a couetous man: because hee dare not vse them, for feare of empyring his estate. The Stoicks had a saying, That wishes and necessitie came not of powertie, but of abundance: for, the more that a man hath, so much the more needy is he. Concluding, It is good to haue a little, because as no time to be needie. Plato gaue this counsell to a couetous man, to become rich indeed, hee should not encrease his wealth, but rather decrease his auarice or couetousnesse."

All these notable Sentences before remembered, are intirely conformable to the sacred Scriptures, who declare; That the eyes of a couetous man are insatiable. Salomon also saith in Ecclesiasticus, A couetous man is neuer satisfied with money: And that whoeuer adultereth his mind with riches, shall neuer enjoy them. Saint Augustine compareth the couetous man to hell, which can neuer be glatted enough; and neuer faith it hath sufficient, although it hath bene so long time in filling. Euen so, the greedy greedy couetous man is neuer satisfied, but the more he gaineth, the more he gapeth still after gayne; thinking himselfe poorer and poorer. Saint Ierome saith: The couetous man is so needie of that which hee hath, as if hee had it not at all. And alwayes his avarice encreaseth, as fire doth being continually fed with dry wood. As much or rather more, haue many other holie men sayd; all in utter detestation of this damnable sinne.

Neuertheless, because I will no longer weary the Reader, I shall conclude this poynt with the saying of Saint Augustine: How strangely insatiable is this desire in men? Other creatures haue their appetites limited for they bunt when they are hungry, and being satisfied, they leave their prey. But hee that conceiveth the riches of this world, is insatiable: for hee seeketh and boordeth up daily, taking wealth from all hands, without fearing, either God or men; Hee knoweth neither father nor mother, he maketh no account of his brethren, or any friends of his; hee neuer careth for keeping his word: Hee oppresseth Widowes, robbeth Orphanes, and and serues his turne with free-men, euen as if they were slaves: He is commonly a false witness, and cares not how hee engrosseth up dead mens goods: Are not these commendable qualities in a couetous man? Let vs siet then from this accursed vice, which (ouer & beside the former notes of wickednes) is incurable (according vnto the saying of Aristotile) for it encreaseth with age: so that Auarice is in his full reign, when bodily strength faileth in man.

To shunne one falling into this slavish sin, I will alledge some examples of wicked couetous men, among whom, Iudas Iscariot marcheth in the first rancke; he being an Apostle and Disciple of Christ Iesus, was so subiect to Auarice: that he would robbe the money from the rest of his fellowes and companions, by bearing the bagges, and hauing the money in his owne possession. This wicked passion had so farre blinded him, that he accounted the precious Oynement to be lost, wherewith Mary Magdalen anointed the feet of our blessed Saviour. For, if the Oynement had bene sold, hee would haue holde part of the price. In the end, he was so strangely led by this sinne, that (for money) he sold his Lord and Master. This onely example were sufficient to approue whatfoeuer hath bene said concerning couetousnesse: neuertheless, I am content to report some other, among which, Tiberius Caesar Emperour of Rome is the formost man; and questionlesse, there is no other vice in the world, better to be exempld in the Romain Emperors, then this of Auarice.

This Prince, among other his notorious vices, (whereto hee was very easily moued) was so subiect to penurious gripping, and pinching, that although he was Lord of the whole world; yet notwithstanding, he put to death Cnaeus Lentulus (whom he had instituted to be his heire) onely to enjoy his wealth. As much did he to the King of the Parthians, who did come to liue with him vnder his safe-conduct; onely to possesse himselfe of the riches and treasure, belonging to the simply abused Prince. He so heauily charged the poore with taxes and toules, that they were enforced to forsake their countries, in such sort; that the Cities and Townes remayned desert and vninhabitable. In the end, pursuing on fill his vnvaritable inclination: Caligula smothered him betwene two pillows, and so hee dyed.

Domitian the Emperour was more couetous then he: And the Emperour Commodus (thereln) exceeded them both; for he (ordinarily) vsed to make port-fale of iustice: and therefore heauen iustly permitted them to be stabd to death by Pocnyards. Achelous King of Lydia, was so overcome with couetousnesse, that hee could not be contented with his Crownie lands, and very large ordinary reuenues; but layd (beside) such taxes and impositions vpon his subiects, that they arose in Armes against him, and hauing taken him, murdered him most miserably, and (afterwards) hang him vp by the heels. Pontanus maketh mention of a Cardinal who was so extraordinarily avaritious; as he would often disguise himselfe like vnto a poore groome or slaue, and steal away the prouender from before his owne horses: Horace saith, that there was a man in Rome, named Onid, who was so abominably rich in money, that he could measure his gold and Silver by many bushels; and yet notwithstanding, hee would goe stark naked; and neuer did eate halfe so much as would suffice him; as feareing

the occasion of infinite evils: and so much the rather; because men are continually more enclined to Avarice, then to Liberality.

CHAP. XXVI.

A verie singular reason, deliuered by Phaurinus the Philosopher, concerning Astrologers; that it is not good to demand any Question of them, having relation vnto future matters.

Iudicial Astrology continually mis-doubted.

OVr Ancient, yea, and more moderne writers, were euer more doubtfull in the act of Iudicial Astrologie, which discouerseth of things to come, and accidents happening to men, as well in particular, as generally throughout the world; some condemning it, and yettery reiecting it; others approving it in part; some beside maintaining it by strong reasons, and by experience. More-ouer, there are store of bookes, which I could produce here, as warrantable presidents: but I mean not way that to trouble myselfe, although I haue studied sufficiently in that part of Astrology, which dis-couerseth on the course and motion of the Starrs.

Being willing then, not to touch the honour and reputation of any person, I will onely alledge, what the Philosopher Phaurinus saide, according as Aulus Gellius relateth. He being desirous to retreat and turne mens mindes, from reposing any trust in Astrologers, Caldeans, or Ma-thematiicians, concerning the knowledge of things to come: vied a reason very ingenious and acute, speaking in his manner, and as himselfe hath sette downe the words.

*Be well aduised, that thou giue no credite
to Astrologers, in any manner whatsoever:
For, although they tell thee true, that which they say, will be either good or ill for thee, and being good, it must be truth, or a lye. If it be truth, thou must receive double damage by knowing it: for first of all, thy desire runs into further paine and trouble, what good thereby shall happen to thee, and how soon. Secondly, a good or benefite to come (whereof thou hast thus received intelligence) is alwayes re-ckoned the lesse, because it cannot bee so complete, as if thou wert possessed thereof instantly. If it be a lye, thou expectest in vain, the benefite which the Astrologer promised thee, in regard it shall neuer come vnto thee.
What if thou which the Astrologer foretolde thee, is ill and hurtfull for thee? Being euil & certaine; what more great disgrace can happen to thee, then to be possesd of an euill turne, which thou must embrace, and is out of thy power to shunne or auoid? If it be a lye, why should a man be afflicted, or driven into sadnesse, by feare of a mischeefe that shall neuer come neere him? Be it therefore in what sorte soeuer, it is not good to enquire after future accidents.*

For mine owne part, I finde the counsel of this Philosopher to be so good, that I hold it agreeable vnto the holy Gospell, which sayeth: *It is not for vs. to know times,
seasons, nor moments.*

saue his life) hee wold discouer all the practise.

In the meane time, hee that had killed
the other Conspiratour, being fled; was taken and brought back, calling God and Man to witness, that he had done nothing but a most iust and lawfull acte, in killing him that had slaine his Father. Which being knowne to some that were present, and testified by them to be true: filled all the assistants with admiration of Gods prouidence; who by such a sodaine and vnexpected accident, had not onely ouer-throwne the pernicious plot; and disfigument of the wicked Tyrant, and preferred Timoleon, but also had executed his iustice on a murderher.

Hereupon, Plutarch maketh a notable discourse of Fortune, following the opinion of the Platonists, concerning the same (which they define to bee Demonia-cum potestatem, &c. An Angelicall power, connetting diuers and different causes, to produce some effect.) And therefore, he noteth in this History, how the good Angel of Timoleon, did (for his preferuation) af-femble, and (as it were) chaine things together, that had no coherence of themselves, making one of them to be the beginning of another. For, although the murder of his Father that slew the Conspiratour, had no connexion with this conspiracie against Timoleon; yet, neither that murder had bene reuenged, if this Conspiracy had not followed; nor this Conspiracy had bene discovered and ouer-throwne, but by occasion of that murder committed long before. Thus discourseth Plutarch vpon this accident; which although he referred to Fortune (speaking thereof, according to the opinion of the Platonists) yet he ascribed it principally to the prouidence of God, who by the mini-stery of his good Angel, protected and preferred his seruant Timoleon, in respect of his great piety and deuotion: and this being well vnderstande, is no way repugnant vnto Christians Catholike Doctrine.

But to come to examples neerer our time, Charles Duke of Burgundie, being at Warre with Lewes the eleuenth, King of France, had (for his Confederates) the Dukes of Guienne and Britany, whereof the first was the Kinges owne Brother.
And hauing bene (in former time) twice deceiued by the said King, with false treaties, and now desirous to quite him with the like; offered him to abandon his two Confederates, vpon condition; That he would restore vnto him certaine Townes, which he had of his vpon the Frontiers.
Aduertising his Confederates (in the mean time) that his meaning was not to forsake them, or to keep any Couenant with the King; but onely to recouer his owne, and then to delude him, as he had bene before deluded by him.

The King (suspecting no deceit) accorded to the conditions; and sent his Ambasadors to Duke Charles, to take his oath for performance of the Couenantes on this part. The Duke sware, or rather forswore himselfe (promising vpon his Oath that which he meant not to performe) & then sent his Ambassadors in like manner vnto
the King, to take his oath. In the meane time, before the Ambassadors arrived where the King was, it pleased God so to dispose, that the Duke of Guienne the Kings Brother, and Confederate to Charles, dyed.
Which the King vnderstanding, and seeing himselfe already deliuered (by his Brothers death) of the danger of Ciuill Warre, which he most feared: refused to swear, and stand to his couenants. And so, all the crafty device and subtle plot of Charles was ouerthrowne, by the sodaine accident of his confederates death, which he neuer dreamed of; and he himselfe forsworne for nothing.

Heere to I will adde Caspar Borgia, Duke of Valentia; whome Machiavel so highly admireth, that he propoeth him for a patterne or example to his Prince. This Caspar, being become exceeding rich and potent, by the helpe and Authority of Alexander the sixt, his Father; and fearing nothing so much as his Fathers death, whereby it might chance, that some enemy of his might be chosen to succede him; studied and laboured by all meanes possible to prevent that inconuenience, & to procure, that the election of his Fathers successor, might fall into the power of himselfe and his friends. Which when hee had provided sufficiently, as he thought; it chanced by such meanes as I will declare.

After a while, not onely his Father died; but he fell likewise so extremely sicke at that time, that hee could execute nothing of that which hee had before resolved. Wherby it came to passe (God so disposing in his iust iudgement) that an enemy of his fathers and his (being chosen to succede) he was within a while vterly overthrowne. In which respect, he himselfe was wont afterward to confesse, and lament the imbecility of mans wite, because when hee thought, that he had foreseene all inconueniences, which might happen to him by his Fathers death, and provided to prevent them: hee neuer so much as imagined, that he should bee so sicke at the same time, that he should not be able to put any of his designements in execution.

And herein is also to be noted, for further prooffe of the matter in hand, that he himselfe was the cause, aswell of his owne sicknesse, as of his fathers death, and (consequently) of his owne overthrowe, by a wonderfull chance, which hapned contrary to his expectation. For, hauing inuited his Father, and Cardinall Cornetti to a Vineyard, with intent to poyson the Cardinall, to the end to inherit his goods; hee re-commended a certaine Bottle of im poisoned wine, to a trusty seruant of his, with speciall charge to keepe it safe, and giue it to none without his expresse order. But it so fell out, by his seruants negligence (or rather by Gods iustice)

that as the Psalmist saith; Incident in foueam quam fecit: Et fell into the pit himselfe, that he had made for other. For his Father, coming into supper very hot and thirstie, by reason of the great heates, and calling for wine; the seruant that had charge of the Bottle (not knowing it was poysoned; but imagining onely, that it was some especiall wine, more precious then the residue) & not hauing any other ready (because the poyson was not brought from the Pallace) gaue him of that wine, whereof not onely he, but his son Borgia dranke. And being both poysoned therewith, the Father (who was old and weak) died presently; but the Sonne being young, and more able to resist the force of the poyson; had time to take great and potent remedies, whereby (after a long and dangerous sicknesse) he hardly escaped. Thus was his bloodye plot and pernicious purpose prevented, by an accident which he neuer minded.

But let vs come now to an example in our Countrey of England, which manie yet may well remember. The Lord Iohn Dudley, Earle of Warwick, and after Duke of Northumberland, in the time of K. Edward the sixte, meaning to aduance himselfe and his Family; married the Lorde Gulford Dudley (his fourth sonne) to the Lady Jane, daughter to the Duke of Suffolke, pretending to make her Queene after King Edward, in preiudice of the Lady Mary, daughter to King Henry the 8. and eldest sister to the sayd King Edward. For, by reason of the Kings lingering sicknesse, he had time to vie all the meanes, which he thought conuenient for the accomplishing of his desire. And therefore partly for friendship, and partly for feare, hee had heerein so farre prevailed, that there seemed to want nothing for assurance of his intention: but only to haue the Lady Mary in his hands; whome therefore hee procured the Councell to send for in the Kings name; vpon pretence, that she should come to comfort the king, where-to he obeyed, not suspecting any sinister meaning in the Duke.

But as the was vpon the way, and somewhat neere to London; before she fell into the snare prepared for her, it pleased God, that shee received aduice of the Dukes designement, from one of his own counsell: wherupon she returned sodainly, ly; and within a while after, that she arrived at her owne house; she had newes of the King her Brothers death. And although she was destitute of men, money, counsell, and all other meanes to enable her, whereby to resist so great an adversary as the Duke (who was not meanly provided) yet such was her trust in God, as also the iustice and right of her cause; that she provided her household seruants to proclaim her Queene presently in the countrey Townes thereabout. Wherupon, first the common people of the countrey adioynings; and (afterward) diuers Gentlemen of account repaired vnto her in so great a number; that the Duke of Northumberland and the Councell (who had already proclaimed the Lady Jane in London, and in diuers parts) thought it conuenient to leuy forces, and to make a royal Army, whereof the Duke himselfe (for the authority of his person) was General.

The Duke then presently put himselfe into the fildes, leaving the charge of the City & Tower of London, to the Lords of the Councell: who, vpon his absence, and vnderstanding the great concourse of people, to the assistance of the Lady Mary, and the equity of her cause iustified considered: they agreed amongst themselves, to proclaim her in London, as presently they did, and committed to prison the Lady Jane. Then sent they order to apprehend the Duke, who was so dismayed therewith when he vnderstood it; that he vterly lost his high and hopefull courage; and being taken prisoner at or nere Cambridge, was brought to London, and there afterward executed.

By these examples, and infinite others which might bee alledged, it is verie euident, that there is no surety in the plottes and contriuings of men, be they neuer so wise, except they be guided by the Spirit of God particularly. For, when they haue built (as a man may say) Towers of policy, as high as the Tower of Babel: a sodaine blast of an accident vnexpected, shall cast them downe to the very ground, to the confusion (many times) and ruine of the builders and contriuers.

But what shall we say of counsellors and policies, that seeme not only to be grounded vpon great reason, and continued also with as great prudence; but also suc-ceede (for some time) notably well; & yet in the end prooue to be pernicious? VVherof we haue seene sufficient experience, in the Roman Empire, which was overthrowne in course of time, by that (which for many yeares) seemed to bee the strength and security thereof. For, whereas the first Roman Emperors, hauing oppressed the Common-wealth by Armes, perswaded themselves, that their seene was to bee established and conserued, by the selfsame meanes as it was gotten, and therefore resolved, that the safety thereof, & of many persons, consisted in siting Guards, garrisons, Legions, and Armies of soldiers, to be distributed throughout all the parts of their Dominions: it is euident, that the same was (in the end) one of the principall and chiefest causes, of the Emperors vicer overthrow, though (at the first) it seemed greatly to establish and assure the same.

For, after the death of Nero (when the Family of the Caesars was ended) not onely the Guards departed for the custody & safeguard of the Emperors persons, called Pretorians militia; but also the Legions & Armies, disposed and placed in diuers quarters of the Empire (seeing as well the poysonnes of the Emperors, as also the strength of the Empire in their own hands) did arrogate vnto themselves, such authority and liberty to chuse new Emperors: that they set them vpp, and pulled them downe at their pleasure. Wherby in lesse then one year after Neros death, foure Emperors, Galba, Otho, Vitellius, and Flauius, were chosen by the Guards, who forced the Senate to admit and confirme them. And their insolency grew to such extremity in time, that after the death of the Emperor Pertinax (whom they killed) they made offer of the empire (by publike proclamation) to whosoever would giue most for it.

And whereas there was but onely two that offered money for it, Sulpicianus, and Didius Iulianus; they gaue it to the latter, partly because he gaue them ready money, and partly because Sulpicianus was Father in Law to Pertinax, whom they had slain. And, whilst not onely the Emperors guards, but also the soldours of euery army tooke vpon them to make Emperors: it fell out sometimes, that there were as many Emperors chosen at once, as there were perours declared in sundry places within tions.

The ruine of many Emperours by their owne Guards

This was the Romane Empire overthrowne, by the same meanes, that were not otly ordained to conserue and maintaine it; but also indede (for a time) preserue it from many dangers; both do-mesticall and forraigne, to wit, as well from invasion of forraigne enemies, as from rebellions of Subiects: which by the Emperours Guards, and the ordinary Legions, dispersed through all parts of the Empire,
were either easily prevented, or speedily reprefsed. For which cause, the Emperours themselves were content, to stand (as it were) at their mercy, to the end that they might (by them) rule and command others; which although to some it was a safeguard and security, yet to manie more it brought ruine and perdition; as to Calig- ula, Pertinax, Caracalla, Heliogabalus, Pu- perius, Balbinus, Galen, Seuerus, Macrinus, Aurelianus, Iulius Maximinus, Probus, with diuers other; some of them being slaine
by their owne Guards, and some by their Soldiers.

The Turkes
great Guardes

dangerous to his State.

This inconuenience, the Emperours of Turkes doe seeke to remedy, in their Ty-rannicall Dominion (which they also vp-hold by force, as the Romans did, though with lesse danger.) For, although they have about three hundred thousand horse, and foote euer in readinesse, vnder their Colonels and Captaines, in Europe, Asia, and Africa: yet they keepe them alwayes fundered, and farre dispersed, that they neuer come together in any number, vnlesse they are to be employed in some forraigne Warre. Neuerthelesse, they Guardes of Janizaries, which they haue alwayes neere about them, for the security of their persons, to the number of thir-teene or foureteene thousand, haue proued (many times) no lesse dammageable, then dangerous to their States. For they haue not onely sometime set the younger foone to depose the father: but also (euen in our Age) haue taken the most confident Officers and greatest authorities of the Turke from him by force; and smote off their heades; and compelled him to pardon them, yea, and to giue them whatsoeuer they would demaund; to appease them.

Whereupon, two considerations
may be gathered; the one, the infelicities of Tyrants, who while they seek rather to be feared, then lovingly affected: are forced to make themselves subiects & slaves to those, by whom they keepe other in subiection and slavery. Whereby wee see, how true it is which Seneca saith; Quod a- lium domini magnum est, duo non vacat. That which is great by others feare, is not void of feare in himselfe. The other consideration, is, how tickle the state of Princes is, how weake their policies, how vncertaine the successes of their plots; and consequently how needfull it is for them, to craue, and haue the especiall protection of Almightty God, in all their designements and actions; seeing the meanes whereby they labour to preserue themselves from dangers, proue many times more dangerous
in the end, then the dangers themselves, which they seeke to auoid.

This may further appeare, by the po-licie which Rodericke King of Spain vsed, to assure his state against the children and friends of King Princa, whom hee had deposed. For, fearing lest his subiects might rebell in their fauour, hee dismantled all the strong holds and places in Spain, and disarmed the people. Whereby, though hee strengthened his state, in regard of domesticall dangers; yet hee weakened it, in respect of forraigne attempts. In somuch, that the Moors invading him shortly after, and ouertthrowing him in battell, found so flender resistance afterward, that in seauen or eight moneths, they conquered almost all Spain.

The like also may be saide of the Brit- taines, to whom their owne policie pro-oued most pernicious; for, being molested by the Picts and Scottes, they called in the Saxons for their defence, who (for some time) serued them to good purpose; but in the end, they conquered them & their Country.

In like manner, the Queene of Hunga- rie thought it good policie, to procure the of the Romanes, brother vnto the Em-perour Charles, the fifth of that name; and (for a certayne time) thece was releued and supported thereby: but in the end, Solyman comming into Hungarie, in his owne person, with a pretence to succour

her: hee depriued both her and her sonne of their Kingdome: Also Amurath, one of Solymans Ancestours, conquered and subdewed the greatest part of all Greece, euen by the very like kinde of meanes and occasion.

But peradventure you will say, that this was so grosse a follie in Christian Princes (to put confidence and trust in the helpe of such potent and perfidious Infidells) that it is not to bee alleadged for an example of pollicie. I graunt that it was follie; but such kindes of follie may bee committed and doone, euen by the wisest Princes and their counsellors, when Almighty GOD will punish and afflict them. For, hee eyther taketh from them their politticke wittes, to the end
they may erre and precipitate themselves:
or, hee ouerthroweth their wisest designements, by such kinde of meanes as they cannot imagine: or else, hee doth bring them to such exigents, that they are forced (sometimes) wittingly, to take in hand some dangerous and desperate resolution, whereby they are disgraced and ruined.

CHAP. XXVIII.

A briefe Discourse concerning the first foundation of Ierusalem; What fortunes (from time to time) befall thereto: And of the Kings that there did reigne.

Neuer was there any Towne or Cittie (of what estate or condition soeuer) that had (so many especiall graces and priuiledges from Almighty God, nor euer had such store of sacred mysteries therein performed, as in the Cittie of Ierusalem: although it had not had that (onely chiefe) note, that our blessed Lord and Saviour was there crucified, dead and buried; and that the mysteries and secrets of our redemption, had not bene there accomplished. Contrariwise, there is not any Cittie in the world, that euer endured so many miseries and mischiefes, or fell into such slauiish seruitude, as thece, and as is to be discerned at this day.

As concerning her riches, and sumptuous buildings, no Cittie vpon the earth could euer equal them; as Pliny extolleth it about all the Citties in the East; and Cornelius Tacitus amply describeth the situation thereof: whereby wee may easily collect, that it was one of the most potent Citties in the world. As much affirmeth Iosephus, who describeth the three walles wherewith it was ingirt: which ne-uerthelesse were adorned with goodly Towers, Bulwarks, and buildings most rare; besides the excellencie of the Temple, a thing beyond all compasse of comparison. All which considered, I thought it not vn-necessary, to make some briefe report, concerning the first foundation of this Cittie, with what fortunes happened thereto (as well good as euill) by a sum-marie Collection, of such things as I find recorded in her owne Chronicles.

Ierusalem was scituated and founded, in the very middest of Iudea or Iewrie, at the toppe or knap of Mount Sion; which is helde or reputed (commonly) to be the middle or centre of the earths superficies.
Ezechiel also saith, That it was seated in the middest of Nations. Dauid likewise sayth, That the saluation of men was perfected in the middest of the earth. Which Saint Hier- ome declareth, writing on that passage of Ezechiel before specified. Moreover, it is written in Genesis, That Melchisedech (which, according to the interpretation of Saint Paul) is as much to say, as a Iust King, or a King of Iustice. Abraham hauing conquered foure Kings, that kept Lot prisoner) mett him and made a sacrifice to God; and that this Prince baptized this Cittie of Salem, or (as some say) Ierusalem, which is as much to say, as Peace
in regard wherof, hee was called King of Peace.

Salem then was the first name imposed vpon this Cittie: although Saint Hier- ome is of the opinion, that it had the name of Iebus at the beginning. Strabo, Cornelius Tacitus, and many other Authors beside, called it Solima, speaking otherwise of the foundation, then formerly hath beene sayd.

This Citty likewise was called Iebus and Ierusalem, as wee may reade in the sacred Scriptures. Saint Hierome writing to Dardanus, doeth giue it three names: Notwithstanding, it was (in the end) called Aelia, in regarde of the Emperours name Aelius Adrianus, who caused it to bee re-built and fortified. Saint Hierome sayth, that it had the name of Iebus, in regard of the Iebusites, who had founded it, vntill the time of the holy Prophet Dauid.

Iosephus and Agepsippus say, that Melchisedech gaue it the name of Ierusalem, as much to say, as Vision of peace: making one word of Iebus and Salem, so that Ierusalem found it selfe to be composed of these two wordes, onely by chaunging B. into R. Others say, that it had the name of Here, that is to say, Vision: by reason of the Angell which appeared to Abraham, when hee would haue sacrificed his sonne Isaac.

Some others say, that it was called Ierusalem, as much to say, as the house of Salomon: in regarde of the admirable buildings which King Salomon erected there: many other opinions are there vpon this poynt, which I passe ouer lightly, because I am of the minde, that as the Iewes called it in their tongue Ierusalem, so did the Greekes and the Latines name it Ierosolima, as wee may reade in Iosephus and Agepsippus, Greek Authors. Yet, Nicholas de Lyra will not haue it to bee so receyued, because hee sayth, that Ierusalem was first called Luca and Bethell: which I can giue but little credite vnto; for (according as Saint Hierome sayth) Bethell is twelue miles off from Ierusalem, as wee may see it also auouched by Iosephus. Notwithstanding all these opinions, it is to be noted, that Ierusalem (in former times) had many particular names; which were thereto attributed, in regard of the manifolde high mysteries therein accomplished. As, The Holy City; The Sacred Citty; The Citty of Dauid, and many other such like Titles, besides her owne proper and peculiar name, Ierusalem.

But come wee now vnto the Historie. The Iebusites and the Canaanites, who were one and the same Nation (for Iebus or Iebus, was the sonne of Canaan, the sonne of Can, Nephew to Noah, of whom these Nations tooke their name) were Lordes of Ierusalem, at such time as the Children of Israel (deliuered from the Captiuitie of Egypt) possessed themselves of Palestine and Iudea. And it came to passe, that in the diuision for portage, which the twelue Tribes of Israel made of the Land promised vnto them: Ierusalem fell into the portion of the Tribe of Beniamin. Neuerthelesse, because this Tribe of Beniamin (notwithstanding all their aduentures in Armes) could not wholly cleare the Country of the Iebusites: they were constrained to let them liue there among them, for more then three hundred and seauenty yeares after, euen to the time of Dauid. Hee being both a Prophet and King, and descended of the Tribe of Iuda; expelling the Iebusites, wonne their Fortresses from them, building them new againe; and erected there a goodly Pallace, as wee may reade in the Booke of Kings, and also in Iosephus. Dauid hauing thus expelled the Iebusites, called Ierusalem, The Citty of God, creating it to be the chiefe and Capitall Citty in all Iudea.

During the Reigne of King Dauid, Ierusalem was in her triumphing iollity, and highly renowned among all the Nations, in regarde of the great victories which Dauid obtayned: after whose death, wife Salomon succeeded him. And although this King laboured to liue in peace, yet Ierusalem still increased in fame, riches and sumptuous buildings: for Salomon enlarged the walles thereof, and erected there goodly fortifications. Hee builded many other costly Castles beside: but especially the Temple, so greatly renowned, in regard of the treasure and artificial cunning bestowed thereon, as neuer could any other building be compared therewith. For, as we may reade in holy Scripture, and also in Iosephus, the Furniture thereto belonging, was infinite and incomprehensible. So that the very fame thereof, incited the Queene of Saba to visite King Salomon.

Concerning the Iebusites and Canaanites the lords and possesors of Ierusalem.

Ierusalem fell to the Tribe of Beniamin the diuision.

King Dauid expelled the Iebusites out of the land. Ioseph, in the Iud. lib. 18. c. 9

Salomon succeeded his father Dauid.

Ioseph, in Ant. Iudaic. lib. 8.

The Queene of Saba visited King Salomon.

Many

Many Kings likewise sent him choyses Presents to the same effect, Gold, Silver, and Treasure, which they brought to him by sea, and in such abundance, as no more account was made thereof, then as stones in the streete.

This King neuerthelesse, forgetting the great blessings which God had bestowed vpon him; became an Idolater, so that God suffered his kingdom to be diuided after his death.

Hauing reigned forty yeares, Rehoboam his sonne succeeded him, against whom the Tribes reuolted, who elected Ieroboam to be their King. Rehoboam had but two of the Tribes onely, to wit, Iuda and Beniamin, whereupon he fortified his Cities: and afterward, this Kingdom remaining to his successours, began to take and continue the name of Iewes, because of the Tribe of Iuda. Ieroboam and his successours, called themselves Kings of Israel, and chose Samaria to be the chiefe Citty of that Kingdom: and by this diuision, those Kings were alwayes at continual warre, each against other. Notwithstanding, although Rehoboam had but two of the Tribes subiect to him, yet his reputation was so great (because hee was defended of Dauid) that euermore hee preuailed in fight, and was much more feared and obeyed, then the King of Israel, so that Ierusalem became not a iote diminished, eyther in strength or riches. But when the Kings of Iuda and their people, grew offensive to God by Idolatry: then this goodly Citty suffered many miseries and calamities.

Rehoboam hauing strongly defended his Townes and Cities, and they flourishing in all pompe and prosperity; he notwithstanding, fell to Idolatry, as we may reade in the holy Chronicles, and likewise in Iosephus. In regard whereof, God raised vp against him, Susac or Shishack, King of Egypt, who came and couered his Country with twelue hundred Chariots, threecore thousand horse, and a countless number of Infantry, belonging to the Egyptians, Ethiopiens, Troglodites, with many Lybians, which came from Guynea, to his seruice. Boldly they entered into Ierusalem, sacked the Citty and the Temple, from whence they carried infinite Treasures, as is to be obserued in his chronicle. After which chastisements, the anger of God being appeased; Rehoboam remained peaceably in his Kingdom, all the remainder of his life: and being dead, Abias succeeded him, who ouer-came Ieroboam King of Israel; in which conquest were slaine fifty thousand men belonging to Ieroboam.

After the death of Abias, who liued but a while (being also an Idolator; and yet God permitted him to haue this victory, in consideration of Dauid his grandfather) Asa succeeded him. This Prince was good, iust, and feared God, and therefore he gaue him many great and signall victories, against Zarab, King of Ethiopia: who had entred so farre vpon his Country, that he kept Ierusalem besieged. In his time, the Kingdom of Iuda was so flourishing, that (vpon an account made) there were found five hundred and fourescore thousand men, able to beare Arms. I finde also in the sacred Scripture, that this King builded and fortified many Cities.

Hee being deceased, Iehoshaphat his sonne came to the Crowne, during whose Reigne, Ierusalem was in great reputation: chiefly in respect of Prophets, as Abias, Michas, Ofias, Elias and Elisue, who were all then at that time. This King found such fauour in the sight of God (according as wee reade in the holy Chronicles of the Kings) that the Moabites, Ammonites, and the Mountaineers of Seir (being gathered together, with an infinite number of people, to runne vpon this Prince) God sent a dissention among them, that they conuerted thence, and employed their powers to spoyle themselves, so that without striking a stroke, King Iehoshaphat returned with great triumph to Ierusalem. Where hauing reigned peaceably, and in no meane power, he dyed, leaving the Kingdom vnto Joram his sonne, giuing also to his other Children, diuers Cities, with great summes of gold and silver.

Joram being come vnto the Crowne, he followed not the steppes of his Father, nor of his Grand-father; but gaue himselfe to impiety and cruelty, putting to death his owne Brethren. He laboured also to haue alliance with Zeheb, King of Israel, whose counsell he mainly followed in his affaires, and likewise tooke his Daughter in marriage. Whereat

After his death, Ahasia, or Ochozias his Sonne, succeeded in the Kingdome, with his Mother Athalia: and, as they were both of most Wicked life, euen so, hadde they as vnhappy an ending.

Next him succeeded Ochozias, who gaue good apparance in the beginning of his Reigne, to doe all things for the best, as well in regard of Religion, as for actions of policie. For, hee reduced the Temple into the first condition, and re-established all the damages and injuries which the Kinges of Egypt (and especially his Father Ahasia) had done. But soone after, hee fell vnto Idolatrie, so that (by common voyce of the people) hee caused the Prophet Zacharie to be put to death.

So highly was the goodnesse of Almighty God distasteth heere with, that he sent a terrible chastisement vpon Ierusalem, and that in the time of King Amasias, Sonne vnto this Ochozias. Who hauing Warre against Iezabab, King of Israel, and neuer remembering the great Victories, which God had giuen him against the Idumians, and manie other Nations: both hee and his people were ouercome, and being ledde Prisoner vnto Ierusalem his owne City, was compelled to yeelde it to the mercy of Iezabab, who caused it to be dismantled, and foure hundred fadomes of the Walles to bee beaten downe. Hee spoyleth the Temple also, and possessed himselfe of all the wealth and riches belonging vnto King Amasias: returning home afterwards (in Triumph) to his Citie of Samarina.

Furthermore, King Amasias being slaine by Treason, Azarias, or Ozias his Sonne next succeeded, who was a verie valiant and potent Prince. First of all, he strengthened Ierusalem, and all the other dismantled Cities, enriching his Countrey, by diuers great victories which hee obtained against the Philistines, Arabs, and Ammonites, making them all Tributarie vnto his Crowne; so that the renoune of Ierusalem, increased day by day, while hee reigned; and hee founded and builded many Townes and Cities beside.

Neuertheless, pride made him to forget his dutie; for, perceiuing that he had three hundred thousand men subiect vnto him, and all in abilitie to carry Armes: hee grew so exceeding arrogant, that hee would needes vsurpe the High-Priest Office. But as hee was performing his Sacrifice in the Temple; God smote him with a fowle Leapfroge, the which continued with him to the time of his death.

After his decease, Iotham his Sonne next succeeded him, being a Prince very wise, iust, and valiant; hee also enlarged Ierusalem verie spaciouly, by manie reparations and new foundations; besides, the building of some other Cities. Hee likewise ouercame and vanquished the Ammonites, from whom hee brought backe great summes of Golde and Siluer. But after his death, Triumphant things beganne to wear away, and all vn-happinesse fell vpon the people of Iuda: For, his Sonne Achaz, sur-named Elezazar, being come to the Crowne; gaue himselfe to Idolatry, introducing the ceremonies and superstitions of the Pagans. In regard whereof, God chastised them by the hand of Rafis, King of Suria; and Phazias king of Israel, who slaughtered (in one day) fixe score thousand men. After which pittifull overthrow, they ranne thorow the Countrey of Iudea, robbing and spoyleing it in lamentable manner; and because Ierusalem was strong, it outstoode the sharpe besiedging of these kings so long, til they despayring of their insufficiency, were forced (with great summes of Golde) to buy their succor of Salmanazar king of the Assyrians. And for the better satisfaction of him, they tooke the Vesselles of Gold and Siluer, which onely were for the Temples seruice, to helpe them withall in this great distresse.

of the Iewes, since their miraculous deliuerance out of Egypt: and in short time after, the Assyrian king, compelled the King of Israel, every yeare to pay them Tribute. At this very time, the Prophets Osea, Esay, Amos, Micheas and Ionas were in great reputation.

After the death of this vnfortunate Achaz, next came to the Crowne his son Ezechias, a man, farre beyond the Nature of his Father; for, hee was wise, iust, religious, and one that feared God. Ierusalem also (in his reigne) recovered once more her former credite; policy becoming better reformed, and the seruice of God reduced to such perfection: that (as the Scripture it selfe amply declareth) the Realme of Iudab neuer had a better king, liuing in great prosperity, and honouring his Countrey, with many famous Victories.

Hee could not content himselfe, with renting vp the rootes of Idolatry, where- to the people were ouer-much enclined; and bringing them entirely vnto the true seruice of God: but hee also gaue summons to the ten Tribes of Israel, to liue according to that Lawe, which God had deliuered by the hand of Moyfes. Whereunto many condiscending, they came to Sacrifice in Ierusalem, and to celebrate Easter, according vnto the ordinance of Moyfes.

Notwithstanding, as the sacred Scriptures doe testifie, the rest persevered still in their Idolatrie, and made a mockerie of those gentle inuitations, as also the aduertisements which the Prophets had giuen them. For which contempt, GOD layde his correcting rodde vpon them, aswell by Salmanazar, as Senacherib, kings of the Assyrians, who oppressed them greatly, in the first yeare of King Ezechias his reigne.

Also in the fourth yeare of the reign of Ozias, King of Israel, the Assyrian brought fo heauy a warre against seuen Tribes of Israel, for the space of three whole yeares: as he enforced them to forsake their countries, and to go dwell as slaues among the Medes.

The dispercion of the Iewes
into strange Countreies.

Thus you see how the Iewes were dispersed heere and there, among forrayne and strange Nations, without euer returning againe home to their owne houses, so that none knew what afterward should become of them. For heere was the end and ruine of the kingdom of Israel, which had continued three hundred and seuentie yeares.

On the contrarie, Salmanazar sent his Assyrians into Samarina, to inhabite there; who (vsurpingly) got possession of all the Countreies (wherein the Israelites had formerly dwelt) and tooke the name of Samaritanes vpon them. Yet Eusebius taketh that name but as a Garrison, wherein his opinion (me thinks) is not warrantable: for they were called Samaritanes, after the name of Samarina, the chiefe and principall City of that Countrey. The Assyrians made a mixture of the Iewes Lawes with their Idolatries; yet held them in abomination, as excommunicated people. As concerning their actions, I shall be silent therein, because it no way concerneth my discouise: and if heerein I haue committed any error, I submit my selfe to the Churches correction.

How the Sa-maritanes first received that name.

After the overthrow and ruine of the Israelites, the Kingdome of Iuda onely remained on foot: For the good King Ezechias, to saue his people from the fierce rage and furie of King Salmanazar, and to preferre his owne dominions in peace; gaue him great summes of gold, buying (by that means) peace for long time. Neuertheless, this Infidell King falsified his Fayth vnto him, and came with a mighty powerfull Armie, intending to ruinate the Kingdome of Iuda, as formerly hee had done the Kingdome of Israel. But GOD being pleased to defend his people, sent the Prophet Esay vnto King Ezechias to comfort him, (because this Prophet liued then) and in one night, the Angell of the Lorde, slew one hundred and foure score thousand fighting men in the Assyrians camp: by means of which great slaughter, the rest retyred thence. And Ezechias, hauing escaped this dangerous perill to himselfe, and his people, lyued the remainder of his dayes peaceably in his Kingdome. And God hauing euidently declared great Myracles, on the behalfe of this King, he dyed peaceably, leaving his Sonne Manasses succedour in his kingdome.

many most abominable finnes, directly contrary to the Law of God, and thereto likewise induced the people. Whereat God growing offended, raised vp the Affyrrians against him, who so well chastised him; that, ouer and beside the ouerthrow of his people, himselfe was taken prisoner, and ledde away captiue into Babylon. Notwithstanding, he repented him of his finnes, which caused God to deliuer him out of the Affyrrians hands; so that hee returned home to his owne estates, and dyed there in peace. After him, succeeded his wicked son Amon, who was slain most miserably by the Prophets Ioh. Nahum, and Habakkuk succeeded in his time. Next him, came to the crowne his sonne Iosias, who was a Prince that feared God, & very vigilant for the reformation of his people; performing many other actions, rightly becoming to good and iust a King. For, he expulled all idolatry quite out of his kingdom, which had taken deepe roote in the hearts of men, and he repaired the Temple also. Neuertheless, the anger of God against the Iewes was not appeased, in regard of the abominable idolatries committed, in the reigns of the Kings Manasses & Amon. Notwithstanding, in respect of King Iosias, who (thorough his owne folly) dyed poorly; God deferred to chastise the Iewish people, in such manner as he did afterward.

This king dyed of a wound, which hee receiued on the day that hee had agaynst Necar, King of Egypt, when hee might haue bin better employed. For Necar had no matter of quarrell against him, but rather sought his friendship so much as hee could; and hauing no other intention, but to imploy his forces against the King of Affyria. Neuertheless, in a brauery of spirit, Iosias would needs meddle with him, which cost the deere price of his life. His death was very much bemoaned, especially by the Prophet Jeremy, who wrote his Lamentations on his behalfe.

Ioachaz his son succeeded him, who was giuen to all iniquity and wickednes: wherefore God suffered him to reigne no more then three moneths: for Necar, who had before foyled his father, deprived him of his kingdom, making the countrey of Iudea tributary, paying an hundred Talents of Gold, and one of Siluer, euery yeare.

Ioachaz being thus defeated of his kingdome, and led prisoner into Egypt, where he dyed; Ioachim his Brother, was enstalled in his place, behauing himselfe verie wickedly; for hee was wholly affected to Idolatry, and prouoked his people to doe the like. In which respect, God stirred vp king Nabuchodonosor to be his enemy, who had already reigned forty foure years in Babylon.

This Prince hauing won the victorie against the Iewish people, ledde away the most part of the greatest personnes in all the Countrey, as captiue slaues and Vassals, and tooke away also the Vesselles of the Temple. The occasion of this warre grew, because Ioachim gaue ayde vnto the King of Egypt, against Nabuchodonosor, contrary to the counsell of Iere-my. Ioachim hauing reigned eleuen yeeres, and liued prisoner three yeeres, dyed in great poverty.

After whom succeeded Iechonias, following the steppes of his Father, because hee was as wicked as hee. In his time, God began to display his rigorous rods of vengeance, prepared long time before against Ierusalem, but deferred in the regard of Iosias, according as the Prophets had foretold. For King Nabuchodonosor came in his owne person, with an exceeding great and powerfull Armie, to besiege the Citie of Ierusalem: but, Iechonias being not able to make resistance, submitted vnto his will, himselfe, his Mother, his Wife, and the principall personnes that were of his House. Moreover, hee made him a present, of the Vesselles and Treasures which remained (as yet) in the Temple. By which means, King Iechonias, and the chiefeest men of his Court, were ledde away captiues into Babylon: But Nabuchodonosor, tooke all the assurances and fidelitie of Matthias, vnto King Iechonias, and made him king of Iudea, calling him by the name of Sedechias.

In speaking of this King, I must needs say, hee was one of the most Wicked and vnhappy Princes that euer reigned: For, not onely was hee ingratefull vnto Almighty GOD, for the great Graces which hee had bestowed vpon him (turning still his backe, and not willing to heare any thing which the Prophet Jeremy tolde him) but also did falsifie his word vnto King Nabuchodonosor; who who had enstalled him in the Kingdome, denying him his friendship. And if this Prince was no more worthy: much lesse then were the sacrificing Priests, and least of all the common people: so that all abominations and idolatries reigned in Iudea, euen to the prophanation of the Temple, which had bene held in such sacred esteeme. And notwithstanding all the aduertisements giuen to this King, by Ieremie, Ezechiel, and other Prophets: yet his obstinacy encreased daily more and more. Whereupon, God raised Nabuchodonosor, who, to reuenge the wrongs done him by Sedechias, In the ninth yeare of his Reigne, he came and couered the Countrey of Iudea with a mighty Army, and held Ierusalem besieged, the space of two yeeres, where King Sedechias had betaken himselfe for his more security.

The poore people languishing with famine & pestilence, were no longer able to endure the siege; but being thus by extremity compelled, yielded to the enemies mercy: when hee entering into the City, put all to fire and sword. Sedechias was taken in his flight, and being brought before Nabuchodonosor; saw his own children slaine before his face; and as for himselfe, he had his eyes plucked out, and sent (in that miserable manner) captiue to Babylon. After the Conqueror was returned home, he sent to Ierusalem Nabuzaradan, who was one of his principall Captaines, with especial charge, vterly to ruinate the Temple. This was foure hundred yeeres after the building thereof by King Salomon: as he performed the like, to all the Fortresses and sumptuous buildings of Ierusalem, beating downe the walles of the City, and defacing the Pallace belonging to the Kings of Iuda.

Hee carried away also all the mettall that was in the Temple, and ledde thence the Sacrificers, and all the chiefe men, as well of Ierusalem, as throughout the countrey beside, with their Wiues and Children; who continued Captiues in Babylon, for the space of about threescore and ten yeeres. This was the Captiui-ty of Babylon, which hath so much bene spoken of, and which happened about fixe hundred yeeres before the comming of our Lord and Saviour Iesus Christ. Thus you see, how the poore City of Ierusalem remained desert and desolate, except some few of the meaner people, left behinde to till and husband the grounds: vnder the charge (newthelesse) of Godolias, Deputy Gouernor in Iudea. But the people falling into mutiny, slew Godolias, and then fearing the fury of Nabuchodonosor; such as remained of the Iewes, went and dwelt in Egypt, leauing Ierusalem waste and vnpeopled.

S. Hierome saith, that after the surprisal and sacking of Ierusalem, there passed well neere fifty yeeres, when neyther Man, Beast nor Bird entred into it: whereby may sufficiently be knowne, what great punishments this people had deserved, that were so highly beloued and priuiledged by God. Seauenty yeeres being passed ouer, it pleased God with the eye of pity, to looke vpon the Captiui-ty of his people: being then, when the Empire fell into the dominion of the Persians, who thereof diseized the Affyrrians, and in the time of the puissant King Cyrus. He, being moued by the Spirit of God, suffered fifty thousand Iewes to returne home into their Countrey, vnder the conduct of Zerababell their Captaine, and Iosuah or Iesus, the soueraigne Sacrificer or High Priest: who being returned into Iudea, began to repaire the ruines of their Cities, and especially Ierusalem, which they re-built with great ioy, offering sacrifices to God, according to the Ordinances appointed in his Law.

CHAP. XXIX.

What difference there is betwene Leasing and Lying; And how a man may tell a leasing, and yet not to be false, that it is a lye.

Lying, is one of the greatest vices that any man can haue; for it is not any way possible to negotiate, or to conclude any matter, with him that is a liar, because lying maketh euery thing to be suspected. Moreover, the horreur of lying sheweth it selfe sufficiently, in that it is directly opposite to truth, which is God: as likewise the diuell is called the Father of lyes. Salomon (in his his Prouerbs) placeth lying in the second ranke, of the leauen vices greatly displeasing to God. In briefe, this vice hath (at all times) bene so abhorred both by Infidels and Christians; that a man knowne to be a lyar, was reputed as a plague to the Common-wealth, as we may perceiue in Euripides, according as is auouched by Stobaeus.

But not to make any longer stay, in shewing how pernicious and detestable a thing lying is, in regard that it is so common and vulgar: I take it as a matter conuenient, to declare what difference there is betwene leasing and lying, according to the saying of Anlus Gellius, and of many other Authors more; for oftentimes, there is a great difference in these two bad qualities. Obserue we then to this effect, that to tell a lye, is to affirme the contrary, of that which a man knoweth to be true. But telling a fallacie or leasing, is to affirme lying, with an intention to speake truth: wherein a man cannot be faide to haue lyed, when he speaketh not against that which he holdeth for truth, & knoweth it so to be.

Contrariwise, a man may lye, and yet (notwithstanding) tell truth, when he speaketh against that which hee thinketh, although that which he hath said, be true. But when a man vttereth a leasing, knowing the thing it selfe to be otherwise then as he hath said; hee lyeth, and then it is a direct lye. From hence it ensueth, that it is impossible to tell a lye without vice or sinne: but he that speaketh a leasing, thinking to say the truth, lyeth not at all. This is that which Nigidius saith, according to the expresseion of Gellius: That an honest man will neuer lye, and a wise man hates to tell a leasing. For mine owne opinion herein, I would aduise all men to auoyde both the one and other vice, although they may imagine to speake truly.

Heere it is to be noted, that although the tongue keepe silence, yet deeds sometimes may betray the person. For as Saint Ambrose saith: He which makes profession of being a Christian, without conforming himselfe to the works of Christ, lieth, or is a lyar. As also that man doth, which makes a solemn promise to obserue Religion, and yet notwithstanding, obserueth none at all. As much may we say of some very women, as black as faire diuels, who paint & paint to get them better faces, and look thereby worse the euer they did: And foolish olde men, that would be yong againe by fantastick means.

I remember an old man, of whom Theophrastus speaketh, who being of great authority and credite, and hauing some important business before the Lacedemon Senate; was very much greeued, to appeare there in such antiquity of yeares as he was stept into; which made him to cut and shauie his head and beard, hoping by this meares to seeme much younger. As the cause was in debating, Archidamus (speaking for his Clyent, against him) declared to the Senate, that no credit ought to be giuen to the words of him, that apparently carried lying in his head & face. So that, according to Archidamus, such aged fooles can lye, without speaking any words.

CHAP. XXX.

Of the twelue Moneths in the yeare; how both Ancients and Moderne men used to figure them: And of some mysteries represented by them.

NO great mystery consisteth in knowing the signification of the twelue Moneths by their figures. Neuertheless, considering that few or none haue written of them, in our vulgar tongue: I am the more willing to take a little paines, in acquainting some particular friends, that by looking vpon their portraictures, they may the better reach to their interpretation.

First of all then, beginning with January, it was presented by a man seated at a Table, holding a Glasse of Wine in his hand, as being ready to drinke. Whereby was intended, that in this Moneth, all creatures haue better appetite and desire to eate and drinke, then at any other time: because heat is retired inward, & strength in the stomacke in such sort, that it is capable of the easier digestion.

February, was a man heating his hands about his own body: for in this month, fire is very requisite, in regard of the great coldes in Winter, caused by the absence of the Sunne.

March, was figured in form of a Gardiner: because (in this Moneth) the pores and spiracles of the earth, do open themselves, inso much, that the moisture of the earth commeth (of it owne accord) to all the Trees, Hearbs and Plants. In which respect, all superfluities are to bee cut away, that the nutritiue humour may extend it selfe to the liuing Branches, for bearing the fairer fruite.

April, was made in the shape of a young man, holding a Nosegay of flowers in his hand: for in this Moneth, the earth hauing communicated his verue to Trees and Hearbs, maketh euery thing to flourish, and bring forth Flowers.

For May, a yong gallant Gentleman was portraited, being mounted on horsebacke, and brauely apparelled, bearing a Hawke vpon his list. Considering, that in this Moneth, the Trees commonly begin to beare fruite. Birds flye abroad merrily, and all creatures strue to haue their best pleasures, and make loue to one another.

June, was painted, carrying a Scythe on his backe; because in this Moneth, the Medowes must be mowed downe.

July, carried a Sickle in his hand, wherewith to reape downe the ripened Come.

And because these Fruites are commonly to bee gathered in August, and then they are to be laide and lockt vp in Barres and Garners: August was figured like to a Country Carter, standing by his laden Cart, with a whip in his hand, as hastening homeward with his sheaues of Come.

September, was in the habite of a Vintager, as thereby signifying, that the beginning of Vintage is to bee in this Moneth.

October, was figured like a husband-man, carrying a Sack vpon his shoulders, and sowing Come as hee passeth along. Meaning thereby, that as this Moneth is colde and dry, so is it very apt and conuenient, for the sowing of Seede.

November, stood in the shape of a Thrasher, labouring his Flayle vpon the Come in the sheaues. He had another companion standing by him, who with a pole did beate downe the Acones from the Trees, because in this Month, Acones serue best to fatten Swine, and then also they ordinarily kill Swine, for making Bacon.

December stood in the likenesse of a Butcher, with a knife in his hand, and killing a Hog. Thus were the twelue Moneths vually figured.

As for the yeare it selfe, they made the modell thereof, in the resemblance of a Serpent, writhed into a roundle, & holding the tayle in the mouth: because the end of the yeare euermore is ioyned with the beginning.

CHAP. XXXI.

Of a strange Coniuration or Conspiracy, which happened in the goodly City of Florence, and of the slaughter which ensued thereon.

AL the World is naturally desirous to heare and vnderstand the greatest enterprizes, and such strange accidents as happen to them: to the end, that they may the better defend themselves, from falling into such inconueniences, as waite vpon inconstant and mutable Fortune. And therefore I conclud with my selfe, to relate a very rare and admirable chance, which happened in the wealthy City of Florence, and which (in mine opinion) is one that deserueth as much memorale, as any other that euer I heard of.

In the yeare, 1478. the City of Florence was in great peace, abounding (day by day) in sumptuousnesse and riches, and the affayres of the Common-wealth holding on such a prosperous course, that no imagination was so idle, as to thinke, that any misfortune had the power to alter this happinesse. In those Sun-shine dayes, the illustrious house of Medici (of whom the Duke was Cosimo, and all the Dukes of Florence to this day are descended) gouerned the said State and Common-wealth: so that all affaires passed through the hands and intelligence of the two Lords, Juliano and Laurentio de Medici.

cus, Brethren; who were highly esteemed among the people, in regard of their Ancestours, and especially for Cosimo de Medici their Grand-father, who had bene the onely and richest Merchant of Italy; although that in Florence were very wealthy Merchants beside.

Now there were (at this time) in the faide City, many other Gentlemen and rich Merchants, who thought themselves euery way as sufficient, to manage and order the Common-wealths affaires; as those that were of the house of Medici. Neuertheless, the Medici still had the great opinion, being euery day respected, hayled and louingly entertained of the people. In the ende, the house of the Pazzi, Saluati, and many other, issued of Noble and ancient Families in Florence (being moued by passion and particular affection (coupled with innatend enuy, which they bare to them of the Medici) continued a secret complot, whereby to take the Common-wealths government from the Medici. And this their intent could not be accomplished, without the death of Iuliano and Laurentio de Medici, because they were rich and potent Lords.

Francesco and Giovanni de Pazzi, Cousins-germaine to Pazzi, and chiefe men of that house, vnderooke to kill the said Brethren of the Medici, and ioyned with them the Family of the Saluati, especially Signior Francesco Saluati, Archbishop of Pisa, and they vnderooke to kill Pope Sixtus the fourth, Vncle to them of the Medici, & likewise Ferdinando, King of Naples, whom they had constrained into their league: all verily perswaded, that being rid of them, they should not meete with any resistance in the execution of their purpose.

This complot fully agreed vpon, and all things provided to fit their enterprize accordingly; the Archbishop of Pisa came to Florence, where (vnder another colour) they entred into roule a number of Soldiours, all well knowne; yet without discouering to any one, what was to be done. The Archbishop of Pisa, of whom neuer any doubt was conceived, practised such means, that a young Cardinall, Nephew to Pope Sixtus (who then studied at Bologna) should come to passe the same a while at Florence, to fittre their turne (in the action) with him and his people, yet neuer acquainting him with a thought of the intention.

Order being taken for all occasions, and euery thing kept close in the bosomes of the principall conspirators, the conclusion was thus; that the two Brethren of Medici should be slaine together, eyther in the great Church, or else where the Cardinall should heare Masse. Francesco de Pazzi, and Bernardo Bandino, tooke charge of killing the Lord Iuliano de Medici: but the death of the Lord Laurentio, was committed to Antonio de Volterra, and to another, called Stephano, being a Priest. The houre or moment, assigned by Giacomo de Pazzi, for the execution of these two murders, was at such time, as the Priests shold be at the elevation in Masse, holding the Host or Sacrifice aloft aboue his head, although the two brethren then were in diuers places.

Vpon the Sunday following, which was the third of May, 1478, this conclusion tooke effect thus. The Cardinall came to heare Masse, and with him the Lord Laurentio de Medici, without his brother. For they vsed to walke (as men suspecting ambushes) sildome or neuer together in the City, for feare of falling into any disaster together: knowing right well, that no man durst make an attempt offensively vpon them, if one of the two were left aliue. The conspirators perceiving that Lord Iuliano came not at all, Francesco de Pazzi, and Bernardo Bandino (who had sworne his death) vnder the shadow of Courtly attendance, went to come along with him from his house, and bestowed so many embrassadoes vpon him, that they brought him vnto the Church where his Brother was, and yet hee then fare farre enough off from his Brother. Conspiring eyes were still fixed on them both, enuying that they should sitte so farre asunder: but yet the time and place gaue the courage, that they might easily accomplish the acte; and yet not be persecuted by any, for few or none tooke notice of them.

The point for performance being come, Francesco de Pazzi gaue a stabbe with his poniard to the Lord Iuliano, which thwarte the stomacke, and issued forth at his shoulder, so that immediately he fel down dead: and Bernardo Bandino, by making halfe (least Lord Iuliano shold not be too slowly sped) wounded himselfe with his owne owne Dagger in the stomacke, albeit hee saw the Lord Iuliano lyde dead before him. There dyed also Francesco Nori, slaine by Bernardo Bandino, because he laid hand on his weapon, in the defence of Lord Iuliano. Antonio Volterra, and Stephano the Priest, sharply assayed the Lord Laurentio de Medici, but yet with such slender dexterity; that vnto his owne courageous defence, hee was wounded a little in the mouth, and (in despite of all they could do) by means of certaine friends, he got into the Sacristia or Vestrie, and there saued himselfe from their fury.

This assault was so sudden, that it had speedier execution, then any knowledge could be had of them that acted it: for such was the cry of the people, as if the Church had fallen to the earth. The Cardinall had worke enough to doe, to get himselfe free, and in safety to the high Altar. All the City was vp in a furious vprour; for some cryed out, that the two Brethren of Medici were slaine, & others saide no, putting themselves presently in Armes. They of the houses of Pazzi and Saluati, began aloud to cry Liberty, Liberty, so that the Seigneury resorted to the great Pallace with all diligence, where the Gonfaloniero loyning with them, they fortified themselves with armed men in the house. The Coincellors of the Citie, and such as tooke part with the Medici, went to seeke for the Lord Laurentio; conducting him home to his own house, where stood readily prepared, aboue eight thousand armed men.

As for the Archbishop of Pisa, hee pursuing on (ill the point with the Saluati, being accompanied with many of their league, and such as were the Cardinals followers; rode directly vnto the Pallace, with intent to make their meaning well liking to the Seigneury. The Lords of the Seigneury, although they tooke part with the house of Medici; yet notwithstanding they were so pressed, as they had not any leysure, for making any Armed prouision, nor to appoint a Garrison for the Pallace. Yet they knew well enough, that Lord Laurentio was not much hurt, and that he had men about him valiant & hardy.

The Archbishop perceiving, that the Seigneury had no leysure to take a resolution, in some matters that he would haue propounded to them: diuided the traine of his followers into two Companies, appointing one part of them to keep possession of the Pallace Gates. Hee, with the other company, ascended vp into the Pallace, and made it knowne to the Seigneury, that he had some what to acquaint them withall, for general benefit of the Common-wealth. Whereupon, he being admitted in, with some few of his people, that knew no part of his vile purpose: the Gates of the Pallace were made so strongly fast; that the Archbishop could haue no succor of his followers, nor the Lords of the Seigneury themselves haue any assistance. So loudly did the Archbishop deliuer his minde, speaking of matters in such vnorderly manner; that the Seigneury (well vnderstanding his bad intention) commanded the Gonfaloniero to take hold of him, as also of Giacomo Saluati, and Giacomo, the sonn of Messier Poggio de Pazzi. And so vnuly grew the tumult, that all their attendants were instantly slaine in the fury, and thirty dead bodies throwne out of the Pallace windowes, vpon the heads of them that were beneath in the Court.

Within a while after, the common people, who greatly fauoured them of the Medici, ranne in huge heapes and crowds to the Pallace: where all the other part of the Archbishops men (that had the trust of keeping the Pallace Gates) were taken and slaine presently, without any respect vsed towards them. As for the Archbishop, and his two friends with him; they were hanged in the Market-place, to cause more terrour in the rest. Giacomo de Pazzi, and diuers other of the Conspirators, rode vp and downe through the City, crying Liberty, Liberty: but perceiving none to make them answer, as leaning rather to the part of Lord Laurentio; they thought to saue themselves by flight. Onely Bernardo Bandino excepted, who lay in his bed very sicke, by paine of the wound which he had giuen himselfe; so that hee was not able to sit on horsebacke, or come come abroad out of his Chamber.

By this time the whole City was vp in Armes, to defend the cause of the Lord Laurentio, who extremely grieved, for the death of Lord Iuliano his Brother: causing seuerer pursuit after the Conspirators, so that many, who were but meerey suspected suspected in the case, could not escape, although no matter was proved against them; but no known offender could any way be spared. The young Cardinal, Nephew to the Pope, was kept prisoner in the Palace, with very great peril of his life: but at length, his innocence being truly known, he was acquitted; continuing (nevertheless) long time prisoner. Bernardo Bandino, was ledde stark naked to the Pallace, and so hanged up, next to the Archbishop. As for Antonio de Volserra, and Stephano the Priest, who should have slain the Lord Laurentio; they were trodden to death among the rude multitude, that ranne every where in the City, crying Medici, Medici, burning and pulling downe all their houses, whom they knew to be of the contrary Faction. In briefe, the disorder was such, and so confused, as it exceeded the capacity of writing; especially the furies and cruelties, committed in this horrid tempest.

Giacomo de Pazzi, was taken in his flight, & brought back to Florence: where he was hanged or strangled, and his body being cut in peeces, was after buried in prophane ground; all his lands & goods (which being of great value) were confiscated, and adjudged to the Seigneuries possession. And after condigne punishment inflicted vpon the malefactors, the body of Lord Juliano was most honourably buried, and with very solemn Funerall pompe.

Such issue had the Coniuration of the Pazzi, which was a matter very strange. For, in lesse then three houres, the Lord Juliano de Medici (an extraordinary rich man) was slain; the Archbishop of Pisa hanged, with some other of his confederates, and the houses of the aduersers partly destroyed. Pope Sixtus, and Ferdinando, King of Naples, conceived such a spleene against this action at Florence: that they (together) leuyed a powerfull Army against the Florentines, who (with the aid of their friends) defended themselves so well; that no other advantage was due to the disturbers, but that the war was long, and very cruell, great effusion of blood happening on eyther side. Behold the poore and unfortunate issue of these conspirators, who thinking to winne honour, and high degrees by indiscreete meanes: lost their liues, disloynted the peace and unity of their Country, and made their enemy much mightier then before, for Lord Laurentio de Medici gouerned Florence so long as he liued.

CHAP. XXXII.

A very remarkable and worthy History, deliuering in true and briefe discourse, the life and memorable actions of that famous Captaine, commonly called, Castruccio Castracagnio.

Affruccio Castracagnio, a Captaine of much fame and merit, in my poore opinion, may be ranked among the greatest and most renowned Captaines of the world: considering the poverty of his original, and the slender meanes he had, without the fauours of any, compared also with those strange traueses, which Fortune put vpon him. Wherein I may well say, that very few Captaines or Generals are to be found, who with so poore & imperfect furnishment; did euer reach to those honours and estates, as this our Castruccio Castracagnio attained. Wherefore, I thought it no disparagement vnto our precedent best subiects, that his History should make one among them: not purposing to vse any larger dilation therein, then already I haue obserued in the rest, because it shall suffice me, summarily to report the courage of this Captaine.

Beginning then with his original, which was very strange, you are to understand, that in Luca, a City of no meane fame in Italy, there was a Chanon belonging to the Church of S. Michael, named Messire Antonio Castracagnio, who had a sister (of his owne) living with him, being a very honest and vertuous woman. Close ioyning to this Chanons house, was a little Close or Field of Antimes, which was plentifully furnished with variety of fruitfull Trees, as is the manner vsed in Italy. The sister to this Chanon (by fortune) going one morning into this Close, to gather some Herbs for her vse, without dreeming on any such matter as after happened: as she was gathering Herbs heere

and there, heard a small voyce, as if it were of some new borne babe. And walking that way where he heard the cry; among the leanes and young bourgeoons of the Vines, was an infant laide, appearing to bee very lately before borne, tenderly crying, as desiring aide in that wofull distresse.

The good widow, somewhat sadly moued at the beginning of this aduenture, yet prouoked by a womans louing compassion: carried in the tender childe, & shewed it to the Chanon her brother, who being amazed at so strange an accident, and yet overcome with Christianlike pity, determined to prouide nursing for the Babe. And in regard that it was a manchild, hee gaue it the name of his owne Father, calling him Castruccio. When the Nurse was come, he caused it to be nourished as if it had bene his owne: & after growing to a great boy, sent him to schoole, with full intention of surrendering his Chanons place to him. But when the Lad grew to 14. yeares of age, Learning and Bookes was the least part of his care, for he was no way addicted to letters, but rather delighted in handling of a sword, and in regard that he was very aduise of body, he gaue himselfe greatly to leaping, dancing, & wrastling with other strong Lads like himself. Speaking al in a word, he was so dexterious in whatsoever he did; as none of his companions could equall him, but Castruccio became respected in euery eye.

It so fortune, that Captaine Francesco Guinigo, a man much renowned, for worthy actions of Armes performed by him in Lombardy, was then at Luca. He hearing such report of young Castruccio, & seeing him bold & brauely spirited, found meanes to haue him in his seruice. And Castruccio being now where he best desired, became (in lesse then five yeares) so expert a Souldior, as his like was not to be found, as well on horse as foot: for he could so cunningly manage any horse, that Cavalcadore of Italie hardly came neere him.

Being come to the age of 18. yeares, Captaine Guinigo, his Master, departed thence for Milaine, in aide of the Viscontines, who were in Armes against the Tourians, and many other Milaine Gentlemen. He tooke Castruccio along with him, who carried him selfe so valiant and wisely in this war; that hee bare away the fame from all the Souldiors in the Campe. This war lasted five or sixe yeares, which being ended by peace or truce; Captaine Guinigo returned to Luca, with his Castruccio, wher he was most kindly embraced by euery one, as well in general as particular, in regard of the good report noised euery where of him. So that more account was made of him, then of Guinigo his Master; for hee was so humane and courteous to euery man, that affection increased towards him daily more & more.

Within a short while after, Captaine Guinigo feeling himselfe sicke, & in some danger of death; gaue the tutelage & gouernement of Luca his sonne, to his man Castruccio. In which charge, Castruccio carried himselfe so faithfully, that so long as he liued, he had at his command the affairs of Luca, euen as if hee had bene his owne sonne. After the decease of Captaine Guinigo, the credite and reputation of Castruccio wonderfully augmented. Nevertheless, because he was very fiery, impatient and vindicative, when any wrong had bene done vnto him: the men of Luca began to grow suspicious, that he purposed to make himselfe Lord of Luca, and not without some pregnant occasion; in which respect, the Seignury commanded him to auoide the City. Which disgrace Castruccio so much distasted, that he resolved to be reuenged, euen with the ruine and confusion of his headstrong enemies. At this very time, the Factions of the Guelphes and Gibelines reigned powerfully in Italy; and euen the alio, the lord Hugo Fagiuola was in some command, who being possessed of the Seignury of Pisa; Castruccio practised (by intimation) to compass grace & fauour with this Lord Fagiuola, & therefore comploted with the Gibelines, to make Figiuola Lord of Luca. Working this traine on secretly, he preuailed so well with some of his friends in the City: that (at an appointed instant) he won a Port of Luca. By means whereof, the Gibelines entred, with such succor as the Lord Fagiuola had giuen them, expelling thence the Guelphes, after they had done their very utmost they could.

Castruccio was now in greater esteeme the cuer, & in such fort, as he was held to be the Lord of Luca, although he was inferior to the lord Fagiuola, to who he made recourse in times of necessity. The Florentines, who deadly despised Castruccio, vnderstanding the successe of his affairs; leuyed a great Army, by helpe of such as were in league with the, purposing to ouer-run Castruccio.

The Florentines sought the death of Castruccio.

But Lord Fagiola and Castruccio, disposed so well for the meeting with them, that the warre grew to be very cruell & bloody. Concerning men of name in the Florentines Campe, there was among them Don Pedro, Brother to Robert, King of Naples, accompanied with Don Carolo his Nephew, sonne to Phillip. But the vertue of Lord Fagiola and Castruccio, served wel to counterpoise the greatnes of the other. After that this war had continued for some space of time, the Lord Fagiola received intelligence, that there had happened a great commotion at Pisa, in redresse whereof, Lord Fagiola was faine to leave the Armies conduct wholly to Castruccio, who behaved himselfe so wisely and valiantly in this great trust, that after many sallies and light skirmishes, hee came to battaile with the Florentines. Castruccio maintained the fight with such good order and iudgement, that (although he was the most oblitinate mā that euer was born in Italy) yet notwithstanding, the victory remained to him, and the slaughter was so great, that there were slaine above tenne thousand Florentines, among whom, Don Pedro and Don Carolo his Nephew, were found in number with the dead. Which victory, assured to the Lord Fagiola, all those estates (held by him) in farre better security, and enlarged the credite and reputation of Castruccio, beyond all common expectation.

Winter being come, Castruccio returned to Luca, by the command of Lord Fagiola, towards whom he showed himselfe very obedient. But, as it is a custome, that wealth and great honors doe cause feare and enuy: so the Lord Fagiola, perceiving the credite of Castruccio to encrease daily more and more: determined his death, in recompence of all the worthy seruices he had done him. To effect this dishonourable businesse; he sent one of his sonnes to Luca, who caused Castruccio to be committed prisoner, vnder pretence, of some secret blame imposed vpon him. But the imprisonment of Castruccio was so offensive to the Lucanes; that the people began to mutiny against their Lord Fagiola: who having advertised thereof, left Pisa, and marched thither with a potent Army.

The Lucanes revolt from Lord Fagiola.

But there hapned to him a very strange accident, and yet no more then hee iustly deserued for his vnmanly dealing. When the Pisanes were advertised, that Castruccio was deteined as a prisoner, they began so to stomacke the matter, that they flew the Gouernor, whom Lord Fagiola had left as his Deputy, and all such as were to do him any seruice; so that they enfranchized themselves from the tyranny of Fagiola. He receiving intelligence of this mishap, and that (by this meanes) his returne to Pisa was bard vp against him: pursued on his purpose, to make all sure and safe at Luca. But therein he proued likewise as vnfortunate as at Pisa, for the Pisanes had informed the Lucanes of their affaires, and with such speedy diligence; that the Poste fro the Pisanes arrived at Luca, much sooner then the Lord Fagiola could do.

The Gouernor of Pisa slaine by the people, and intelligence sent by them to the Lucanes

Heereupon, the Lucanes put them in Armes, so that they expulled the sonne of Fagiola out of Luca, with absolute purpose, of allowing no entrance to the Father; but gaue freedom to Castruccio, in meere delight of him. Yet some say, that Fagiola entred Luca, & very quickly was expelled thence; when losing all hope of recovering his estates, he was glad to saue himselfe by flight into Lombardy. But be it howe euer, thus I am sure of, that hee lost his dominion ouer both the Cities in one day: which he might safely haue enioyed stil, if he had but kept faire friendship with Castruccio: who being thus set at liberty, was elected Capitaine and General of the Lucanes, by free consent of the whol Seignury. In which authority he being loath to lye idle, leuyed a grear Army, where-with hee recovered many strong Holds from the Florentines, which they had long vsurped from the Lucanes: taking diuers other of their owne beside, in despite of their best Forces, albeit they were strong indeed. Castruccio returning then to Luca, was there most honourably welcomed in regard of his worthy victories obtained, and created absolute Lord of Luca. From which time forward, hee became much feared of the neighbours round about, especially the Florentines, who were the most powerfull in all Tuscany. For, he had many wars against them, and tooke many Ports and Castles from them, yea, and ouerthrew them in a plaine field of Battaille, equally appointed on either side.

The Lucanes rise in Armes against Fagiola, and exclude him from Luca Castruccio made General of Luca by common consent.

He was created sole Lord of Luca, and became much dreaded.

As thus the fortunes of Castruccio grew daily better and better, the Emperor Fredericke

ricke came into Italy, to be crown'd Emperor there: wher being entrusted of the many good parts remaining in Castruccio, hee laboured greatly to win him to his seruice. Castruccio then leauing Pagola Guimigo (of whom hee had thus long bene Tutor) as his Lieutenant to gouern Luca; went to see the Emperor Frederick, whom hee followed so far as Rome. Some hold, that hee came thither before the Coronation; but, after the Emperors return into Germany, Castruccio preuailed so well by good means, that they of Pisa chose him to be their Prince. Which newes being brought to Rene, King of Naples (his old heauy enemy) he bega to grow doubtfull of Castruccio, and perceiving his power to encrease so greatly: hee made a league with the Florentines against Castruccio, intending now to see the viter ruine of him, and recovery of all the honors appertaining to him.

Heereupon, the King of Naples & the Florentines prepared a strong army, which was so manfully encountered by Castruccio; that euermore hee had the better of the, although with great expence of blood, and recovery of many places from them: so that the Florentines were meerey enforced, to craue a truce for certaine time; during which respite, Castruccio largely increased his power. For, as they of Pistorium were in diffirence one with another within the Towne: Castruccio shouldred in (during their ciuill diffention) and possessed himselfe of Pistorium, and all other places subiect to that City.

The Florentines seeing themselves more and more in daily dangers, endeuoured by all the best meanes they could deuise, to gather people from all parts, onely to breake the Forces of Castruccio, or else to driue him out of Pistorium. In which respect, the supplies which came to them, as well from the Kingdome of Naples, as other places more remote, were so great, that vpon the mufters account, they were numbered to be 40000. men. Seeing then, that they had so goodly an Army, they began their march directly towards Pistorium, where Castruccio had his Campe, consisting of far fewer people then the Florentines. Neuertheless, hee guided his war so wisely, vsing so many surprisals, skirmishes and encounters, that successe attended vpon him continually.

In the end, conning to the day of battaile, he proceeded therein with such good order, that hee vanquished the Florentines: in which ouerthrow was great slaughter made, and store of rich booty taken, for all the chieftest of the Florentines were eyther slaine, or taken prisoners. Castruccio himselfe being wounded, and a great number of his men slaine; yet all this could not a iote daunt his courage, but still hee pursued vpon his victory, marching in all haste with his Army against Parma, which hee tooke very speedily, as also all the Castles and Townes thereabout. So that (without any resistance) hee went and placed his Campe within two miles of Florence, whereat the Florentines were not a little amazed.

As hee was essaying all meanes for his entrance into Florence, hee received advertisement, that the Pisanes were praefising some matter to his disadvantage: so that, leaving his intent for Florence, he returned to Pisa a triumphant Conqueror. After hee had inflicted punishment vpon the mutiners, he went to visite all the neighbouring parts, taking order for all needfull occasions becomming warre: because hee was well assured, neuer to continue long in peace, without some employment for warre.

The Florentines, mightily confounded by their peoples ouerthrow, and losse beside of so many Towns: freely gaue themselves to the King of Naples, promising him a yearly tribute of two hundred thousand Crownes. The King of Naples accepted the Florentines offer, and sent Don Carolo his sonne to their assistance, with the most part of the Caualery and Infantery that hee could command; and the like did some other Cities of Italy, who stood all in feare of Castruccio's Forces: so that now the Army of the Florentines consisted of tenne thousand horse, and thirty thousand foot. With this powerfull preparation (perswading themselves, that Castruccio durst not come into the field) they intended to besiege Pisa; but Castruccio, who was one of the most valiant & politique Generals, that the whole world then afforded, went forth to meete them, attended only with 4000. horse, and 20000. foote, but all in excellent Military order. As these two Camps began to draw neere each other, there passed diuers skirmishes in the plaine field, wherein continually Castruccio had the best. Finally, Castruccio seeking opportunity, to deliuer battaile to the Florentines: passed ouer the Foord at the Riuer of Arno, and found the Florentines in such disorder, as he compelled the to accept the battell, wherein was a great

CHAP. XXXIII.

A Discourse concerning the Windes: And of their severall names, as well Ancient, as Moderne.

HE Windes, according as Seneca saith, are very meete and necessary for the spacious Vniuersē; to conferre the temperature of Heauen and Earth; to disperse and scatter raines and myls; and to helpe the Trees in producing their Fruits. Nature also gaue them creation, to be the meanes of mens Nauigation, whereby they might communicate together the goods of the earth: so that Regions which are fertile in some particular things, may impart them to other that are not so well provided. In briefe, the Windes do cause an infinity of commerces among men, which my intended breuity will not spare me to speake of.

Onely I haue propounded to my selfe, to shew how many Windes there are, what they are, whence they come, and how they are: wherein I am perswaded, that some benefit will redownd to diuers persons, especially to such as professe sayling on the Seas. To vnderstand then, what the Winde is, I will not relye on diuersity of opinions; in such as haue written thereon: but following Aristotle, and the most common iudgment of the wise, I say, that the Winde is a vapour and exhalation hot and dry, drawne vp into the Ayre by vertue of the Sunne. And being driuen aloft by his heate and lightnesse, proceeding on into the middle Region of the Ayre, which is alwayes coldest, cometh to be repulged by that contrary quality. So that being vnable to mount any higher, it breaketh forth into blasts whether it can go, & being hindered of descending downe, in regard of lightnesse is constrained to tosse and tumble here & there in the Ayre, eyther more or lesse, according to the strength of the matter wherof it is caused. So that the definition of Seneca is not warrantable, who saith, That the Winde is nothing else, but the Ayre mooued, without any other matter: because these are the exhalations and vapors, which stir and moue the Ayre; for, after they are consumed, the winde ceaseth.

Castruccio his victory ouer the Florentines, and the means to haue made a further conquest.

Castruccio, the fickle of a Quotidian Feauer, and dyed within seuen dayes following.

The Authors farewell to the endless memory of Castruccio Carcagno.

slaughter on both sides, but yet the victory fell to Castruccio; twenty thousand Florentines being slain in the field, beside two thousand prisoners taken: among whom was Don Carolo, sonne to the King of Naples, and many other Commanders of name. And assuredly (without all question to the contrary) considering this last great victory, which Castruccio had against the Florentines: he might not onely haue conquered Florence it selfe, but likewise no meane part of Italy beside.

But here may bee apparantly obserued, how weake and feeble the strength of man is; for a Glasse is no sooner crackt & shiuerd, then a mans best might, when Gods assistance giueth him ouer. Castruccio, following his fortune vpon the spur, and hauing made the surprisall before remembred; rode coasting along the Riuer of Arno like a worthy General, to rallire all his people together. And being fore wearied and ouer-sweated, (for he had fought all the day) the fresh coole-nesse, or dampe of the Riuer smote him inwardly, that the night following, he fell into a Quotidian Feauer, whereof (no doubt as God had appointed) he dyed on the seuen day after, being then in the very flower of his time.

Surely, had this Castruccio bene a Native of Rome, or Athens, as he was of Lucca, where he was borne, without knowledge of Father or Mother; Or had he bene brought vp in the Kings Court of Macedon: he had greatly blemished the renown of Scipio, Philip, yea, and Alexander the Great. Notwithstanding (a Lucane borne as he was) had hee liued a longer date of yeares, which his youth and ableness made faire promise of: hee had equalled any of them in richnesse of fame. But returning to our History, Castruccio made Pagola Guiniguo his heire; albeit some say, that he had Children of his owne, whom he instructed to bee his heyres. But be it howsoeuer, as he got his estate & wealth by manhood and valour: his successfull loss all by lewdesse and negligence, if we may credite Aretine, Blondus, Tominus & Macchiavell.

As concerning their names, our reuerend Ancients imposed such vpon them, as corresponded with the parts and Regions of the world, from whence they came. Neuerthelesse, Antiquity neuer acknowledged so many windes, as haue bene since those times. For, according as Plinie, Anlus Gellius, Vegetius, Homer and other auncient Poets say, no other mention was made, but of foure windes onely, which came from the foure parts or quarters of the world, viz. East, West, North and South; those are the parts or quarters most remarkable that can be obserued throughout the world. For, as David and Lucan say; Hence cometh day, and thence cometh night.

According then vnto this proportion, our auncient Latines termed Subolanus, the winde that came from the East Equinoctiall: The Greekes called it Apeliotes, or Eurus: In Italy and Spain, they call it Leuante; and French Marriners terme it Eiff. Now, for the right winde belonging to Sunne-setting, which is opposite and contrary to the precedent: the Greekes called it Zephyrus, that is, Blowing: for it makes all plants to flourish: The Latines named it Fauonius: And the Italians and Spaniards call it Ponente: But our French Marriners call it Ouest. And yet some others say, that the word Zephyrus significeth couching or setting. The third winde was called by the Latines Septentrio, in regard of seauen Starres, which turne or wheele about the North-Starre. By the same reason the Greekes called it Apparetias, or Boreas; the Italians terme it Tramontana; the Spaniards Norte brisa; and the French do giue it the title of Nort. The fourth winde, which is opposite to the North, the Latines termed Auster, euen as if they would haue called it a Water-driuer, for that this winde is often rainy; which made the Greekes to call it Notus, that is, warriish, or moist. The Italians name it Mezzodis; the Spaniards Abrego far, and Pendenzal; and the French, Sud.

Thus you see as concerning the foure windes, whereof only speake Homer, and Ouid in his Metamorphosis: But (with much more respect and reuerence) let vs yet say, that our blessed Lord and Saviour makes mention of the foure windes, speaking of the last day of Iudgement, both in Saint Mathew and Saint Marke, where he sayth: That hee will send his Angels with troupes, to assemble his Elect from the foure windes.

Now, as touching the qualitie of the foure windes, we will make some relation thereof, in discoursing on other subternate windes. Since the time of Homer, we find an addition of foure other windes to the former, as assigning (between the Leuant or East, and the Mezzodi, or South) a winde which the Latines call Vulturnus, because this winde whisteth like the wing of a Vulture, when he dislodgeth. The Greekes do terme it Eurus; and some call it vulgarly in Italian Leuante, or Siroc, or Sueff.

The other winde which rayseth it selfe from the place, where the Sunne mounteth at mid lunc, hath no name amongst the Latines. Notwithstanding, some call it Arctus, or Hellefonticus, because it cometh from the coast of the Hellefonticke Sea. Our Marriners call it Grec, or Nordest. Gellius and Vegetius, attribute thereto the name of Aquilo, which neuerthelesse is the name of another winde.

The other winde is iustly betweene the North and the West, and cometh from that Region, where the Sunne setteth in winter, and is called by the Latines Africus, because (in regard of Rome) this winde cometh directly from Africa. The Greekes called it Lybe, because they entitle Gyneya to be Lybia: Our Italians terme it Lybechio, the French and Spaniards Souest, or Garbin.

The other winde is iustly betweene the North and the West, and cometh from the place where the Sunne coucheth him selfe in broad day. Some call it Aus, or Cancro. The Greekes called it Argestes, as much to say, as full of rayes. His impetuouesnesse is called Apix, because it cometh from a quarter of Italy, so called: Others giue it the name of Olympick. Our Italians title it Mesfrail, the French & Spaniards doe rearme it Nort-ouest. These are the eight severall windes, whereof Anlus Gellius and Pitruinius, maketh mention of.

Moreouer, Andronicus the Athenian Philosopher, builded a Tower at Athens, with eight angles or corners of Marble, & at every angle was figured the Image of a Winde, which blew against the faide angle. On the top of the same Tower, was fixed a Triton of gold (reputed to be the God of the Sea) holding a Rodde in his hand. And this Triton was compoſed in ſuch artificiall fort, that he turned ſtill with euery winde; like as the Vaynes or weather-flags vpon Caſtles or ſtately houſes now adays do ſhewing, or pointing ſtill with his Rod, from whence the winde came, and where it reigned or domineered.

Four more added to the former eight, and in what ſeueral places they are deſcribed to be.

Ouer and beſide the forenamed eight windes, there were yet added foure more, to make vp iuſt the number of twelue: placing two windes on this ſide, and beyond the North, which is the high North, and two other on both ſides of the South, which is the right winde for the South. That on the right ſide of the Tramontana or North, betweene that and the winde Cafius, they called Aquilo; in regard of his impetuous bluſtering, which is more ſudden, then the wing of the ſweeteſt Faulcon that is or can bee. The Greekes alſo called it Boreas, in reſpect of the great noiſe it maketh when it bloweth: ſome other tearme it Mefes. The other winde, which is on the ſide of the couchant or Sun-ſetting, betweene the Tramontana & the winde Cancro, was cald by the Greekes Thraſſias; Seneca giueth it no name at all in Latine; neuertheleſſe, there are ſome who name it Circius, or Cirrus; the Chattiſians call it Galego.

Two other windes oppoſite to the former. A South and by Eaſt winde

The other two windes are alſo oppoſite to theſe beere related, whereof the one commeth from the entrance to the right winde of the South, and the Region where the Sunne hideth himſelfe in Winter, which alſo is called Euro auſter, or Euronorus. Ariſtotele reporteth, that (in his time) in Affrica they vſed to call it Phe-nicias. The other winde plainly is betweene the direct winde of the South and the Garbin or Su-weſt: in which reſpect they call it Lybonorus, or Lybonuſter. And theſe are the twelue Windes, according to the foure Regions of the World.

A South and by Weſt winde

Ariſtotele, in his Booke of Heauen & the World, and in his Meteors, maketh mention of the Windes; but he neither assigneth to them any names, or number. Pliny notwithstanding, Seneca and Pegetius doe make mention of twelue; as the like alſo is done by our moderne Aſtroggers and Cosmographers, as namely Orontius, Apianus, Gemma-Friſius, Hen-

cus Glareanus, Stoſſerinus, Ioannes Beremus, Ioannes Fernellus, Robertus Valturinus, and many more beſide. Vitruuius neuertheleſſe, after he hath assigned the eight principal Windes to their Regions: doth yet giue two ſubakernate Windes to each of the other Windes; ſo that (by his account) there ſhould be foure and twenty Windes.

Four more windes granted by Vitruuius.

Notwithſtanding, to enſtruct our better apprehenſion of the Windes, he preſuppoſeth three Circles, whereof one ſerueth for the opinion of foure Windes, the other is for that of eight, and the laſt for that of twelue. Hee ſetteth downe (beſide) the names of the Windes, according as Marriners (and eſpecially the Spaniards) haue ſiled them. Yet (in the mean while) it is to be obſerued, that the windes are alwayes conformed, to the qualities of the Regions from whence they come.

Three Circles allotted to the windes.

For the three Orientall or Eaſt-windes, that is to ſay, Subſolanus, Caciat, and Vulturinus, are hot and dry: whereas contrariwiſe, Zephyrus and his neighbors, which come from the Weſt or Sun-ſet, are colde and moiſt: becauſe the abſence of the Sunne, maketh the Regions colde where thoſe windes blow. As is eaſily diſcerned by the night time, which is euermore colde, as alſo by places ſubiection to ſhades, that are (ordinarily) coole and freſh. From the ſame cauſe proceedeth humidity; for, as heate in the day time dryeth the Eaſterne windes: ſo on the contrary, moiſture increaſeth in the nights cooleneſſe.

The conformity of the windes to their Regions

The difference betweene day and night times.

As for the three Septentrionall or Northern Windes, they are colde and dry: becauſe they come from colde Regions, & they haue their rayes writhed and wrinkled. Their coldnes alſo cauſeth drineſſe, which they borrow of the eaſtern windes, that are their neighbours: and yet they can take no moiſture from the Occidentall or Weſterne windes, becauſe their drought and humidity are directly contrary.

Of the Northernly windes

Come we now to the Meridionall or Southerly Windes, they are hot & moiſt: becauſe they deriue their warmth from hot Regions, comming from where the Sunne heateth downe right: with this addition moreover, that they are neighbors to the Eaſt windes, which are hot. Concerning their humidity, they draw it from the Modernes Aſtroggers & Cosmographers.

the Weſterne windes, and vapours both of the Sea and Land. In Mountayn Regions, charged with Snowes, the Southerly winde may there get his moiſture, as the like hee doth in fenny and muddy places: euen as drineſſe may be cauſed by Plaines and champaigne grounds, ſo that they may be charged in the occurrences, according to the qualities of the windes. Here we are to obſerue, that in every Region, the three windes comming thence, are all of one quality, & produce the ſame effects, which cauſe other effects (great or ſmall) according to ſuch as they happen to meete withall.

Occurrences in charge, commonly the qualities of the windes

The Eaſt winde the moſt healthfull of all; it rell.

It is in Cuius blood.

It reſteth now to ſpeake of the particular qualitie belonging to each winde. Beginne wee then with the right Eaſt winde, which is the moſt healthfull of all. For it is ſubtile and pure, and partaketh more with choller, then his companions. His neighbour, blowing againſt the South, is more moiſt; and farre more furious then the former, and chargeth the ayre with cloudes. Ariſtotele ſayeth, that when this winde bloweth, all things do ſeeme more great and groſſe, then they are indeede. The right winde of the South, cauſeth raines and tempeſts, it troubleth the ayre with cloudes, procuring peſtilence and corruption. The winde Garbin, which is neighbor to the right Weſt, is very tempeſtue, according vnto Virgill. But the Oueſt or Weſt winde, increaſeth ſleugme, and procureth thunders: it beginneth to blow, at the firſt appearing of the Spring. The direct Tramontana, which we call the right North winde, cauſeth colde and froſt, it burneth floures and fruites, and purifieth a corrupted ayre. Now, in regard it ſhuteth and locketh vp the pores in mens bodies; this winde is helde very apt for health. As much may be ſayde of the other Septentrionall windes, which are his conſorts or companions.

It is to be held then for a concluſion, that theſe windes proceede from vapours and hote exhalations, and that (in al) there are twelue: without depending vpon other allegories, assigned to ſome infant windes. The Spaniards hold for principal windes, thoſe foure which come from the foure parts of the world, to wit, Eaſt, Weſt, North and South. As for the other foure, they tooke their names from them precedent: for the North-eaſt is betweene the North and Eaſt winde: that which is betweene the Sunne-ſet and the South, is alſo called South-weſt, and the other betweene the Eaſt and South, is alſo termed South-eaſt; theſe are their ſeueral nominations.

The full concluſion for the number of the windes, & them that are allowed to be betweene each of them.

Afterward, eight other were talked of, which are equally bi-parted betweene the former eight, being termed Collateral, ſide or middle windes. As that which is betweene the North and the North-eaſt, was called North-North-eaſt: The other which is betwixt the Eaſt and the North, is called by the Spaniards Zefir-deſt, and by French Martiners, North-eaſt; that which is betweene the South and South-eaſt, is called South-South-eaſt; and the other betweene Eaſt and South eaſt, is named Eaſt-South-eaſt. The other betweene South-weſt and Eaſt, is termed Weſt-South-Weſt; and ſo of the other in the ſame diſtinguiſhing: ſo that fixteene Windes are equally diſtributed ouer the Earth. Some adde other fixteene Windes beſide, which they tearme Quarter windes, by which allowance, wee ſhould then haue two and thirty windes: but theſe latter borrowe all their names of their neighbours. Thus much therefore may ſerue for all the Windes.

Of the Great Province of Moscouia: As also the Manners, Religion, and Power, of the Prince there Ruling. Divided into five severall Tractes.

CHAP. I.

In this first Tract, is contained a Cosmographical description of the whole Countrey, the Climate and Soyle. Also what Shires or Regions are therein contained. What Commodities the severall parts of the land yeeldeth: And then a breefe Collection, of the principall Cities and Townes in Moscouia or Russia.

The city Moscou, or Moscouia.

Moscouia from time called Sarmatia.

Princes brethren divided the North parts between them.

Moscouia or Russia, is a great northerly Region, containing more then six hundred leagues in length. The principall Citie thereof, being called Mosca, or Moscouia, greater then the City Paris in France, and seated on the River Mosqua. I read also, that this Countrey was (sometimes) called Sarmatia, and came to vary or change from the name, by calling it selfe Russia, as beeing parted or divided into sundry small, yet absolute Regiments, or shires, according, or being in subjection one to another.

Some of their Writers doe affirme, that the North partes of the Countrey, chanced to bee divided betweene foure Brethren, whose names were Trubor, Kurico, Sinees, and Parinus, and in that coun-trei Language, when they speak the word Russia, it implyeth as much, as to part or diuide. They auouch likewise, that foure other persons made the like partition of the South parts, as Kio, Scieko, Choranus, and a Sister of theirs, named Libeda; and euery one termed his Province or Territory, according vnto his owne particular name: and so from this their diuision, the Countrey came to be called Russia, about the yeare of our Lord eight hundred and sixty.

At such time as it was called Sarmatia, it consisted of two peculiar Diuisions: Namely, the Blacke and White. White Sarmatia contained all that portion that lyeth towards the North, and on the side of Liffeland, which Provinces are now termed Wyyna, Pagh, Volagda, Cargapolia, Nowogradia, &c. Nowogradia being the chief and Metropolitane City of them all. The Blacke Sarmatia contained all the country Southward, towards the black or Euxine Sea, with the Dukedome of Volodomer of Mosco, Resan, &c. It is bounded Northward by the Lappes and the north Ocean: On the Southside by the Tartars, called Chrymes: Eastward they haue the Nagaias Tartar, who possesseth all the country of the East side of the Volga, toward the Caspian Sea: On the west and South-west border, lye Lituania, Litonia, and Polonia.

All the Countrey being brought to the obedience of one Governour, do comprehend these cheefe Shires or Pro-

ces. Volodomer (which beareth the first place in the Emperors stile, because their house came first of the Dukes of that Countrey) Mosko, Nisnouograd, Plaska, Smolensko, Nowograd Velica (or Nowograd of the Low countries) Rostone, Tarnuslane, Belosera, Resan, Wyyna, Cargapolia, Meschora, Pagh, Pjuga, Ghaletsa. These are the shires naturally belonging to Moscouia or Russia, but farre greater and larger then the Shires of England; albeit I cannot say that they are so well peopled. The other Countreies or Provinces, which the Emperors haue wonne by power, and more lately annexed to their former Dominion, follow by these names. Twerra, Tonghorla, Permia, Padsha, Boulghoria, Chernigo, Oudoria, Oldoria, Condora, beside a great part of Siberia, where the people, (though they are not naturall Russians) obey the Emperor of Russia or Moscouia, being gouerned by his Countrey Lawes, paying Taxes and Customes, euen as his owne people doe.ouer and beside all which, the Kingdomes of Casan and Astracan (not long since obtained by conquest) are vnder his command.

Concerning all his possessions in Lituania (to the number of thirtie great Townes, and more) with Narne & Dorp in Liuania: they are quite gone from him, beeing (of late yeares) surprized by the Kings of Poland and Sweden. The fore-named Provinces or Shires, are all reduced into foure Iurisdiccions, tearmed by them Chetfyrds, as much to say, as Tetrarchies or fourth-parts, whereof wee shall haue more occasion to speake hereafter.

The whole countrey is of great length and bredth: for, from the North vnto the South (measuring from Cola to Astracan, leaning somewhat Eastward) containeth in length about foure thousand two hundred sixty miles, which they terme versh. And yet the Emperor hath more extensure Northward, farre beyond Cola, euen to the River of Tromschina, which runneth a thousand versh or miles beyond Pechinga, neere to Wardbouffe, yet not intire nor clearly limited, because the kings of Sweden and Denmarke, hauing diuers Townes there, as well as the Russes, are plotted together, the one with the other, all of them laying claime to those whole North-parts as their owne peculiar right. As for the Countreies bredth, from that part of the Territory lying farthest Westward on the Narne side, to the Eastward parts of Siberia, where the Emperors Garrisones are kept, is counted forty four thousand versh or miles, or thereabout. They holde a Versh to be a thousand paces, yettlesse (by a quarter) then an English Mile. If the whole Dominion of the Russian Emperour were all habitable, and peopled in all places; he would either hardly hold it all within one Gouernment, or bee too potent for all his neighboring Princes.

To speake somewhat of the Soile and Climate, for the most part it consisteth of a slight sandy mould, yett differing farre in one place from another; for yeelding such things as the earth affordeth: Concerning the Countrey Northward, vnto the parts of Saint Nicholas and Cola, and North-East towards Siberia; it is all verie barren, and full of desert woodes, by reason of the Clymate, and extremitie of the cold in winter.

In like manner, along the riuer Volga, betweene the Countreies of Casan and Astracan, where, though the soyle is fruitful, yett it is vn-inhabited: except on the west side of the riuer Volga, where the Emperour hath some few Castells, and garrisones in them. But this is occasioned by the Chrim Tartar, who will neyther himselfe plant Townes to dwell there (as delighting in an extrauagant and wilde kinde of life) nor yett suffer the Russes (who is farre off with the strength of his Countrey) to people those parts.

From Volagda, which lieth well-neare seauen thousand versh from the Port of Saint Nicholas, downe toward Mosko, and so towards the South Port, bordering vpon the Chrim, containing the like space of 1700. versh: it is a very pleasant and fruitfull Countrey, yeelding pasture and corne, with woodes and waters in great plentie. The like is betweene Resan (lying South-east from Mosko) to Nowograd and Volsko, the which reacheth furthest towards the mountains: So betweene Mosko and Smolensko (lying South-west towards Lituania, is a very pleasant and fruitfull soyle.

To obserue the whole Countrey, maketh a great difference from it selfe, in regard of the yeares course, vrging a strange alteration, betweene Winter and Summer in Russia. All the Countrey lyeth in Winter,

The extreame freezing cold of the country

Divers frozen to death with cold in Markets and frequented streets and traueellers on their Sleds

An admirable summer time in Moscouia.

Winter vnder snow, which falleth there continually, containing (sometime) two yardes in thickenesse, and yet farre greater towards the North: the Riuer and Waters being all frozen ouer a yard and more in depth of crust, how broad or swift in current fouer they bee, continuing so commonly for the space of sixe months; as from the beginning of November, vntill it draw towards the end of March, and then the Snowes begin to melt.

Well may we iudge of the ayres sharpnesse there; because Water dropping downe, or throwne vp into the Aire, freezeth to Ice before it can fall to the ground. And let a man hold a dish or pot of pewter in his hand, during the extremitie of Winter (except in some chamber where the warme Stouaes are) and his fingers will freeze fast vnto it, euen to tearing the skin off at the parting with it. And let a man go out of a warme room into a cold, he shall sensibly feeble his breath to grow sticke, euen as stifling with the cold, drawing it in, and vrging it forth.

Many haue bene noted, not onely such as trauaile abroad, but others in the frequented Markets, and common streetes of Townes, to bee mortally pinched, and meerey killed with colde. So that diuers haue bene scene to droppe downe dead in the streetes, and many traueylers are brought into the Townes, sitting stiffe and dead in their Sleds: yea, some haue lost their noses, the tips of their eares, the balles of their cheekes, their verie Toes, fectes, &c. Many times, when Winter is very hard and violent, Beares & Volues haue come (by huge troopes) out of the woods, as enforced thereto by meer hunger, and entering into Townes and Villages, haue rent and torne what fouer they could finde or meete withall, whereby the inhabitants were enforced to flight, onely for safety of their liues.

But when the Sommer is come, neuer was scene a more fresh and delicate countrey, the woods (consisting most of Firre and Birch) being so sweet and lusty; the Pastures and Meddowes so greene and well growne, yea and vpon a fodaine, such variety of flowers, such harmonie of Birdes (chiefely of Nightingales, whose notes seeme more loud and variable, then in other countries) that no man can lightly trauaile in a more delightfull countrey. From the fresh and speedy growth of the Spring there, the snow gueth no meane reason of opinion, because all winter time it seemeth as mantled in a white Luerie, which keepeth it warme clothed all winter while, till Spring time, and then the Suns heat dissolueth it to water. All which, do so sweetly sympathize with the ground, bestowing on it such sufficient drenching and foaking (being of a slight and sandie mould, chearing it againe with the sunnes reuerberating brightnesse) that it produceth quickly all hearbes and plants in extraordinary abundance. So that, as winter there superaboundeth in colde, Sommer answeres it with so much the more heate: chiefly in Iune, Iuly, and August, it equalling then the best ayres in any other Countrey.

Commig nowe to speake of the Riuer, the first is the famous Volga, whose head or Spring ariseth at an Alder-trees roote, some two hundred Verst beyonde Tarufane. It entrench into such gignes by the entercourse of other riuers byring into it; that in some places it extendeth in bredth a mile and more, till at length it falleth into the Caspian sea, by estimation neere 2800. Verst or miles in length. Boristhenes is the second, called now Nepes: diuiding the country from Lithuania, and thence hauing his course into the Buxine Sea. Tanaus, otherwise termed Don (bounding anciently betwene Asia and Europ) seemeth to haue his rising out of the Rezan Ozers, passing thorough the Chrim Tartares Countrey, till hee makes his fall into the Sea-lake, or great Meare, neere to the Cittie of Azon, called Mastis. Report runneth among the Russes, that from their cheefe City of Moscou, euen to Constantinople, and so into all those parts of the world; men may easily make passage by this Riuer. But then the convey Boate must bee drawne ouer a little Himmi, some fewe Verstes thwartwise, as prooue was not long since made of.

Dnyma, being many hundred Miles in length, must bee remembered amongst the rest, falling North into the Bay of Saint Nicholas, and on the Sea-side it hath great Rockes of Alabaster vpon each banke. Dnna emptieth it selfe into the Balticke Sea, neere to the town of Riga. And then is Omaga, which some ninetie Verst from the port of Saint Nicholas, hath his downfall into the Bay at Solouesko. Not far beneath Cargopolia, this riuer meeteth with another, called Polocke, which by Tama (a small Towne, droppeth into the Finland Sea. Into which Sea, from Saint Nicholas Port, and so into the Sound, the Russes easily passe by water.

Suchana is another, which flowing into Dnyma, runneth on into the North sea. As for Ocka, his head commeth from the Chrim borders, streaming on into Volga. And Mosena glideth thorough the Cittie Mosco, borrowing his name thereof. Wichida likewise is a very long and spacious riuer, rising out of Perma, and falling into the Volga. So much for these memorable riuers in this country.

We come now to speak of those fruits as Moscouia yeeldeth, which are in diuers kinds; as Apples, Peares, Plums, Cherries red and blacke, but the black ones are wilde. Then haue they a Deene, which is like to a Musk Mellon, but much more sweeter and delicious. Also Cucumbers, Gourdes (which they tearme Arbous), Raspes, Straw-berries, and Hurtleberries; beside many other in great plenty; for euerie Woodde and hedge is well stored with them.

But if you demand of their Corne and Graine, they haue Wheate, Rye, Barley, Oates, Pease, Buckway, Pinnyth, which resemble Rice in taste. The Countrey is fountaining in these Graines, that it can allow a large ouer-plus quantity: for Wheate is sometime there solde for two Altens the Chetfird, valewing ten pence sterling, and the measure amounteth well neere to three Bushels.

Concerning seasons of Husbandrie, Rye is there sowne before Winter, and all other graine in the Spring time. Such as dwell farre off in the North, and deserte places, as the Permians, the partes more Southward do furnish them: being constrained yet (sometimes) to make Bread of a Rotte called Pughnoy, and of the middle rind of the Firre tree, when any dearth hapneth.

Natiue commodities yeelded by the Countrey are many, and of good worth, for seruice of the peoples best expectation, and benefitting the Emperor, by venting them abroad in the World: for the colde of the Climate (being a naturall inconvenience) by Gods great goodnesse, is therein much remedied. Their cheefe Fures are Blacke Fox, Sables, Lufenes, Dun-fox, Martrones, Gumtalles or Armines, Lasets or Minceur, Beuer, Wulnerins, being the skinne of a great water-Rat, that smelleth naturally like Muske; Calaber or greene Squirrel, red Squirrel, red and white Fox, what plentie of these are spent in the Countrey (because the people weare Fures all the winter time) is almost incredible. And yet the Merchants some yeares, transport thence, to the valew of foure or fise hundred thousand Rubbles, to Turkie, Persia, Bonigharia, Georgia, Armenia, with some other of Christendome.

In the Countreys of Pechora, Mongoforsia, Obdarsky, and other places, do the best Sable fures growe; and the worser in Siberia, Perm, and such like places. The blacke Foxe and red come from Siberia; as from Pechora the white and Dun; the Volues and Beares skins (both being white) come also thence. Perm yeildeth the choyest Wuluerin, and the best Martrones come from Syberia, Cadam, Morum, Perm and Cazan. Gallets & Onigles send out the best Lufenes, Minuier, and Eruines: yet some come from Nogrod and Perm; and Murmonky by Cola hath the best breed of Beauers. Common Fures (with some of these fore-named) are in euerie part of the Countrey.

A second commodity is waxe, which hath bene shipt thence into far remote Countreys yearely, the valew of 50000. Poode. Honey also is there in great quantity, spent dayly in their ordinarie drinckes, which is Mead of all sorts: and yet carried out of the Countrey in great abundance. Mordua and Cadam nere vnto Cheremissen Tartar, yeeldeth the greatest increase of Honey: but good store also commeth out of Senersky, Rezan, Morum, Casnia, Drogobof, and Kasnia.

Tallow is yeelded in great weight for transportation, by reason of much good ground for feeding Cattle; as also manie Lents obserued among them. Partly beside, because the greatest perfonnes vse waxe Lights: as the poorer and meaner sort do Byrch, dried in their stoues, being cut into long Dices, called there Luchine.

The principall fures vemed thence in merchandize

os. Some yeares haue sent away by Shipping, above an hundred thousand Poode yearly, which hath come out of the parts and Territories of Smolensko, Tursulaine, Ouglitz, Nouogrod, Yologda, Osker and Goroedstsky.

Another principal commodity is Losh and Cow-hides: their Losh and Buffe beeing very faire. Their Bull and Cow-hide is but small of size, for Oxen they make none, nor of weather. Strange Marchants haue transported thence some yeares above an hundred thousand hides, beside great store of Goats skinned, shipt also thence in large number. The breede for the fairest Losh or Buffe, is about Ko-Houe, Wichida, Nouogrod, Morum and Perm, as the lesser sort are in the kingdom of Cazan.

Traine Oyle, beeing made or drawne out of the Scale-fish, is no mean commodity there. And because we are speaking of the Scale-fish, it shall not much dissent from our matter, to report in what manner they hunt the Scale, whereof afterward this Oyle is made. When the end of Summer draweth neere, and the frosts are not (as yet) begun, they descend with their boats into S. Nicholas Baye, to the Cape called Cusconesse or Pounesse, where they leaue their boats till the next spring tide. When the Sunne waxeth warme towards the spring, and yet the ice not melted in the Bay, they returne thither again, and drawing their Boats ouer the ice, vse them as houses to lodge and rest in. Commonly, there are about seauenteene or eighteene Flcete of them, being diuided into diuers companies, five or sixe boates alwayes conorting together.

Such as light first upon the fishes haunt or resort, do fire a Beacon, carryed with them for the same purpose, and certaine are appointed, to obserue when the Beacon shall be fired; whereof report being made to the other Companies, they resort all together, compelling the Scale round in a ring, as they by Summoning together vpon the Ices, being commonly foure or five thousand in a shoale. Thence every man, hauing a Clubbe in his hand, enters stoutly vpon them; and if they his them on the nose, then they are soone killed. But if on the backe or sides, they boord out the blowes stiffly, and many times catch the fish by the side, and holds it downe with their teeth so strongly, that the party is forced to call for helpe to his fellows.

The manner of the Seales is, when they perceiue themselves beset round about; to gather all close together, as in a throng or heape, to fwy and beare downe the Ice, and to breake it if they can: which bending of the Ice, brings vp such a Sea-water vpon it, that the Hunters are faine to wade a foote or more deepe. When they haue killed what they can, & intend no further slaughter at that time: the hunters fall to sharing, euery boar his part by equal portions. And so they flay them, taking off the skinned from the bodie, and the Lard or fat withall that cleaueth vnto the skinned, which they beare thence with them, going to the shore, leauing the bodies behind. Pits they dig in the ground, of a fathome & a halfe in depth, and hauing taken off the Fat or Lard from the skin, cast it into the pits, and then hurle in hot burning coales to melt it withall. The vppermost and purest is sold, and vfed to oyle wooll for cloth: but the groffer, being red of colour, they sell to make Sape.

Great quantity also of Ickary or Cauer-ry, is made vpon the river of Volga, out of a Fish called Bellouina, the Sturgeon, the Seneriga, and the Sterledy: most part whereof is shipt thence by French & Netherland Merchants for Italy, Spaine, and England.

Flaxe and Hempe is another commodity, whereof hath bene shipt at the Port of Narue, the more part of an hundred Ships small and great yearly. But great abatement is in these and other commodities, by shutting vp the Port of Narue towards the Finnland Sea, which is now in possession of the Sweden. The stop of passage also ouer land, by the way of Smolensko and Plotsko, in regard of warre with the Poland; which caueth the people to be lesse carefull in providing these and other commodities, because they want sale. For growth of Flaxe, the Prouince of Polska and country thereabout is chiefly like as Smolensko, Dorogoboffe, and Vasma is for Hempe.

Great store of Salt the Country maketh, whereof the best is at Stararouffe, in very great quantity, hauing store of Salt-wells, some two hundred fifty nine from

Salt, whereof some is made naturally of the sea water from the Sea. But at A. Fracan, Salt is naturally made by the Sea-water, which catcheth it vp in great hills, from whence it is digged downe, and carryed away by Merchants, or any that will fetch of it. Three pence Russe is payed to the Emperour vpon euery hundred weight of Salt, which is likewise made in many other places, as in Berm, Wichida, Totina, Kenitsma, Sonoletsky, &c. all out of Salt-pits, except at Solouetsky, which lyeth neare vnto the Sea.

Tarre also they make great store of, out of Firre trees in the Country of Dny-na and Smolensko, sending no meane plenty thereof abroad. To these before remembered, there are many more (naturall to the country) though of meane estimation: As the fish-tooth, which they call Ribazuba, vfed both amongst themselves, and the Persians and Bouharians, who fetch it thence for Beades, Knives and Sword-handles for Noblemen and Gentlemen, and diuerse other vses.

Some doe vse the powder of it against poyson; like to Vnicornes horne, and the fish that oweth it, is called a Morse, being caught about Pechora: Some of these teeth are well-neare two foote in length, and doe weigh cleauen or twelue pounds each tooth.

There is a soft Rocke, which they doe cutte into peeces or into thinne flakes, and are naturally to bee vfed and employed as Glasse, for Lant-hornes and such like: but yet is not so brittle in breaking as Glasse, yet it dooth giue a farre clearer light. They doe tearme it Slade, and it groweth in the Prouince of Corelia, and about the River Dny-na, towards the North Sea.

Besides, they make Salt-peter in many places, as at Ouglitz, Tursulaine, and Vlug; with some meane store of Beinstone vpon the River Volga; but they want skill to refine it.

As for their Iron, it is but brittle; yet much thereof is made in Corelia, Cargapoleia, and Vlug; these for other mines they haue none growing within the kingdom.

As for Beasts of strange kinds, they haue the Losh, the Olen, the wilde Horse, the Vvultering or Wood dogge, the Lyfenne, the Beauer, the Sable, the Martroun, the blacke and dunne Fox, the white Beare, towards the Sea-coast of Pechora, the Gurnfall, and the Laster or Minuer. Likewise, there is a kinde of Squirrel, hauing growing on the pinion of his shoulder bone, a long tuft of haire, much like vnto feathers, with a farre broader taile then other Squirrels haue, which they doe moue and shake, as they moue from tree to tree, like to a Vwing in resemblance, and seeming as if they flew thereby, whereby they were called, Zetach Veshbe, that is to say, flying Squirrels. In the Summer their Hares and Squirrels are of the same colour as other are; but in Winter, the Hare changeth her coate into milke-white, and the Squirrel into grey, and thereof is that the Calaber counteth.

Fallow Deere likewise they haue, the Roe Bucke, and great plenty and store of Goates. Their horsses are but small, yet swift and hard, and both in Winter and Summer, they trauell them vnto, vying no respect at all of pace. Small are their sheepe, bearing harsh and course wooll, not so apt and conuenient for the making of Cloath, as is afforded in diuers other Countries, nor of so good a wearing.

Of Fowles they haue of the principall kinds; and great store of Hawkes, as also the Eagle, the Ger-falcon, the Slight-falcon, the Gof hawke, the Tassell, the Spar-hawke. But the principall Hawke breeding in the Country is counted the Ger-falcon. We may not forget other chiefe Fowles, as the Swanne wilde and tame in great plentie; the Storke, the Crane, the Tedder, resembling a Feasant in colour, but much bigger, and liueth in the Firre woods. Of Pheasant and Partridge they haue great plenty, and an Owle, to great and ougly to beholde, as few countries afforde the like, with a huge broad face, and eares much like to a man.

We come now to speake of fresh-water Fish, besides the common sort, as Carpes, Pikes, Pearech, Tench, Roach, &c. they haue diuerse kinds very good and delicate. As the Bellouga or Bellougina, of foure or fiseelles in length; the Ojirina or Sturgeon, the Seneriga and Sterledy, somewhat in fashion and in taste like vnto the Sturgeon, but not so thicke, nor so long.

Varietie of fresh-water Fish and other beside.

These foure kinds of Fish breed in the Volgha, and are there catcht in great abundance, seruing generally (as a great food) to the whole kingdom. And of the roes of these foure fishes, are made very great store of Icary or Caucary.

Besides these breeding in the Volgha, they haue a Fish called Ribabela, or white Salmon, which they hold to be more delicate then the red Salmon, having also great plenty of them in the Riues northward, as in Duyna and Cola, &c. In the Ozera, or Lake neare to Perisslaue, they haue a small Fish, which they call the fresh herring, of the same fashion, and tasting also like a Sea herring. From the trades of fishing the Emperor hath an yearly large custome, which they practise in the Summer: but send it frozen in the Winter into all parts of the Realme.

Now, because wee aymed at a formalitie in the description, wee enter into a relation of the chiefe and principall Cities in Moscouia or Rufsia, and as our direction guideth vs, these are their names.

- 1 Mosko.
- 2 Novograd.
- 3 Rosloue.
- 4 Volodomer.
- 5 Plesko.
- 6 Smolensko.
- 7 Iarusslaue.

- 11 Vitnick.
- 12 Galmigræe.
- 13 Cazan.
- 14 Astracan.
- 15 Cargapolia.
- 16 Columna.

The City of Mosko very ancient.

Herofus in his Moscou plant Colonies in Asia and Europe, and Moscou seems to take name of him.

The City of Mosko is supposed to bee of great antiquitie, though the first founder thereof be vnknowne to the Moscouites or Ruffe. It seemeth to deriue the name from the riuer, running on the one side thereof. Herofus the Chaldean telleth vs, that Nimrod (in other profane Storics called Saturne) sent Affryus, Medus, Mofcus and Magos into Asia, to plant Colonies there, and that Mofcus planted both in Asia and Europe. Which may make some probability, that the City, or rather the Riuer whereon it is built, tooke the denomination from this Mofcus. And so much the rather, because of the Climate or situation, which is in the very furthest part and list of Europe, bordering vpon Asia.

It appeareth, that this Citie was much enlarged by one Euan or Iohn sonne vnto Daniell, the first that changed his Title of Duke into King; though that honor continued not to his posteritie, the rather, because hee was inuelted into it by the Popes Legate, who at that time was Innocentius the fourth, about the yere 1246, which was much disliked by the Ruffe people, being then a part of the Easterne or Greeke Church. Since that time, the name of that Citie hath growne more famous, and much better knowne to the world. Infomuch, that not only the province, but the whole country of Moscouia or Rufsia, is termed by some, by the name of Moscouia the Metropolit Citie.

The forme of this City is (in a manner) round, with three strong walles, circuling the one within the other, and streetes lying betwene, wherof the in-most wall, and the buildings closed within it, lying so fast (as the heart within the body) fenced and wated with the Riuer Moskua, which runneth close by it; is all accounted the Emperours Castell. The number of houles through the whole City (being reckoned a litle before it was fiered by the Chrim) were 41500. Since the Tartar besieged and fiered it (which was in the yere 1571.) there doth lye waste of it a great breadth of ground, which before was well set and planted with buildings; especially that part on the South side of Moskua, built (not long before) by Basilus the Emperour for his garrison of Souldiours, to whom he gaue priuilege to drinke Mead and Beere, at the drie or prohibited times. And for that cause called his new Citie Naloi, that is to say, Skinke or powre in, So that now the Citie of Mosko is not much bigger then the City of London in England.

The next in greatnesse, and (in a manner) as large, is the Citie Novograd, where happened (as the Ruffe sayth) the memorable warre, so much spoken of in Historics, of the Scythian seruants, that tooke vppon Armes against their Maisters, which they haue reported to be after this manner.

Novograd the next great city to Mosko.

The Boiardines or Gentlemen of Novograd, and the adjacent territories (that only are Souldiers after the discipline of those countries) had warre with the Tartars. Which being well performed and ended by them, they retired homewards. Where they vnderstoode by the way, that their Cholopy or Bondslaves whom they left at home, had (in their absence) possessed their townes, landes, houses, wines and all. At which newes being somewhat amazed, and yet disdayning the villanie of their seruants, they made the more speed home, and so, not farre from Novograd, mette them in wartelike maner marching against them.

Whereupon, aduising what was best to be done, they all agreed, to set vpon them with no other shew of weapons, but with their horse whippes (which as their manner is, euery man rideth withall) to put them in remembrance of their seruile condition, thereby to terrifie them and abate their courage. And so marching on, lashing all together with their whips in their hands, they gaue the on-stroke, which seemed so terrible in the eares of the villaines, and strooke such a sence into the of the whips (whereof they had sharply talked before) that they all fled together, euery like sheepe before their driuers. In memorie of which victorie, the Novogradians (euer since) haue stamped their Coine, which they call a Dingoe Novogradskoy, currant through all Rufsia: with the figure of a man on horsebacke, shaking a whip aloft in his hand. These two Cities exceede the rest in greatnesse.

For strength, their chiefe Cities are Volga, Smolensko, Cazan and Astracan, as all lying vpon the borders; but for situation, Iarusslaue farre exceedeth all the rest. Because, beside those commodities yeelded by pasturage and corne, it lieth vpon the famous riuer Volgha, and lookees ouer it, from a banke most faire and stately to beholde, wherof the Towne taketh name. For Iarusslaue (in that language) signiflieth a faire and famous banke. In this Citie (as may be well imagined by that name) dwelt the Moscouian or Ruffe King Pladenir, surnamed Iarusslaue: that married the daughter to Harold King of England, by mediation of Sueno the Dane, as the Danish historie testifieth, about the yere of our Lord God, one thousand sixty seauen.

Nothing greatly memorable, is to be spoken of the other Cities and Townes, but onely ruines within their walles, which declareth the peoples decrease vnder this gouernement. In stead of paulling, the streetes (in their Townes and Cities) are planked with Firre trees, plained and layd euery close one to another. Their houses are of wood, without any Linc or Stone, built very close and warme, with Firre trees plained, and layd one vpon another, being fastened together with dents or notches at euery corner; and so clapped fast together. Betwixt the trees of timber, they thrust in Moss, wherof they gather plenty in the woods, to keepe out the ayre: And euery house hath a paire of staires, which leade vpp into the chambers out of the yard or streete, after the Scottish maner. This building appeareth farre better for their Country, then that of Stone and Bricke, because they are darker and more cold; then those wooden houses; especially them of Firre, which is a verie drie and warme kinde of wood: wherof God hath prouided them such store, that a faire house may be built for twenty or thirty Rubbels, or litle more where wood is scantell.

Onely the greatest inconuenience of their wooden building, is the aptnesse for fiering, which happeneth there verie often, and in as fearefull sort, by reason of the drie and fatnesse of the Firre, that being once fiered, it burneth like vnto a Torch, and is hardly quenched, till all be quite consumed.

CHAP. II.

Our second Tract, relateth of what Linage or house the great Emperours are descended: And a view of their entailment or Inauguration in that supreme dignitie: with the form of publike Government, & order obserued in holding their Parliaments. Then of the Nobility dignifying the state, with the regiment of their Princes, and Councell attending vpon the Emperour: His Customes, Renownes & Sophismes, and a breefe relation of the Comminaltie, in their obedience and service.

THE surname of the Imperial house of Moscouia or Russia, is called Beala, receiuing Originall (as is supposed) from the kings of Hungaria, which may appeare the more probable; because the Hungarian Kings (many years since) haue borne that name, as is noted by Bonfinius, and other Histories written of that Countrey. For, about the yeare, 1559. mention is made of one Beala, that succeeded his brother Andreas, who reduced the Hungarians to the Christian Faith, from which they were faine by Turkish perswasion before. The second of that name was called Beala the Blinde, after whose successe diuers of the same name.

That their Ancestours came not of the Russe Nation, Iuan Vasiliuich (Father to this Emperour) would many times boast, disdainig (as it should seeme) to haue his progeny deuied from the Russian blood. As namely, to an English-man his Goldsmith, that had receiued Bullion of him to make certaine Plate: whom the Emperour commanded, to looke wel to his weight. For my Russe (said he) are all Theeues. Whereat the workman, looking Reddfully vpon the Emperour, began to smile.

The Emperour being of verie quick conceite, charged him to tell, what hee smiled at. If your Maiesty will pardon me (quoth the Goldsmith) I will tell you. Your Highnesse sayde, that all the Russe were Theeues; and forgotte (in the meane while) that your selfe was a Russe. I thought so sayde the Emperour, but thou art deceyued, for I am no Russe: my Ancestours were Germanes (for so they account the Hungarians, to bee part of the Germane Nation) although (indeede) they come of the Hunnes, who molsted and invaded that countrey, and rested in those partes of Pannonia, now called Hungary.

How they aspired to the Dukedome of Volodemer (which was their first degree, and ingrafting into Moscouia.) And whether it were by Conquest, or by Marriage, or by what other meanes; no certainty is to be learned among them. But from these beginnings, of a small Dukedom (which bate notwithstanding an absolute government with it, as at that time did all the other Shires or Provinces of Moscouia) this house of Beala spread it selfe forth, and aspired (by degrees) vnto the Monarchie of the whole Countrey, as it is, a thing well knowne, and but of late memory.

The cheefe of that house, that aduanced the Stocke, and enlarged their Dominions: were the three last that reigned before this Emperour, to witte, Iuan Basilienus, and Iuan. Father to the other that reigneth at this time. Whereof the first that tooke vnto him the Name and Title of Emperour, was Basilienus, Father to Iuan, and Grandfather vnto this man. For (before that time) they one-ly were contented, to bee called by the Name of Great Dukes of Mosco or Moscouia.

What hath beene done by eyther of these three, and how much they haue added vnto their first estate, eyther by Conquest, or otherwise; wee shall shew more at large, when wee come to speake of their Colonies, or purchases perforce. For the continuance of the race, this House of Beala at this present, is in like case, as are many of the greatest Houses of Christendome, (Viz:) the whole Stocke and Race, concluded in one, two, or some fewe of the blood. For, besides the Emperour that now is, who hath no childe (neyther is like euer

No hope of life by the Emperour.

A great mischief & much lamented, causing all the Fathers life.

Treachery attempted against the young Princes life.

Qualities of no great commendation.

Another title of inheritance by the Dukedome of Holit.

to haue, for ought that can bee coniectured by the constitution of his bodye, and barrennesse of his wife, after so many yeares marriage) there is but one more, which is a Childe of fixe or seauen yeares olde, in whom resteth all the hope of succession, and posteritie of that house.

As for the other Brother, that was eldest of the three, and of the best towardnesse: hee dyed of a blow giuen him by his Father vpon the head (in furie) with his walking Staffe, or (as some say) of a thrust with the prong of it, driuen deep into his head. That hee meant him no such mortall harme, when hee gaue him the blowe, appeared by his wonderfull great mourning and passion after his Sonnes vntime death; which neuer left him, vntill it brought him to his Graue. Wherein may bee noted the Iustice of God, that punished his delight in shedding of blood, with this murder of his Sonne by his owne hand. And so ended his dayes and tyranny together, with the murdering of himselfe by extreame grief, for this his vnhappy, and most vnnatural facte.

The Emperours younger Brother, of fixe or seauen yeares olde (as was said before) is kept in a remote place from the Mosko, vnder the tuition and government of his Mother, and her Kindred, of the house of the Nagales: yet not safe (as I haue heard) from attempts of making away, by practise of some that would aspire vnto the Crowne, if the Emperour dye without any yssue. For, the Nurse that talked before him of certaine meate, (as I haue heard reported) dyed immediately.

That he is the Naturall Sonne vnto Iuan Vasiliuich, the Russe people warrant it, by the fathers qualities, which appear already in his tender yeeres. He delights to see Sheepe and other Cattle kille, and to looke on their throates, while they are bleeding (which commonly, children are affrayde to beholde) and to beate Geefe and Hennes with a Staffe, till he see them dead.

Besides these of the male kinde, there is a Widdow, that hath right in the succession, Sister to the olde Emperour, and Aunt to him liuing; sometime wife vnto Magnus, Duke of Holit, Brother to the King of Denmarke, by whom she had one daughter.

This Woman, since the death of her Husband, hath beene allured againe into Russia, by some that loue the succession better then her selfe, which appeareth by the sequelle. For her selfe, with her daughter, so soone as they were returned againe into Russia, were thrust into a Nunnery, where her daughter dyed this last yeare; but of no naturall disease, as was supposed.

The Mother remaineth still in the Nunnery, bewailing her selfe, and cursing the time when shee returned into Russia, enticed with the hope of Marriage, and many other fayre promises in the Emperours name. And thus it standeth with the Imperiall stocke of Russia, of the House of Beala, which is like to determine in those that now are, and to make a conuersion of the Russe Estate. If it bee into a Government of some better temper, and milder constitution; it will bee happie for the people, that are now oppressed with intolerable servitude.

Our next Discourse, must extend it selfe, to report such solemnities, as are commonly vsed at the Russe Emperours Coronation, which followeth in this manner.

Of the manner of Crowning or Inauguration of the Russe Emperours.

THE solemnities vsed at the Russe Emperours Coronation, are on this manner. In the great Church of Prebende (or our Ladie) within the Emperours Cattle, is erected a stage, whereon standeth a Screene, that beareth vpon it the Imperiall Cappe and Robe, of exceeding rich stuffe. When the day of Inauguration is come, there reforme therself, first the Patriarche with the Metropolitans, Arch-bishops, Bishops, Abbots, and Priors, alrichly clad in their Pontificalibus. Then enter the Deacons, with the Quier of singers: who so soone as the Emperour setteth foot into the church begin to sing: Many yeeres may live noble Theodore Iuanowich, &c. Whereunto the Patriarch and Metropolit, with the rest of the Cleargy, answer with a certaine Hymne, in forme of a prayer, singing it all together, with a great noise. The Hymne being ended, the Patriarch with the Emperor mount vp the stage, where standeth a seat ready for the Emperour. Whereon the Patriarch willeth him to sit down, and then placing himselfe by him, vpon another seate provided for that purpose, boweth down his head toward the ground, and saith this prayer.

The prayer uttered by the Patriarch, before the Coronation.

Oh Lord God, King of Kinges, Lord of Lords, which by the Prophet Samuell diddest chuse thy seruant David, and anoint him for King ouer thy people Israel, heare nowe our Prayers, and looke from thy Sanctuarie vpon this thy seruant Theodore, whom thou hast chosen, and exalted for King, ouer these thy holy Nations. Anoint him with the Oyle of gladnesse, protect him by thy power put vpon his head a Crowne of Gold & precious stones, giue him length of dayes, place him in the seat of Iustice, strengthen his arme, make him victor vnto him all the barbarous Nations. Let thy feare be in his whole heart; turne him from an euill Faith, and from all error, and shew him the saluation of thy holie and vniuersall Church; that he may iudge thy people with Iustice, and protect the children of the poore, and finally attaine euertlasting life. This prayer he speaketh with a low voyce, and then pronounceth aloud: All praise and power to God the Father, the Sonne, and the holy Ghost.

The Ceremonies to be performed in order.

The prayer being ended, he commandeth certaine Abbots to reach the Imperiall Robe and Cap; which is done verie decently, and with great solemnitie, the Patriarch withall pronouncing alowde; Peace be vnto all. And so he beginneth another prayer to this effect: Bow your selves together with vs, and pray to him that reigneth ouer all. Preserve him (O Lord) vnder thy protection, keepe him that he may do good and holy thing, let iustice shine forth in his dayes, that we may live quietly without strife and malice.

This is pronounced somewhat softly by the Patriarch, whereto he addeth againe alowde: Thou art the King of the whole world, and the Saviour of our soules, to thee the Father, Sonne, and Holy Ghost, be all praise for euer and euer, Amen. Then putting on the Robe and the Cap, he blesteth the Emperour with the signe of the Crosse: saying withall; In the name of the Father, the Sonne, and the holy Ghost. The like is done by the Metropolit, Arch-bishops, and Bishops: who all in their order come to the Chaire, and one after another, doe blesteth the Emperour with their two fore-fingers.

Then is saide by the Patriarch another prayer, that beginneth, O most holy Virgin, mother of God, &c. After which, a Deacon pronounceth with an high lowde voyce: Many yeeres to Noble Theodore, good, honourable, beloued of God, great Duke of Volodemer of Mosko, Emperour, and Monarch of all Russia, &c. Where the other priests and Deacons, that stand somewhat far off by the Altar or Table, answer singing: Many yeeres, many yeeres to the noble Theodore. The same note is taken vpe by the Priests and Deacons, that are placed at the right and left side of the Church, and then all together they chaunt and thunder out, singing; Many yeeres to the noble Theodore, good, honourable, beloued of God, great Duke of Volodemer, Mosko, Emperour of all Russia, &c.

These solemnities being ended, first cometh the Patriarch with the Metropolit, Arch-bishops, and Bishops; then the Nobility, and the whole companie in their order, to doe homage vnto the Emperour, bending downe theyr heades, and knocking them at his feet vnto the very ground.

According to their ancient custome

Homage and obedience done to the Emperour.

The Stile wherewith hee is inuested at his Coronation, runneth after this manner.

Theodore Iuanowich, by the Grace of God, great Lord and Emperour of all Russia, great Duke of Volodemer, Mosko, and Nouograd, King of Cazan, King of Astracan, Lord of Plesko, and great Duke of Smolensko, of Tverria, Iougoria, Permia, Vadska, Bulghoria, and others. Lord and great Duke of Nouograd of the Low Countreies, of Chermigo, Rezan, Polotskoy, Rostoue, Turuslawe, Belozera, Liefland, Oudoria, Obdoria, and Condensa: Commander of all Siberia, and of the North partes, and Lorde of many other Countreies, &c.

This

The Emperour proud of his many Titles.

The State or forme of their government.

The Russe government tyrannical.

Exaction in No leuies on the mercant.

The Nobilitie and Commons, flouers for the Prince.

This stile containeth in it all the Emperours Provinces, and setteth forth his greatnesse. And therefore they haue a very great delight and pride in it, forcing not onely their owne people, but likewise strangers (that haue any matter to deliuer to the Emperour by speech or writing) to repeat the whole forme from the beginning to the end. Which breedeth much cauilt, and sometimes quarrell, betwixt them and the Tartar, and Poland Ambassadors; who refuse to call him Czar, that is Emperour, and to repeat the other parts of his long stile.

The manner of their Government, is much after the Turkish fashion: which they doe seeme to imitate as neere as the Countrey, and reach of their capacities (in polittick affayres) will giue them leaue to doe.

The State and forme of their Government is plaine tyrannicall, as applying all to the behoofe of the Prince, and that after a most open and barbarous manner, as may appeare by the Sophismata, or secrets of their Government alterward set down, aswell for the keeping of the Nobility and Commons in an vnder proportion, and farre vneuen ballance in their seuerall degrees; as also in their impositions and exactions, wherein they exceed all iust measure, without any regard of Nobilitie or people.

Furthermore, it giueth the Nobilitie a kinde of iniust, and vnmeasured liberty, to command and exact vpon the Commons and baser sort of people, in all parts of the Realme wheresoeuer they come, especially in the place where theyr Lands lye, or where they are appointed by the Emperour to gouerne vnder him. Also to the Commons some small contentment, in that they passe ouer their lands (by diffeult inheritance) to whither son they will: which commonly they do after our Cauill kinde, and dispose of their goodes by gift or Testament, without anie controulment. Wherein notwithstanding, both Nobility and Commons are but flouers for the Prince, all running in the end into the Emperours Coffers: as may appear by the practise of enriching his treasure, and the manner of Exactions sette downe in the title of his Customes and Reuennewes.

Concerning the principall points and matters of State, wherein the Souerainety consisteth (as the making and annulling of publicke Lawes, the making of Magistrats, power to make warre or league with any forraigne State, to execute or to pardon life, with the right of appeale in all matters, both ciuill and criminall) they doe so wholly and absolutely pertaine to the Emperour and his Councell vnder him; as that hee may be saide to be the Soueraigne Commander, and the executioner of all these. For, as touching any Law or publicke order of the Realme, it is euer determined of, before any publicke Assembly or Parliament bee summoned. Where besides his Councell, he hath none other to consult with him of such matters as are concluded before had but onely a few Bishops, Abbots, and Friars: to no other end, then to make advantage of the peoples superstitions, euen against themselves which think to be holy and iust, that passeth with consent of their Bishops and Cleargy men, whatsoeuer it bee.

For which purpose, the Emperours are content to make much of the corrupt state of the Church, as now it is among them, and to nourish the same by extraordinary fauours and immunities to the Bishops Seas, Abbeyes, and Fryaries: as knowing, superstition and false Religion best to agree with a tyrannicall State, and to be a speciall meanes to vphold and maintaine the same.

Secondly, as touching the publicke Offices and Magistracies of the Realme, there is none Hereditarie, neyther any so great nor so little in that Countrey, but the bestowing of it, is done immediately by the Emperour himselfe. In somuch, that the very Diackes or Clarke in euery head Towne, are (for the most part) assigned by himselfe. Notwithstanding, the Emperour that now is (the better to entend his Deuotions) referreth all such matters pertaining to the State, wholly to the ordering of his Wives brother, the Lord Borris Federowich Godonoe.

Thirdly, the like is to be saide of the Iurisdiction, concerning matters iudiciall, specially such as concerne life and death. Wherein there is none that hath any authority, or publicke Iurisdiction that goeth by diffeult, or is held by Charter; but all at the appointment and pleasure of the Emperour.

Of Soueraign power.

Benefit made by corruption

Offices giuen by the Emperour himselfe.

Of iudiciall matters concerning life & death.

And

And the same practised by the Judges with such awe and restraint; as that they dare not determine upon any special matter, but must referre the same wholly, vpon the Mosko to the Emperours Councell. To shew his Soueraignty ouer the liues of his Subiects, the late Emperour Iuan Paskowich (in his walks or progresse) if he had misliked the face or person of any man whom he met by the way, or that looked vpon him; would command his head to be strook off. Which was presently done, and the head cast before him.

Fourthly, for the soueraigne appeale, and giuing of pardons in criminal matters to such as are convicted; it is wholly at the pleasure and grace of the Emperour. Wherein also the Emperesse that now is, being a woman of great clemency, and withall, delighting to deale in publick affaires of the Realme, (the rather to supply the defect of her husband) doth behaue her selfe after an absolute manner, giuing out pardon (specially on her birth day, & other solemne times) in her owne name, by open Proclamation, without any mention at all of the Emperour.

Their highest Court of publick consultation, for matter of State, is called the Zabore, that is, the Publick Assembly. The states and degrees of persons that are present at their Parliaments, are these in order. First, the Emperour himselfe. Secondly, some of his Nobility, about the number of twenty, being all of his Councell. Thirdly, certaine of the Cleergy-men, &c. about the same number. As for Burghers, or other to represent the Commonalty, they haue no place there: the people being of no better account with them, then as seruants or bondslaves, that are to obey, not to make lawes, nor to know any thing of publick matters, before they are concluded.

The Court of Parliament (called Zabore) is held in this manner. The Emperour causeth to be summoned such of his Nobility, as himselfe thinketh meete, being (as was said) all of his Councell: together with the Patriarch, who calleth his Cleergy, to wit, the two Metropolitans, the two Archbishops, with such Bishops, Abbots, and Fryars, as are of best account and reputation among them. When they are all assembled at the Emperours Court, the day is intimated when the Session shall begin. Which commonly is vpon Friday, for the religion of that day.

When the day is come, the Cleergy-men assemble before, at the time & place appointed, which is called the Stoly. And when the Emperour cometh attended by his Nobility, they arise all, and meete him in an out-roome, following their Patriarch, who blesteth the Emperour with his two fore-fingers, laying them on his forehead, and the sides of his face, & then kisseth him on the right side of his breast. So they passe on into their Parliament house, where they sit in this order. The Emperour is enthronized on the one side of the Chamber. In the next place, not farre from him, at a small square Table (that giueth room to twelve persons or thereabouts) sitteth the Patriarch, with the Metropolitans and Bishops, & certaine of the principall Nobility of the Emperours Councell, together with two Diacks or Secretaries (called Dumoy Dyakey) that enact that which passeth. The rest place themselves on Benches round about the Roome, euery man in his rank after his degree. Then is there propounded by one of the Secretaries (who representeth the Speaker) the cause of their assembly, and the principall matters that they are to consider of. For, to propound bills, what euery man thinketh good for the publick benefit (as in other Countries is vsed) the Russe Parliament alloweth no such custome, nor liberty to subiects.

The points being opened, the Patriarch (with his Cleergy-men) haue the prerogative, to be first asked their vote, or opinion, what they thinke of the pointes propounded by the Secretary. Where to they answer in order, according to their degrees, but all in one forme, without any discourse: as hauing learned their Lesson before, that serueth their turnes at all Parliaments alike, whatsoeuer is propounded. Commonly it is to this effect. That the Emperour and his Councell are of great wisdom, and experience, touching the policies and publick affaires of the Realme, and farre better able to iudge what is profitable for the Common-wealth, then they are, which attend vpon the service of God onely, and masters of Religion. And therefore it may please them to proceede. That instead of their aduise they will aide them with their prayers, as their duties ties and vocations, do require. For To this or like effect, hauing made their answer euery man in his court, vpon sundry some Abbot, or Fryar, more bold then the rest (yet appointed before hand, as a matter of forme) and desirous the Emperour should please his Majesty, to command to be deliuered vnto them, what his Majesties owne iudgements, and determinate pleasure is, as touching those matters propounded by his Dumoy. Where Vnto them, replied by the said Secretary, in the Emperours name, That by His Highnesse, with the aid of his Noble Councell (upon good and sound aduise) heere found the matters propounded, to bee very good and necessary for the Common-wealth, of his Realme. Notwithstanding forasmuch as they are religious men, and know what is right, his Majesty requireth their good opinions, yea and their censures too, for the approving or correcting of the said propositions. And therefore desireth them againe, to speake their mindes freely. And if they shall like to giue their consents, that then the matters may passe to a full conclusion.

Hereunto, when the Cleergy-men haue giuen their consents (which they vse to do, without any great pausing) they take their leaues, with blessing of the Emperour: who bringeth the Patriarch on his way so farre as the next Roome, and so returneth to his seat, till all be made ready for his returne homeward. The Actes that thus are passed by the Zabore or Parliament, the Diacks or Secretaries draw into a forme of Proclamation, which they send abroad into euery Province, & headtowne of the Realme, to bee published there, by the Dukes & Diacks, or Secretaries of those places. The Session of Parliament being fully ended; the Emperour inviteth the Cleergy-men to a solemne Dinner. And so they depart euery man to his home.

The degrees of persons or estates of Russe (besides the Soueraigne State or Emperour himselfe) are these in order. First, the Nobility which is of four sorts. Whereof the chiefe for birth, authority, and reuennue, are called the Vdelny Knazes, that is, the exempt or priuiledged Dukes. These hold sometimes a seuerall iurisdiction, and absolute authority within their Precincts, much like vnto the States or Nobles of Germany. But afterwards (reseruing their rights vpon composition) they yielded themselves to this house of Russe, when it began to waxe mighty, and to enlarge itselfe by ouermastering their neighbours. Onely they were bound to serue the Emperour in his warres, with a certaine number of horse. This the late Emperour Iuan Paskowich, Father to this Prince, being a man of high spirit, and subtle in his kinde, meaning to reduce his gouernment into a more strict forme; began by degrees, to slip off their greatness, and to bring it downe to a lesser proportion: till in the ende, he made them not onely his vassals, but his Soldiers, that is, his very villians or bond-slaves, for so they terme & wise themselves in any publick instrument or appropriate petition which they make to the Emperour. So that now they hold their authorities, lands, liues and all at the Emperours pleasure, as the rest do.

The manner and practice whereby he wrought this to effect, against those, and either of the Nobility (so well as I could note out of the report of his doings) were these, and such like. First, hee cast priuate emulation among them, about prelatiue of their Titles and Dignities. Wherein he vied to see, on the Inferiours, to preferre or equal themselves to those, that were accounted to be of the Nobler house. Where hee made his aduantage of their mallice and contentions, the one against the other, by receiving deuised matter, and accusations of secret practise and conspiracies, to bee intended against his person and state. And so, hauing singled out the greatest of them, and cut them off, with the good liking of the rest; hee fell at last to open practise, by forcing of the other to yeeld their rights vnto him.

2. He diuided his subiects into two parts or Factions by a generall schisme. The one part he called the Oppressini or Seleit men. These were such of the Nobility and Gentry, as hee tooke to his owne part, to protect, and maintaine them as his faithful subiects. The other hee called Zemsky, or the Commons. The Zemsky contained the base and vulgar sort, with such Noblemen and Gentlemen as he meant to cut off, as suspected to mislike his gouernment, and to haue a meaning to practise against him. Wherein hee provided that the Oppressini, for number and quality of valour, money, armor, &c. far exceeded the other of the Zemsky side, whom he put (as it were) from vnder his protection: so that if any of the Oppressins (which he accounted of his owne part) there was no amends to be sought for, by way of publike iustice, or by compellment to the Emperor.

The distinguishing of the Oppressins & Zemsky each from other.

The reason of this cruell practise.

The whole number of both parts was orderly registred and kept in a Booke: so that every man knew, who was a Zemsky man, and who of the Oppressins. And this liberty of the one part, to poyse and kill the other, without any helpe of Magistrate, or law (that continued seuen years) enriched that side and the Emperors treasury, and wrought that withall, which hee intended by this practise, viz. to take out of the way, such of the Nobility, as himselfe misliked: wherof were thaine (within one weeke) to the number of three hundred within the City of Mosko. This tyrannicall practise, of making a generall Schisme, and publike diuision among the subjects of his whole Realme, proceeded (as should seeme) from an extreme doubt, and desperate feare, which he had conceived of most of his Nobility, and Gentlemen of his Realme, in his warres with the Polonian and Chrim Tartars. What time he grew into a vehement suspicion (conceined of the ill successe of his Affaires) that they practised treason with the Polonian and Chrim. Whereupon he executed some, and deuised this way to be rid of the rest.

And this wicked pollicy and tyrannous practise (though now it be ceased) hath so troubled that Country, and filled it so full of grudge and mortall hatred ever since, that it will not bee quenched (as it seemeth now) till it burne againe into a ciuill flame.

3 Having thus pulled them, and sealed all their inheritance, lands, priuiledges, &c. (as some very small part, which he left to their name; he gaue them other lands of the tenour of Pomestimo) (as they call it) that are held at the Emperors pleasure, lying farre off in another Country, and so removed them into another of his Provinces, where they might haue neyther fauour, nor authority, nor being native nor well knowne there. So that now these of the chiefe Nobility (called Vdel-

Lands helde at the Emperors pleasure.

Any Knez are equalled with the rest: as far in the opinion and fauor of the people they are of more account, and keepe still the prerogative of their place, in all their publike meetings) do but keepe their practise to keepe downe these houses from rising againe, and recouering their dignities, are these of such like. With many of their heyres are kept vnmarrried, forsooke, that the stock may dye with them. Some are sent into Mosko, Cakara and Stratan, vnder pretence of service, & there either made away, or selfe slayd. Some are put into Abbeyes, and there themselves (Fryars by pretence) are vowed to be made voluntary, and of their owne accord, but indeede forced vnto it by fear, vpon some pretence of being obiects against them. Whereto they are so-garded by some of speciall trust, and the Couent it selfe (vpon whose head it standeth, that they make no escape) as that they haue no other hope, but to end their liues there. Of this kinde, there are many of very great Nobility.

Houses kept downe from rising and recouering their Dignity.

Many of the Nobility secretly & treacherously made away.

Notes of the persons made among them.

These and such like wayes (begun by the Emperor Iuan Pishlounsky) are still practised by the Godmoes, who being adiuuiced by the mariage of the Emperesse their kinswoman, rule both the Emperor, and his Realme, (specially Borris Federowich Godmoes, brother to the Emperesse) & endeavour by all meanes to cut off, or keepe downe all of the best and auncientest Nobility. Whereof diuers already they haue taken away, whom they thought likeliest to make head against them, and to hinder their purpose; as Knez Andreus Guraken Bulgatkeue, a man of great birth and authority in the Country. The like they haue done with Peter Gollamni (who they put into a dungeon where hee ended his life) with Knez Vasilie Prishich Gollouhen, with Andrieu Iuanowich Suskey, accounted among them for a man of great wisdom. So this last year was killed in a Monastery, (whether they had thrust him) on Knez Iuan Petrowich Suskey, a man of great valour, and seruice in that Country: who about five or sixe yeares since, bare out the fledge of the City Polsko, made by Stepan Batore King of Polonia, with one hundred thousand men, and repulsed him very valiantly, with great honour to himselfe and his Country, & disgrace to the Polonian. Also Michea Romanowich, manowich, Vnckle to the Emperor by the Mothers side, was supposed to haue died of poyson, or some such like practise.

Names of the greatest houses of the Rusky Nobility.

The names of these Families of greatest Nobility, are these in their order. The first is of Knez Volodemir, which resteth at this time in one daughter a widow, and without childre (mentioned before) sometime Wife to Hartock Magnus, brother to the King of Denmarke, now closed within a Nunnery. The second Knez Metheleskey, thrust into a Friery, and his onely sonne kept from marriage, to decay the house. The third Glimskoy: but one left of his house, and he without children, saue one daughter. The fourth Suskey, wherof there are foure brethren young men, and vnmarried all. The fifth Hubetskey. Of this house are foure liuing. The sixth Bulgatkey, now called Guletskey house, wherof are five liuing, but youths all. The seauenth Porallinsky. Two left of that stock. The eight Odgoskey. Two. The ninth Tellerskey. One. The tenth Taytoue. Three. These are the names of the chiefe Families called Vdelney Knazay: that in effect haue lost all now, saue the very name it selfe, and fauour of the people, which is like one day to restore them againe, if any be left.

The second degree of Nobility.

The second degree of Nobility, is of the Boiars. These are such, as the Emperor honoureth (beside their Nobility) with the Title of Counsellors. The reuenuue of these two sorts of Nobles, that resteth out of their Lands assigned them by the Emperor, and held at his pleasure (for of their owne Inheritance there is little left them, as was said before) is about a thousand marks a yeare: besides a pension which they receive of the Emperor, for their seruice in his wars, to the summe of seuen hundred Rubbels a yeare, and none about that summe.

The authority of the Emperesse, Brother, and his large Inheritances.

But in this number, the Lord Borris Federowich Godmoes is not to be reckoned, that is like a Transfendent, and in no such predicament with the rest, being the Emperors brother in law, his Protectour for direction; for command and authority Emperor of Rusia. His yearly reuenuue (in land and pension) amounteth to the summe of 93700. Rubbels and more, as appeareth by the particulars. He hath of inheritance (which himselfe hath augmented in Vasna Dorogobose, fixe thousand Rubbels a yeare. For his Office of Connick, or Master of the Horse, twelue thousand Rubbels, or Marks, raised out of the Camassue Slobodas, or the liberties pertaining to that Office, which are certaine Lands and Townes nere about the Mosko. Besides, all the Meadow and Pasture ground on both sides the banke of the river Mosko, thirty verst vp the streame, and forty verst downwards. For his pension of the Emperour (besides the other for his Office) fifty thousand Rubbels. Out of the Province or Shire of Vagha, there is giuen him for a peculiar (exempted out of the Chetird of Pofolsky, two & thirty thousand Rubbels, beside a rent of Furs. Out of Rezan and Sener, (another peculiar) thirty thousand Rubbels. Out of Oifer and Turick, another exempt place, eight thousand Rubbels. For rent of Bath-houses and Bathing-houses without the walles of Mosko, fiftene hundred Rubbels. Besides his pomeit, or lands which he holdeth at the Emperours pleasure, which farre exceedeth the proportion of land allotted to the rest of the Nobility.

Allowance for a simple Brother.

One other there is of the house of Glimsky, that dispendeth in land and pension, about forty thousand Rubbels yearly. Which he is suffered to enioy, because he hath married Borris his Vniues (sister, being himselfe simple, and almost a Natural). The ordering of him & his Lands are committed to Borris.

The third sort of Nobility.

In the third rancke are the Poyanodey, or such Nobles as are, or haue bene Generals in the Emperours warres. Which deliuer the honour of their Title to their posterities also: who take their place aboue the other Dukes and Nobles, that are not of the two former sorts, viz. of the Vdelney Knazay, nor of the Boiars.

These three degrees of their Nobility (to wit) the Vdelney Knazay, the Boiars, and the Poyanodey haue the addition of Vitch, put vnto their surname as Borris Federowich, &c. which is a note of honor, that the rest may not vsurpe. And in case it be not added in the naming of the; they may sue the Bestscheff, or penalty of dishonor vpon them, that otherwise shall terme them.

ses, through many descents, and have no inheritance of their owne, save the bare name or title of Duke only. For their order is, to deliver their names and titles of their dignities over to all their Children alike, whatsoever else they leave the. So that the sonnes of a Voianodey, or General in the field, are called Voianodey, though they never saw the field, and the sonnes of a Knez or Duke, are called Knazey, though they have not one groat of inheritance or livelihood, to maintain themselves withall. Of this sort there are so many, that the plenty maketh them cheape: so that you shall see Dukes glad to serve a meane man, for five or six rubbels or marks a year; and yet they will stand highly vpon their Bestscheft or reputation of their honours. And these are their severall degrees of Nobility.

The second degree of persons, is of their Sina Boiarskey, or the sons of Gentlemen: which all are preferred, & hold that name by their service in the Emperours wars, being Soldiers by their very stocke & birth. To which order are referred their Diacks or Secretaries, that serve the Emperor in every head towne, being ioyned in Commission with the Dukes of that place.

The last are their Commons, whom they call Mosicks. In which number they reckon their Merchants, and their common Artificers. The very lowest & basest sort of this kinde (which are helde in no degree) are their Country people, whom they call Christianeis. Of the Sina Boiarskey (which are all Soldiours) we are to see in the description of their Forces, and Military provisions. Concerning their Mosicks, what their condition and behaviour is, expect them among the Common people.

The whole Country of Rusina (as was said before) is divided into four parts, which they call Chetfirds, or Tetrarchies. Every Chetfird containeth divers Shires, and is annexed to a severall Office, whereof it takes the name.

The first Chetfird or Tetrarchy beareth the name of Foskoskey Chetfird, or the Jurisdiction of the Office of Ambassadors, and at this time is vnder the chiefe Secretary & Officer of the Ambassadors, called Andreas Shalalone. The standing fee or stipend that he receiveth yearly of the Emperor for this service, is one hundred rubbels or marks.

The second is called the Rosferadney Chetfird, because it is proper to the Rosferade or high Constable. At this time it pertaineth (by vertue of Office) to Bassile Shalalone, brother to the Chancellor; but it is executed by one Zapon Abramov. His pension is an hundred rubbels yearly.

The third is the Chetfird of Pomesiny, as pertaining to that Office. This keepeth a Register of all Lands given by the Emperor for service, to his Noblemen, Gentlemen, & others, he giueth out & taketh in all assurances for them. The Officer at this time is called Elezazar wellusgine. His stipend is 500. rubbels a year.

The fourth is called Cassanskey Dworetz, as being appropriate to the Office that hath the jurisdiction of the kingdomes of Cazan and Astracan, with the other towns lying vpon the Volga, now ordered by one Druzhine Penieleone, a man of very speciall account among the, for his wisdom, and promptnesse in matters of policy. His pension is 150. rubbels a year.

From these Chetfirds or Tetrarchies, is exempted the Emperours inheritance or Vochin (as they call it) for that it pertaineth (from ancient time) to the house of Beals, which is the true name of the Imperiall blood. This standeth of 36. Townes with their bounds or territories. Besides diuers peculiar jurisdictions, which are likewise deducted out of those Chetfirds, as the Shire of Pagha (belonging to the Lord Borris Federowich Godonoe) and such like.

These are the chiefe Governors or Officers of the Prouinces, not resident at their charge abroad, but attending the Emperor wherefoever he goeth, and carrying their Offices about with the, which for the most part they hold at Mosko, as the Emperours chiefe Seare.

The parts and practise of these four Offices, is to receive all complaints and actions whatsoever, that are brought out of their severall Chetfirds and quarters, & to informe them to the Emperours Counsell. Likewise to send direction againe to those that are vnder them in their saide Prouinces, for all matters given in charge by the Emperor and his Counsell, to be done or put in execution within their Precincts.

For the ordering of every particular Prouince of these four Chetfirds, there is appointed appointed one of these Dukes; which were reckoned before in the lowest degree of their Nobility, and which are resident in the head townes of the said Prouinces. Whereof every one hath ioyned with him in Commission, a Dyack or Secretary, to assist him, or rather to direct him. For in the executing of their Commission, the Dyack doth all.

The parts of their Commission are these in effect. First, to heare and determine in all ciuill matters within their Precinct. To which purpose, they haue vnder them certaine Officers, as Gubney Starets, or Coroners, who, besides the tryall of selfe-murders, are to attach Fellons: and the Soudia or vnder-Iustices, who themselves also may heare and determine in all matters of the same nature, among the Country people of their owne Wards or Bayliwicks: but so, that in case either party dissent, they may appeale, and goe farther to the Duke & Dyack, that reside within the head towne. From whom also, they may remove the matter to the higher Court at Mosko, of the Emperours Counsell, where lie all appeales. They haue vnder them also Sotskey Starets, that is, Aldermen or Bailiffs of the hundredes.

Secondly, in all criminall matters, as theft, murder, treason, &c. they haue authority to apprehend, to examine, and to imprison the malefactor, & so having received perfect evidence and information of the cause, they are to send it (ready drawne and orderly digested) vp to the Mosko, to the officer of the Chetfird whereunto that Prouince is annexed: by whom it is referred and propounded to the Emperours Counsell. But to determine in any matter criminall, or to do execution vpon the party offending; is more then their Commission will allow them to do.

Thirdly, if there bee any publike service to be done within that Prouince, (as the publishing of any Law, or common order, by way of Proclamation, collecting of taxes, and impositions for the Emperour, mustering of Soldiours, and sending them forth at the day, and to the place assigned by the Emperour or his Counsell) all these and such like, pertaine vnto their charge.

These Dukes and Dyacks are appointed to their place by the Emperour himselfe, and are changed ordinarily at every years end; except vpon some speciall liking or suit, the time be prolonged for a year or two more. They are men of the felices of no credite, nor fauour with the people, where they gouerne, being neither borne, nor brought vp among them, nor yet hauing inheritance of their owne there, or elsewhere. Onely of the Emperour they haue for that service, an hundred Marks a year he that hath most, some 50. some but 30. Which maketh them more suspected and odious to the people, because being so bare, and comming fresh and hungry vpon them; lightly every year they racke and spoile them, without all regard of iustice, or conscience. Which is easily tolerated by the chiefe Officers of the Chetfirds, to the end they may rob them againe, & haue a better booty when they call them to account: which commonly they do at the end of their service, making an advantage of their iniustice, & oppression ouer the poore people. There are few of them, but they come to the Rudkey or whippe when their time is ended, which themselves (for the most part) do make account of. And therefore they furnish themselves, with all the spoile they can for the time of their gouernment; that they may haue for both turnes, as well for the Emperor, and Lord of the Chetfird, as to reserve some good part for themselves.

They that are appointed to gouerne abroad, are men of this quality: saue that in the four border Townes (that are of greatest importance) are set men of more speciall valor & trust, two in every towne. Whereof one is cuer of the Emperours priuy Counsell. These 4. border Townes, are Smolensko, Polsko, Nouograd, & Cazan, whereof three lie towards the Polonian & Sweaden, one bordereth farre off vpon the Chrim Tartar. These haue larger Commission, then the other Dukes of the Prouinces that I spake of before, and may do execution in criminall matters. Which is thought behoouefull for the Commonwealth: for incident occasions that may happen vpon the borders, that are far off, and may not stay for direction, about every occurrent and particular matter from the Emperor and his Counsell. They are changed every year (except as before) and haue for their stipend, 700. rubbels a year he that hath most: some haue but four hundred rubbels. Many of these places, that are of greatest importance, and almost the whole Country, is managed (at this time) by the Godanoes & their Clients.

The City of Mosko (that is the Emperors seat) is governed altogether by the Emperors Council. All matters there (both ciuill and criminal) are heard and determined in the severall Courts, helde by some of the said Council, that reside there all the yeare long.

The government of Mosko.

Onely for their ordinary matters (as buildings, reparations, keeping of their streets decent and cleane, collections, leuying of taxes, impositions & such like) are appointed two Gentlemen, and two Dyacks or Secretaries, who hold a Court together for the ordering of such matters. This is called the Zemsky house. If any towns-man suspect his servant of theft or like matter, hither he may bring him, to have him examined upon the Padkey, or other torture. Besides these two Gentlemen and Secretaries, that order the whole City, there are Starists or Aldermen for every severall Company. The Alderman hath his Sotskey or Constable, & the Constable hath certaine Decetskeis or Decurions under him, which have the oversight of ten householders a peece, whereby every disorder is sooner spide, and the common service hath the quicker dispatch. The whole number of Citizens (poore and rich) are reduced into Companies. The chiefe Officers (as the Dyacks & Gentlemen) are appointed by the Emperor himselfe, the Starist by the Gentlemen & Dyacks, the Sotskey by the Starist or Alderman, & the Decetskeis by the Constables.

This manner of government of their Provinces and Townes, if it were aswell set for the giving of iustice indifferently to all sorts, as it is to prevent innovations, by keeping of the Nobility within order, and the Commons in subjection; it might seeme (in that kinde) to bee no bad, nor vnpolitique way, for the containing of so large a Common-wealth, of that breadth and length as is the Kingdome of Russia. But the oppression and slavery is so open, and so great, that a man would marvel, how the Nobility & people should suffer themselves to be brought vnder it; while they had any meanes to auoid and repulse it: or being so strengthened as it is at this present, how the Emperors themselves can be content to practise the same, with so open iniustice & oppression of their subjects, being themselves of a Christian profession.

By this it appeareth, how hard a matter it were, to alter the state of the Ruffe Government, as now it standeth. First, because they haue none of the Nobility able to make head. As for the Lords of the four Chetfirds or Tetrarchies, they are men of no Nobility, but Dyacks, advanced by the Emperour, depending on his fauour, & attending onely about his owne person. And for the Dukes that are appointed to gouerne vnder them, they are but men of a titular dignity (as was said before) of no power, authority, nor credit, save that which they haue out of the Office, for the time they enjoy it. Which doth purchase them no fauour, but rather hatred of the people, forasmuch as they see that they are set over the, not so much for any care to do them right and iustice, as to keep them vnder in a miserable subjection, and to take the slesce from them, not once in the yeare (as the owner from the sheepe) but to poule and clip them all the yeare long. Besides, the authority and rule which they beare, is rent and diuided into many small pieces, being diuers of them in euery great Shire, limited besides with a very short time: which giueth the no scope to make any strength, nor to contriue such an enterprize, if haply they intended any matter of inuouation.

As for the common people (as may better appeare in the description of their state and quality afterwards set downe) besides their want of armour and practise of war (which they are kept from of purpose) they are robbed continually both of their hearts and money, (besides other meanes) sometimes by pretence of some service to bee done for the common defence, sometimes without any shew at all, of any necessity of Common-wealth or Prince. So that there is no meanes eyther for Nobility or people, to attempt any inuouation, so long as the Military forces of the Emperour (which are the number of 8000. at the least in continuall pay) hold themselves fast and sure vnto him, & to the present fate. Which needs they must do, being of the quality of Soldiours, and enjoying withall that free liberty, of wronging and spoiling the Commons at their pleasure, which is permitted them of purpose to make them haue a liking of the present state. As for the agreement of the Soldiours and Commons, it is a thing not to be feared, being of so opposite & contrary practise much one to the other. This desperate state of things at home, maketh the people (for the most part) to wish for some forraigne inuasion, which they suppose to be the onely meanes, to rid them of the heauy yoke of this tyrannous gouernment.

The Emperors of Russia giue the name of Counsellor, to diuers of their chiefe Nobility, rather for honours sake, the for any vie they make of the about their matters of state. These are called Boiarsens, without any addition, and may be called Counsellors at large. For they are sildom or neuer called to any publike consultation. They which are of his special and priuy Counsell indeed (whom he vseth daily and ordinarily for all publike matters pertaining to the State) haue the addition of Dumny, and are named Dumny Boiarsen, or Lords of the Council, their Office or sitting, Boarsina Dumna.

Their names (at this present) are these in their order. First, Knez Feodor Ioanowich Meshyslosky. 2. Knez Iuan Michailowich Glinkoy. 3. Knez Vasilie Iuanowich Suskoy Scopin. These three are accounted to be of greater birth then wisdome, taken in (as may seeme) for that ende, rather to furnish the place with their honours & presence, then with their aduice or Counsel. 4. Knez Vasilie Iuanowich Suskoy, thought to bee more wise then the other of his name. 5. Knez Feodor Michailowich. 6. Knez Micheta Romanowich Trowbetsky. 7. Knez Timophy Romanowich Trowbetsky. 8. Knez Andriew Gregorowich Curakine. 9. Knez Demetrie Iuanowich Forefine. 10. Knez Feodor Iuanowich Forefine. 11. Bodan Iuanowich Sabarone. 12. Knez Iuan Vasilowich. 13. Knez Feodor Demetirwih Sheftinoue. 14. Knez Feodor Michailowich Troycomoue. 15. Iuan Buterlyuey. 16. Demetrie Iuanowich Godanoe. 17. Boris Federowich Godanoe, brother to the Empresse. 18. Stephan Vasilowich Godanoe. 19. Gregorie Vasilowich Godanoe. 20. Iuan Vasilowich Godanoe. 21. Feodor Sheremitoue. 22. Andriew Petrowich Clefbenina. 23. Ignatie Petrowich Tatiloue. 24. Romain Michailowich Pena. 25. Demetshy Iuanowich Cheremissen. 26. Romain Vasilowich Alferioue. 27. Andriew Shalcaloue.

Four Secretaries.

All matters referred to the Empresse Brother, and sue or sue more.

The Offices of Records.

The foure last of these are called Dumny Deiakys, or Lord Secretaries. These are all of the Emperours priuy Counsell, though but few of them are called to any consultation, for that all matters are aduised and determined vpon by Boris Federowich Godanoe, Brother to the Empresse; with some five or six more, whom it pleaseth him to call. If they come, they are rather to heare, then to giue counsell, and do to demean themselves. The matters occurrent which are of state, done within the Realme, are informed them (at their fittings) by the Lords of the four Chetfirds, or Tetrarchies. Whereof mention is made in the Chapter concerning the Government of their Provinces. Who bring in all such letters as they receiue from the Dukes, Dyacks, Captaines, and other Officers of the Cities and Castles, pertaining to their severall quarter or Chetfird, with other aduertisements, and informe the Council of them.

The like is done by the chiefe Officer of euery severall Office of Record: who may come into the Council Chamber, & informe them, as occasion incident to his Office doth require. Besides matters of State, they consider of many private causes, informed by way of supplication, in very great numbers. Whereof some they entertaine and determine, as the cause or meanes can procure fauour. Some they send to the Offices whereto they pertain, by common course of Law. Their ordinary daies for their sitting, are Mondais, Wensdaies, and Fridaies. Their time of meeting, is commonly euen a clocke in the morning. If there be any extraordinary occasion, that requieth consultation on some other day, they haue warning by the Clarke of the Council, called Dorofy Bushew, who receiueh order from the Rosera or high Constable of the Realm, to call them together at the time appointed.

For the receiuing of Customes, & other Rents belonging vnto the Crowne, they are appointed diuers vnder-Officers, which deliuer ouer the same into the head Treasury. The first is the office of Dwoertsona or Steward of the household. The second is the Office of the Chetfirds:

Of the Emperors Customs and other Reuenues.

The second Office of receipt called the Chetfirds (being diuided into four feuerall parts, as before was faid) hath foure head Officers: which, besides the ordering & gouernement of the Shires, contained within their feuerall Chetfirds ; haue this also as a part of their office, to receiue the Tagla and Podat belonging to the Emperour, that riseth out of the foure Chetfirds or Quarters. The Tagla is a yearly rent or imposition, raised vpon euery Wite or Measure of graine that groweth within the Land, gathered by sworn men, and brought into the Office. The Wite containeth 60. Chetfirds . Euery Chetfird is three common bushells, or little less. The Podat is an ordinary rent of money, imposed vpon euery Soake, or Hundred within the whole Realme.
The Tenant of the Crowne and their rent.	As touching the first, which is the Office of the Steward, it receiueh all the Rents of the Emperours Inheritance, or Crowne Land, which they call Pochin . The Pochin or Crowne land, containeth in it 36. Townes, with the Territories or Hundreds belonging vnto them. Whereof the chiefe that yeeld the greatest rents, are these: Alexandrisca, Corelskey, Otser, Slobodey, Danielska, Maifalskoy, Chura, Sametska, Strararoufe, Branfoue, &c. The Inhabitants or Tenants of these and the other Townes, pay some rent-money, some other rent duties (called Obrokey) as certain Chetfirds , or measures of Graine, Wheate, Rye, Barley, Oates, &c. or of other victuall, as Oxen, Sheepe, Swans, Geese, Hares, Hennes, wilde Fowle, Fish, Hay, Wood, Honey, &c. Some are bound to fowe for the Emperours prouision, certain Akers of ground, and to make the Corne ready for his vse: hauing for it an allowance of certain Akers of ground for their owne proper vse. Prouision for the Household.	This prouision for the household, specially of graine serued in by the Tenants, is a great deale more then is spent in his house, for in other allowance serued out in luery, or for the Emperours honour, called Schalananey : for which vse there is bestowed very much, both in graine, and other victuall. This surplus of prouision is sold by the Steward to the best hand, and runneth into the Emperours treasury.	Sums of money raised by Tagla and Podat yearly.
Difference of the Father & Sons times for prouision.	In the time of Iuan Vasiluich , Father to this Emperour (who kept a more Princely and bountifull house then the Emperour now doth) this ouerplus of graine, and other Incomes into the Stewards Office, yeilded to his Treasury, not past 60. thousand rubbels yearly; but riseth now by good husbanding of the Steward Gregory Pafiluich Godelme , to 230. thousand rubbels a year. And this by the meanes of the Emperesse, and her kindred, specially (Boris Federuich Godelme) that account it all their owne, that runneth into the Emperours treasure. Much of this surpluse that riseth out of the rent prouision, is employed to the payment of the wages of his household Officers, which are very many attending at home, and purueying	The Office of Bulsha Prechod, or great Income.

The custome of the rest that are Townes of trade, is sometimes more, sometimes lesse, as their trafficke and dealings with commodities too and fro, falleth out for the year.	The Office of Raisbonia.
Rent of the Bath houses	This may be said for certaine, that the three tables of receipts, belonging to this Office of Bulsha Prechod , wher they receiue least, account for thus much, viz. The first table 160000. rubbels. The second table 90000. rubbels. The third 70000. rubbels. So that there cometh into the Office of Bulsha Prechod , at the least reckoning, as appeareth by their Bookes of Customes) out of these and other Townes, & maketh the sum of 340000. rubbels a year. Besides this custome out of the townes of trade, there is receiued by this Office of Bulsha Prechod , the yearly rent of the common Bath-houses, and Cabacks or drinking houses, which pertaine to the Emperour. Which (though it be vncertaine for the iust summe, yet because it is certaine and an ordinary matter, that the Raffe will bathe himselfe aswell within as without) yeeldeth a large Rent to the Emperours Treasury.	The Office of Raisbonia.
Rent out of the Iudiciall Office.	There is besides, a certaine mulct, or penalty, that groweth to the Emperour out of euery iudgement, or sentence that passeth in any of his Courts of Record in all ciuill matters. This penalty, or mulct is twenty Dingues or pence, vpon euery rubble or marke, and so tenne in the hundred. Which is paid by the party that is comitt by law. Hee hath, besides for euery name, contained in the Writ that passeth out of these Courts, two Alceen and Alceen is five pence sterling, or thereabouts. All these Offices, to wit, the Office of the Steward, the four Chetfirds, and the Bulbas Preboud, deliver in their receipts to the head treasury, that lyeth within the Emperours house or Castle at the Mosko. Where lye all his monies, jewels, crowns, scepters, plate, and such like, the chests, hutches, and bagges being signed by the Emperours themselves with their owne Seale. Though (at this time) the Lord Borriu Federowich Godanoe, his Seale and oversight supplieth for the Emperour, as in all other things. The vnder-Officer at this time, is one Stepan Vasilowich Godanoe, Cousin-germane to the said Borriu, who hath two Clerks allowed to serue vnder him in the Office.

The summe that groweth to the Emperours treasury in money only, for every year.

1. Out of the Stewards Office above the expence of his house 230000. Rubbels.
2. Out of the four Chetfirds for sake and head money, 400000. Rubbels.
3. Out of the Bulbas Preboud Office, or great Income, for custome, and other rents, 800000. Rubbels.

Summe: 1430000. Rubbels deere, besides all charges for his house, & ordinary salaries of his foldours otherwise discharged.

His yearly benefit by Furs and other duties.

But besides this reuenue, that is paid all in money to the Emperours Treasury, he receiveth yearly in Furs, and other duties to a great value, out of Siberia, Petchora, Permia, and other places, which are solde or batted away for some forraigne commodities, to the Turks, Persians, Armenians, Georgians and Bouharians Merchants, that trade within his Countreys, besides others of Christendome. What it maketh in the whole (though the value cannot be set downe precisely, as being a thing casual, as the commodity may be got) it may be guessed, by that which was gathered the last yeare out of Siberia for the Emperours custome, viz. 466. timber of Sables, fine timber of Matrones, 180. blacke Foxes, besides other commodities.

Of furs, confiscations, & impositions on Monasteries, &c.

To these may be added their seizures, and confiscations vpon such as are in displeasure, which rise to a great summe. Besides other their extraordinary impositions, and exactions done vpon their Officers, Monasteries, &c. nor for any apparent necessity or vse of the Prince or Common-wealth, but of will and custome: yet with some pretence of a Scythian, that is, grosse and barbarous policy (as may appeare) by these few Sophismata, or counterfeit policies, put in practise by the emperours of Russia, all tending to this end, to rob their people, and to enrich their Treasury. To this purpose this by-word was vsed by the late Emperour Iuan Vasilowich: That his people were like to his beard. The officer shauen the thicker it would grow. Or like sheepe, that must needs bee shorne once a yeare at the least: to keepe them from being over-laden with their Wool.

Meanes used to draw the wealth of the Land into the Emperours Treasury.

First.

TO prevent no extortions, exactions, or bribes whatsoeuer, done vpon the Commons by their Dukes, Diacks, or other Officers in their Prouinces; but to suffer them to go on till their time be expired, and to sueke themselves full. Then to call them to the Praueish (or whip) for their behavior, and to beate out of them all, or the most part of the booty, (as the Hony from the Bee) which they haue wring from the Commons; and to turne it into the Emperours Treasury, but neuer any thing back againe to the right owners, how great or euident soeuer the injury be. To this end the needy Dukes, and Diacks, that are sent into their Prouinces, serue the turne very well, being changed so often (to wit) once a yeare: where, in respect of their owne, and the quality of the people (as before was said) they might bee continued for little longer time, without all feare of intiguation. For comming still fresh vpon the Commons, they sueke more eagerly: like Thierius the Emperours eyes, that came new still vpon all olde fores. To whom he was wont to compare his Pratirs; and other prouinciall Officers.

The whip or dayned for all deniers or confellers.

Secondly,

Secondly.

TO make of these Officers (that haue robbed their people) sometimes a publique example, if any be more notorious then the rest; that the Emperour may seeme to dislike the oppressions done to his people, and transerre the fault to his ill Officers.

As among diuers other, was done by the late Emperour Iuan Vasilowich, to a Diack in one of his Prouinces; that besides many other extortions and bribes (had taken a Goose ready dressed full of money. The man was brought to the market place in Mosko. The Emperour himselfe present, made an Oration: These good people are they, that would eate you vpp like bread, &c. Then asked he his Polachies or executioners, who could cut vp a Goose? and commanded one of them first to cut off his legges, about the middlest of the shinne, then his armes about his elbowes (demanding of him still, if Goose flesh were good meate) in the end to choppe off his head: that he might haue the right fashion of a Goose ready dressed. This might seeme to haue bene a tollerable peece of Iustice (as Iustice goeth in Russia) except his subtil end, to couer his owne oppressions.

A Goose ready dressed full of money for a bribe.

Cutting vp of a Goose.

An unning coiner for taxations.

Superstitious charitable and bounde given to Monasteries to a polite end.

Thirdly.

TO make an open shew of want, when any great taxe, or imposition is to wardes. As was done by this Emperour Theodore Iuanowich, by the aduise of some about him, even at the beginning of his reigne: when being left very rich (as it was thought) by his father, he folde the most of his plate, and stamped some into boynes, that he might seeme to want money. Whereupon presently out came a taxation.

Fourthly.

TO suffer their subiects to giue freely to the Monasteries (which for their superstition very many do especially in their last Wills) and to lay vp their money and substance in them, to keepe it more safe. Which all is permitted them without any restraint or prouiso, as was and is in some Countreys of Christendome. Wherby their Monasteries grow to exceeding great wealth. This they doe, to haue the money of the Realme better stored together, and more ready for their hand, when they list to take it. Which many times is doone without any noyse: the Fryers being content, rather to part from somewhat (as the encrease groweth) then to loofe all at once. Which they were made to doubt of in the other Emperours dayes.

To this end Iuan Vasilowich, late Emperour vsed a very strange practise; that few Princes would haue doone in their greatest extremities. Hee resigned his kingdom to one Felica Kues Simeon, the Emperours sonne of Cazan: as though he meant to draw himselfe from all publike doings, to a quiet priuate life. Towards the end of the yeare, he caused this new King to call in all Charters granted to Bishopricks and Monasteries, which they had enioyed many hundred yeares before. Which were all cancelled. This done, (as in dislike of the fact, and of the misgouernement of the new King) he resumed his Scepter, and so was content (as in fauour vnto the Church and Religious men) that they should renew their Charters, and take them of himselfe: reseruing and annexing to the Crowne so much of their Lands, as himselfe thought good.

By this practise, he wrang from the Bishopricks, and Monasteries (besides the lands which he annexed to the Crowne) an huge masse of money, from some forty, from some fifty, from some an hundred thousand rubbels. And this, as well for the inteease of his treasure, as to abate the euill opinion of his hard gouernment, by a shew of worse in another man. Wherein his strange spirit is to be noted, that being hated of his Subiects (as himselfe knew well enough) yet would adienture such a practise, to set an other in his saddle, that might haue ridde away with his horse, whilst himselfe walked by on foote.

A strange practise to get money.

Such a practise as hath beene foldome heard of.

Fifthly.

TO send their messengers into the prouinces, or Shires where the speciall commodities of their countrey grow: as furs, wake, hony, &c. There to foretell and ingrosse, sometimes one whole commodity, sometime two, or more, taking them at small prices what themselves list, and selling them againe at an excessive Foretelling and engrossing commodities in a strange manner.

rate

rate to their owne Marchants, and vnto Marchants strangers. If they shall refuse to buy them, then to enforce them vnto it.

The like is doone when any commodity, eyther natiue, or forreine (as cloth of golde, broad-cloth, &c.) thus engrossed by the Emperour, and receiued into his Treasurie, chaunceth to decay, or marre by long lying, or some other casualty. Which is forced vpon the marchants, to bee bought by them at the Emperours price, whether they will, or no.

Not long since was engrossed all the Waxe of the Countrey; so that no man might deal with that commodity, but the Emperour onely.

Sixthly.

TO take vp and engrosse (in like sort) sometime forreine commodities (as Silkes, Cloth, Lead, Pearle, &c.) brought into his kingdome by Turkish marchants, Armenians, Bougharians, Poles, English, and others. And then to force his Marchants; to buy them of his Officers at his owne price.

Seauenthly.

TO make a Monopolly (for the time) of such commodities as are payed him for Rent, or Custome, and to inhance the price of them, as Furrer, Cotne, Wood, &c. What time, none must sell of the same kinde of commodity, vntill the Emperours be all sold. By this meane hee maketh of his Rent, Corn, and other production of victuall (as before was sayd) about two hundred thousand rubbels or more a year. Of his Rent, Wood, Hay &c. thirtie thousand rubbels, or thereabouts.

Eighthly.

In euery great Towne of his Realme, he hath a Caback, or drinking house, where Aqua vite is sold (which they call Russine, Mead, Beere, &c.) Out of these he receiueh Rent, that amounteth to a great summe of money. Some yeeld sight hundred, some pine hundred, some a thousand, some two thousand, or three thousand rubbels a year. Wherin, besides the safe and dishonorable meane to encrease his Treasurie, many foule faultes are committed.

The poore labouring man and Attificer, many times spends all from his wife, and children. Some vnto lay in twenty, thirty, forty rubbels, or more into the Caback, and vowe themselves to the pot, till all that be spent. And all this (as hee will say) is for the honour of Hopodare, or the Emperour. You shall haue many there, that haue drunke all away euen to the very skinn, or to walke naked (whome they call Naga.) While they are in the Caback, none may call them forth, whatsoeuer cause there be; because he hindereth the Emperours reuenue.

Ninthly.

TO cause some of his Boiars, or Nobles of his Court, (whom he vseth vpon trust) that haue houses in the Mosca, to faile themselves robbed. Then to send for the Zemsky men, or Aldermen of the City, and to command them to finde out the robbery. In default of not finding it, to prauce or fesse the Citie for their misgouernement in eight thousand, nine thousand, or tenne thousand rubbels at a time. This many times is and hath bene practiced.

Tenthly.

IN these exactions, to shew their foueraignie, sometime they vse very plaine, and yet strange cauillations. As was that of Iuan Vasilowich, father to this Emperour, after this sort. He sent into Permia for certaine loads of Cedar wood, whereof he knew right well, that none grew in that Countrey. The Inhabitants returned answer; they could find none there. Whereupon he ceased their Countrey in a whole thousand rubbels; as if they concealed the commodity of purpose. Againe, he sent to the Citie of Mosca to provide for him a Colpacke, or measure full of lue Fleas, for a medicine. They returned answer, that the thing was impossible. And if they could get them, yet they could not measure them, for leaping out. Whereupon, hee praued or beat out of their thinnes, seuen thousand rubbels for a mule.

By like cauillation, hee extorted from his Nobilitie thirtie thousand rubbels, because he missed of his game; when hee went a hunting for the Hare: as if they hunting and murdering of Hares had bin the the cause of it. Which the Nobilitie (as the manner is) praued presently againe vpon the Moskies, or common people of the Countrey. This may seem a strange kinde of extortion, by such pleasant cauils, to fleece his poore subiects in good sadnesse: but that it agreeth with the qualitie of those Emperours, and the miserable subiection of that poore Countrey.

These, and such like meanes are practiced by the Emperours of Russia, to encrease their Treasurie.

The condition of the Commons and vulgar sort of people, may partly be vnderstood by that which hath already bin sayd, concerning the manner of their gouernement, and the state of the Nobilitie in their owne degrees and places with the ordering of their Prouinces, and chiefe townes of the land. And first touching their libertie, how it standeth with them, it may appeare by this: that they are reckoned in no degree at all, nor haue anie suffrage nor place in their Zabore, or high Court of Parliament, where theyr lawes and publique orders are concluded vpon. Which commonly tend to the oppression of the commons. For the other two degrees, that is to say, of the Nobilitie, and Cleargie, which haue a vote in the Parliaments (though farre from that libertie, that ought to be in common consultations for the publike benefite, according vnto the measure and proportion of their degrees) are well contented, that the whole burthen shall light vpon the commons, so that they may ease theyr owne shoulders by laying all vpon them.

Againe, into what feruile condition their libertie is brought, not onely to the Prince but to the Nobles and Gentlemen of the Countrey (who themselves also are but feruile, specially of late yeares) it may farther appeare by their owne acknowledgements in their supplications, and other writings to any of the Nobles or chiefe officers of the Emperours. Wherein they name and subscribe themselves Kolobey, that is to say, their villaines or bondslaves; as they of the Nobilitie doe vnto the Emperour. This may truly be sayd of them, that there is no seruant or bondslave more awed by his Maister, nor kept downe in a more feruile subiection, then the poore people are, and that vniuersally, not onely by the Emperour, but by his Nobility, chiefe Officers, and Soldiours. So that when a poore Moskic meeteth with any of them vpon the high way; hee must turne himselfe about, as not daring to looke him on the face, and fall downe, with knocking of his head to the very ground, as hee doth vnto his Idoll.

Secondly, as concerning the lands, goods, and other possessions of the commons, they answer the name, and lie common indeede, without any fence against the rapine, and spoyle, not onely of the highest, but of his Nobilitie, Officers and Soldiours. Besides, the taxes, customes, seizures, and other publike exactions, doone vpon them by the Emperour: they are so racked and polled by the Nobles, Officers and Messengers sent abroad by the Emperour in his publike affaires, especially in the Tammes (as they do stearme them) and thorough-fare townes, that you shall haue many villages and townes of halfe a mile, and a mile long, stand all vn-inhabited: the people being fled all into other places, by reason of the extreme vfrage, and exactions on them done. So that in the way towards Mosca, betwixt Pologda and Tarnuslaney, (which is two nineties, after theyr reckoning, little more then an hundred miles) there are in sight fiftie Duuiennes or Villages at the least, some halfe a mile, some a mile long (that stand vacant) and desolate without any Inhabitant. The like is in all other places of the Realme, as they that haue travelled the Countrey, well can report.

The great oppression ouer the poore Commons, maketh them to haue no courage in following their trades: for that the more they haue, the more danger they are in, not onely of their goods, but of their liues also. And if they haue anie thing, they conceal it all they can, sometimes conuey it into Monasteries, sometimes hiding it vnder the ground, and in woods, as men are wont to doe, where they are in feare of forreine inuasion. In somuch, that (many times) you shall see them afraid to be knowne to any Boiaren or Gentleman, of such commodities as they haue to sell. They haue bene scene sometimes, when they haue layed open their commodities for a liking (as theyr principall Furrer and such like) to looke still behinde them, and towards euery doore: as men in some feare, that looked to be set vpon, and surprized by some enemy. Whereof being asked the cause, it was found to be this, that they haue doubted, least some Nobleman or Sinabouarfky of the Emperour, had bene in company, and so laide a traine for them, to pray vpon their commodities perforce.

This maketh the people (thogh otherwise hardned to beare any toyle) to giue themselves much to idlenesse and drinking: as caring for no more, then from hand to mouth. And hercof it cometh that the commodities of Russia (as was sayde before) as Waxe, Tallow, Hydes, Flax, Henpe, &c.) grow and goe abroad in farre lesse plenty then they were wont to doe: because the people being oppressed and spoyled of theyr gettings, are discouraged from their Labours. Yet this one thing is much to be noted, that in all this oppression, there were three Brethren Marchants of late, that traded together with one stocke in common, that were found to be worth 300000. rubbels in money, beside lands, cattels, and other commodities. Which may partly be imputed to their dwellings far off from the eie of the Court, viz. in Wichida, a thousand miles from Mosko, and more. The same men were said (by those that knewe them) to haue set on worke all the yeare long, ten thousand men in making of salt, carriages by Cart and Boate, hewing of Wood, and such like; besides fife thousand bondslaves at the least, to inhabit & Till their land.

The people made yde against theyr wills.

Of three brethren Marchants.

Not many other such men in the whole Country

They had also their Physicians, Chirurgions, Apothecaries, and all manner of Artificers of Deutches and others, belonging vnto them. They were said to haue payed to the Emperour (for Custome) to the summe of three and twenty thousand Rubbels a yeare (for which cause they were suffered to enioy their trade) besides the maintaining of certaine Garrisons on the borders of Siberia, which were neere vnto them. Wherein the Emperour was content to vfe their purse, till such time as they had gotten ground in Siberia, and made it habitable, by burning & cutting downe woodes from Wichida to Perm, about a thousand Verst, and then tooke it all away from them perforce.

But this in the end being enuied, and disdained, as a matter not standing with their policie, to haue any so great, specially a Moussick: the Emperour beganne first to pull from them by peeces, sometimes twenty thousand rubbels at a time; till in the end, their sonnes that followed were well eased of their stocke, & had but small part of their Fathers substance: the rest being drawne all into the Emperours Treasury. Their names were Iacoue, Gregory, and Simon, the sonnes of Omyka.

Fleeing the three brethren

For the quality of their people otherwise, though there seemeth to be in them some aptnesse to receiue an Art (as appeareth by the naturall wits in the men, and very children) yet they excell in no kinde of common Art, much lesse in any Learning, or litterall kinde of knowledge; which they are kept from of purpose, as they are also from all Military practise: that they may be fitter for the seruile condition wherein still they are, & haue neither reason, nor valor to attempt innouation.

The tiranicke oppression of their very minds and wits

For this purpose also, they are kepte from trauielling, that they may learne nothing, nor see the fashions of other countreys abroad. You shall seldom see a Russe a Traveller, except he be with some Ambassador, or that he make a scape out of his Countrey. Which hardly hee can do, by reason of the borders that are watched so narrowly, and the punishment for any such attempt, which is death if he be taken, and all his goods confiscate. Onely they learne to write, and to reade, and that verie few of them. Neyther doe they suffer any stranger willingly to come into their Realme out of any ciuill Countrey, for the same cause; farther then necessity of vntering their commodities, and taking in of forraigne, doeth enforce them to doe.

The tiranous use of the Emperour concerning his State

And therefore not long since, they consulted, about the removing of all Marchants strangers to the border townes, to abide and haue their residency there, and to be more wary, in admitting other strangers (hereafter) into the In-land parts of the Realme; for feare of infection with better manneis and qualities, then they haue of their owne.

For the same purpose also, they are kept within the bounds of theyr degree, by the Law of their Country: so that the sonne of a Moussick, Artificer, or Husbandman, man, is euer a Moussick, Artificer, &c. and hath no meanes to aspire any higher: except (haueing learned to write and reade) bigattaine to the preferment of a Priest or Dyacke.

O' their Language taught as it were to the Slaunonian.

Their Language is all one with the Slaunonian, which is thought to haue bene deuised from the Russe tongue, rather then the Russe from the Slaunonian. For the people called Sclani, are knowne to haue had their beginning out of Sarmatia, and to haue rearm'd themselves of their conquest Sclauus (that is) famous or Glorious, of the word Sclana, which in the Russe and Sclauonian tongue, signifieth as much as Glory, or Fame. Though afterwards, being subdued and trod vpon by diuers Nations, the Italians (their Neighbours) haue turned the word to a contrary signification, and teame euery seruant or pezzant, by the name of Sclau; as did the Romanes by the Getes and Syrians, for the same reason. The Russe Character or Letter, is no other then the Greeke, somewhat distorted.

Gr. l. in. 26. Ioseph in An. ap. l. in. lib. 1. cap. 14.

And because we were speaking of Sarmatia, whence this people seeme to deriue themselves: Some haue thought, that the name of Sarmatia, was first taken from one Sarmates, whom Moses and Iosephus call Afarmathes, sonne to Iocktan, and Nephew to Heber, of the posterity of Sem. But this seemeth to be nothing, but a coniecture, taken from the likenesse of the name Afarmathes. For, the dwelling of all Iocktans posterity is described by Moses, to haue been betwixt Mescha or Mafius (an hill of the Ammonites) & Sephace, neere to the Riuer Euphrates. Which maketh it very vnlkely, that Afarmathes should plant any Colonies so farre off, in the North, and North-West Countreies.

Subiection kept in seruile subjection.

Concerning their Trades, Diet, Apparel, and such like, it is to be noted where we speake of their priuate behaviour. This order, that bindeth euery man to keepe his ranke and feudal degree wherein his forefathers liued before him, is more meete to keepe the subiects in a seruile subiection, and so, apt for this and like Common-wealths, then to aduance any vertue, or to breed any rare or excellent quality in Nobility or Commons. As hauiug no farther reward nor preferment, whereunto they may bend their endeauours, and employ themselves to aduance their estate: but rather procuring more danger to themselves, the more they excell in any noble or principall quality.

CHAP. III.

Thirdly, we discourse on their Politicke and Iudiciall proceeding. Also the Emperours powers for war, and their salaries: with their Mustering, Munition; and Military provision. Their Colonies, bordering Friends or Enemies, either in Peace or warre.

Their Courts of Ciuill Iustice, for matters of Contract, and other of like sort, are of three kinds, the one being subiect vnto the other by way of Appeal. The lowest court (that seemeth to be appointed for some ease to the subiects) is the Office of the Gubnoy Starost, that signifieth an Alderman, and of the Sotsky Starost, or Bayliffe of the Soake or hundred, wherof I spake before in the ordering of the Provinces. These may end matters among their Neighbours, within their Soake, or feuerall Hundred, where they are appointed vnder the Dukes and Dyackes of the Provinces, to whome the parties may remouue their matter, if they cannot be agreed by the said Gubnoy, or Sotsky Starost.

The Aldermans Court.

The second is kept in the head townes of euery Province or Shire, by the said Dukes and Dyackes, that are deputies to the four Lords of the Cheftirds, as before was sayde. From these four Courtes, they may appeale, and remouue theyr suites to the cheefe Court, that is kept at Mosko, where are resident the officers of the four Cheftirds. These are the cheefe Iustices or Iudges, euery of them in all ciuill matters that growe within their feuerall Cheftird or quarter, and may bee either commenced originally before them, or prosecuted out of the inferior Courts of the Shires, by way of appeale.

The Dukes & Dyacks Court

Their commencing and proceeding in ciuill actions, is on this manner. First, the

The high Court of Mosko.

the plaintiffe putteth vp his supplication, wherein hee declareth the effecte of his cause, or wrong done vnto him. Whereupon is granted vnto him a Præsumptio or warrant, which he deliuereth to the Præsumptio or Sergeant, to doe the arrest vpon the party whom hee meaneth to impleade. Who vpon the Arrest, is to put in sureties to answer at the day appointed, or els standeth at the Sergeants deuotion, to be kept safe by such means as he thinketh good.

The Sergeants are many, & excell for their hard and cruell dealing toward their prisoners; commonly they clappe Irons vpon them, as many as they can beare, to wring out from them some larger Fees. Though it be but for sixe pence, you shal see them go with chaines on their legges, armes, and necke. When they come before the Iudge, the Plaintiffe beginneth to declare his matter, after the content of his supplication. As for Attorneys, Counselors, Procurators and aduocates to plead their cause for them, they haue no such order; but euery man is to tell his owne Tale, and pleade for himselfe so well as he can.

If they haue any witness or other euidence, they produce it before the Iudge. If they haue none, or if the truth of the cause cannot so well be discerned by the plea, or euidence on both parts; then the Iudge asketh either party (which he thinketh good, Plaintiffe or Defendant) whether he will kisse the Crosse, vpon that which he anoucheth, or denieth. He that taketh the Crosse (being so offered by the Iudge) is accounted cleare, and carryeth away the matter. This Ceremonie is not done within the Court or Office, but the party is carried to the Church by an Officer, and there the Ceremonie is done: the money in the meane while hanging vpon a mayle, or else lying at the Idoles feete, ready to be deliuered to the party so soon as he hath kissed the Crosse, before the saide Idoll.

This kissing of the Crosse (called Cren-Hina Chelouania) is as their corporal oath; and accounted (with them) a verie holie thing, which no man will dare to violate, or prophane with a false Allegation. If both parties offer to kisse the Crosse in a contradictory matter, then they draw lottes.

The better Lotte is supposed to haue the right, and beareth away the matter. So the party conuicted is adiudged to pay the debt or penalty whatsoever, and withall, to pay the Emperours fees, which is twenty pence vpon euery Maik, as before hath bene noted.

When the matter is thus ended, the party conuicted, is deliuered to the Sergeant, who hath a Writ for his warrant, out of the office, to carry him to the Præsumptio or Righter of Iustice, if presently he pay not the money, nor content nor the party.

This Præsumptio or Righter, is a place neere vnto the Office where such as haue sentence passed against them, and refuse to pay that which is adiudged, are beate[n] with great Cudgels on the shins, and calves of the legges. Euery fornoone from eight to eleauen, they are let on the Præsumptio, and beate in this sort till the monie be payed. The afternoone & night time, they are kept in Chains by the Sergeant: except they put in sufficient sureties, for their appearance at the Præsumptio at the houre appointed. You shal see fortie or fifty stand together on the Præsumptio all on a rowe, and their shins thus beudgelled and beasted euery morning, with a pittous cry.

If after a years standing on the Præsumptio the party will not, or lacke wherewithall to pay his Creditor, it is lawfull for him to sell his Wife and Children, either outright, or for a certaine rearme of yeares. And if the price of them doe not amount to the full payment, the Creditor may take them to be his bondslaves for years, or for euer, according as the valew of the debt requireth.

Such kinde of suites as lack direct euidence, or stand vpon coniectures and circumstances, to bee weighed by the Iudge, draw of great length, and yeelde great aduantage vnto the Iudge and Officers. If the suite be vpon a bonde or bill, they haue for the most part good & speedy iustice. Their Bondes or Billes, are drawne in a very plaine sort, after this tenour.

I Iuan Vasileo, haue borrowed of Alphonsse Dementio, the summe of one hundred Rubbles of going money of Nisko, from the Kresbenea (or hallowing of the Water) vntill the Saburney Vojkresbenea (or counsell

And if this money rest vnpayed after that day, then hee shall giue interest vpon the saide money, after the common rate, as it goeth among the people, viz: for euery fine the first rubbell vpon this there are witnesses, Micheta Sydanokoy, &c. Subscribed. This bill haue I written Gabriel Iaconclesni, in the yeare 7096. The witnesses and debter (if he can write) endorse their names on the back side of the Bill. Other signing or sealing haue they none.

When any is taken for a matter of crime (as treason, murder, theft, and the like) he is first brought to the Duke and Diacke, that are for the Prouince where the party is attached, by whom he is examined. The manner of examination in such cases, is all by torture, as scourging with whips made of sinewes or whiteleather (called the Pudkey) as big as a mans finger, which giueth a fore lash, and entereth into the flesh; Or by tying vnto a spitte, and roasting at the Fire. Sometimes, by breaking and wresting one of their ribs with a payre of hot Tonges, or cutting their flesh vnder the nayles, and such like.

The examination thus taken, withall the proofes and euidences that can be alledged against the party, it is sent vppo to the Mosko, to the Lord of the Chetfird or Fourth-part, vnder whome the Prouince is, and by him is presented vnto the Council Table, to be reade and sentenced there, where onely iudgement is giuen in matter of life and death, and that by euidence vpon information, though they neuer saw nor heard the party, who is kept still in prison where the Facte was committed, & neuer sent vp to the place where he is tryed. If they find the partie guilty, they giue sentence of death according to the quality of the facte, which is sent downe by the Lord of the Chetfird, to the Duke and Diacke to be put in execution. The prisoner is carried vnto the place of execution, with his hands bound and a wax candle burning held betwene his fingers.

Their capitall punishments, are hanging, heading, knocking on the head, drawing, putting vnder the life, setting on a stake, and such like. But (for the most part) the prisoners that are condemned in summer, are kept for the winter, to be knockt on the head, and put vnder the Ice. This is to be vnderstood of common persons. For theft and murder, if they be committed vpon a poore Moskiet by one of Nobilitie, it is not lightly punished, nor yet is he called to any account for it. Their reason is, because they are accounted their Kolophy or bond-slaves.

If by some Sinabarskey, or Gentleman Souldiour, a murder or theft be committed, peraduenture he shall be imprisoned at the Emperours pleasure. If the manner of the fact be very notorious, hee is whipped per chance, and this is commonly all the punishment that is inflicted vpon them.

If a man kill his owne seruant, litle or nothing is saide vnto him, for the aforesaid reason: because he is accounted to be his Kolophy or bondslave, & so to haue right ouer his very head. The vrmost is some small mulct to the Emperour, if the party be rich: and so the quarrell is made rather against the purse, then against the iniustice. They haue no Written Lawe, saue onely a small booke, that containeth the time and manner of their fitting, order in proceeding, and such other iudicial formes and circumstances, but nothing to direct them, to giue sentence on right or wrong. Their onely Law is their Speaking Law, and that is the pleasure of the Prince, and of his Magistrates & officers. Which sheweth the miserable condition of this poore people, that are forced to haue them for their Law and direction of Iustice; against whose iniustice & extreme oppression, they had neede to be armed with many good and strong lawes.

The Soldiers of Rufsia are called Sinabarskey, or the sonnes of Gentlemen, because they are all of that degree, by vertue of their Military profession. For euery soldier is a Gentleman, and none are gentlemen, but onely the soldiers, that take it by descent from their Ancestors; so that the son of a Gentleman (which is borne a soldier) is euer a Gentleman, and a Soldier withall, and professeth nothing else but Military matters. When they are of yeares able to bear Armes, they come to the office of Rosgrade, or great Constable, and there present themselves, who entereth their names; and alloteth them certayne lands to maintaine their charges, for the most part, the same that their fathers enjoyed.

For the Lands assigned to maintaine the Army, are euer certaine, annexed to this office without improouing, or detracting one foot. But that if the Emperour haue sufficient in wages, the rooms being full so farre as the land doth extend already; they are many times deferred, and haue nothing allowed them, except some one portion of the land be diuided into two. Which is a cause of great disorder within that country: when a souldier that hath many children, shall haue sometimes but one entertained in the Emperours pay. So that the rest hauing nothing, are forced to liue by vniust and wicked shuffles, that tend vnto the hurt and oppression of the Moskiew or common sort of people. This inconuenience groweth, by maintaining his forces in a continuall succcession. The whole number of his souldiers in continuall pay, is this. First, he hath of his Dwornany, that is, Pensioners, or garde of his person, to the number of 15000. horsemen, with their Captaines and other officers, that are always in a readinesse.

Degrees of Horsemen.

a. Pratoriani, or such as attend the Emperors person

Of these 15000. horsemen, there are three sorts or degrees, which differ aswel in estimation, as in wages, one degree from another. The first sort of them, is called Dwornany Bullbey, or the company of head Pensioners, that haue some an hundred, some fourscore Rubbels a yeare, & none vnder seventy. The second sort are called Seredney Dwornany, or the middle ranke of Pensioners. These haue sixty, or fifty rubbels by the yeare, none vnder forty. The third and lowest sort are the Dyta Boianskey, that is, the lowest Pensioners. Their salary is thirty rubbels a yeare for him that hath most, some haue but five and twenty, some twenty, none vnder twelve. Whereof the halfe part is paid them at the Mosko, the other halfe in the fildes by the Generall, when they haue any warres, and are employed in seruice. When they receiue their whole pay, it amounteth to 55000. rubbels yearly.

And to this their wages, besides Lands allotted to euery one of them, both to the greater and the lesse, according vnto their degrees. Whereof he that hath least, hath to yeeld him twenty Rubbels or Markes by the yeare. Besides these 15000. horsemen that are of better choise (as beeing the Emperours owne gard, when himselfe goeth to the wars, not vnlike the Roman souldiers called Pratoriani) are an hundred & ten men of speciall account for their Nobility and trust, which are chosen by the Emperour, and haue their names registered, that find among them for the Emperours warres, to the number of 65000. horsemen, with all necessaries meete for the wars, after the Russe manner.

To this end they haue yearly allowance made by the Emperour for themselves, & their companies, to the summe of 40000 rubbels. And these 65000. are to repaire to the field euery year on the borders towards the Chrim Tartar (except they be appointed for some other seruice) whether there be warres with the Tartars, or not.

This might seeme (peraduenture) somewhat dangerous for some state, to haue so great forces vnder the commaund of Noblemen, to assemble euery yeare vnto one certaine place. But the matter is so vided, as that no danger can growe to the Emperour, or his state by this means. First, because these Noblemen are many, wit, an hundred and in all, & change by the Emperour, so that he thinks good. Secondly, because they haue their liuings of the Emperour, being otherwise but of very small renewen, and receiue this yearly pay of 40000. rubbels, when it is presently to be paid forth againe vnto the souldiers that are vnder them. Thirdly, because (for the most part) they are about the Emperours person, being of his counsell either speciall, or at large. Fourthly, they are rather as paymasters then Captaines to their companies, themselves not going forth ordinarily to the warres, save when some of them are appointed, by speciall order from the Emperour himselfe: for the whole number of horsemen that are euer in a readines, and in continuall pay, are 80000. a few more or lesse.

If he haue neede of a greater number, (which sildom falleth out) then he entertaineth of those Sinaboiarskey, that are out of pay, so many as he needeth: and if yet he want of his number, bee giue charge to his Noblemen (that hold lands of him) to bring into the fildes (euery man) a proportionable number of his Seruants, (called Kolaphy) such as Till his Landes, with their Furniture, according vnto the full and iust number, that hee intendeth to make vpp. The which seruice beeing done, done, presently lay in their Weapons, and returne to their seruile occupations againe.

Of Footmen that are in continuall pay, he hath to the number of 120000. all Gunners, called Srefley. Whereof 5000 are to attend about the City of Mosko, or any other place where the Emperour shall abide, and 2000. (which are called Sremaney, Srefley, or Gunners at the stirrop) about his owne person, at the very Court or house where himselfe lodgeth. The rest are placed in his garrison towns, till there be occasion to haue them in the field, and receiue for their gallery or stipend euery man seven rubbels a yeare, besides twelue measures, a piece of Rye, and Oates. Of mercenary Soldiours, that are strangers (whom they call Nimfchoy) they haue at this time, 43000. of Polonians: of Chirchasses (that are vnder the Polonians) about foure thousand, whereof 3500. are abroad in his garrisons: of Doutches Scots about 150. of Greekes, Turkes, Danes and Swedes, all in one band, an 100. or thereabouts. But these they vse onely vpon the Tartar side, and against the Siberians: as they doe the Tartar Soldiours (whom they hire sometimes but onely for the present) on the other side against the Polonian and Swedes: thinking it best policie, so to vse their seruice vpon the contrary border.

The chiefe Captaines or Leaders of these Forces, being of their names and degrees, are these which follow. First, the Poyanodoy Bullbaia, that is, the Great Captaine, or Lieutenant Generall vnder the Emperour. This commonly is one of the foure houses of the chiefe Nobility of the Land: but so chosen otherwise, as that he is of small valour, or practise in Martiall matters, being thought to serue that turne so much the better, if he bring no other parts with him, save the countenance of his Nobility, to be liked of by the Soldiours for that, and nothing else. For in this point they are very wary, that these two (to wit) Nobility, and power meete not both in one, specially if they see wisdom with all, or aptnesse for policie.

Their great Poyanod or Generall at this present in their warres, is commonly one of these foure: Knez Feodor Iuanovich Methisloskey, Knez Iuan Michailo-

wich Glinkoy, Cherechaskey, and Trowbetskey, all of great Nobility, but of very simple quality otherwise: though in Glinkoy (as they say) there is some what more then in the rest. To make vp this defect in the Poyanod or Generall, there is some other ioyned with him as Lieutenant Generall, of farre lesse Nobility, but of more valour and experience in the warres then he, who ordereth all things that the other countenanceth. At this time their principall man, and most vsed in their warres, is one Knez Demetrie Iuanomich Forestine, an ancient and expert Captaine, and one that hath done great seruice (as they say) against the Tartar and Polonian. Next, vnder the Poyanod and his Lieutenant Generall, are foure other, that haue the Marshalling of the whole Army diuided among them, and may bee called the Marshalles of the field.

Euery man hath his quarter or fourth part vnder him. Whereof the first is called the Prana Polsky, or right wing. The second is the Leuoy Polsky, or left wing. The third is Rufnoy Polsky, or the broken band, because out of this there are chosen to send abroad vpon any suddaine exploit, or to make a rescue or supply, as occasion doth require. The fourth is Storebanoy Polsky, or the warding band. Euery one of these foure Marshalls haue two other vnder them (eight in all) that twice euery weeke at the least, must muster and traine their severall wings or bands, and hold and giue iustice for all faults, and disorders committed in the Campe.

And these eight are commonly chosen out of the 110. (which I spake of before) that receiue and deliuer the pay to the Soldiours. Vnder these eight are diuers other Captaines, as the Gulany Captaines of thousands, fye hundreds, and one hundred. The Petyde Setskoy, or Captaines of fifties, and the Decetskies, or Captaines of tens.

Besides the Poyanod or Generall of the Army (spoken of before) they haue two other that beare the name of Poyanoda: whereof one is the Master of the great Ordinance (called Naradna Poyanoda) who hath diuers vnder Officers, necessary for that seruice. The other is called the Poyanada Gulany, or the walking

All these Captaines and men of charge, must (once euery day) resort to the Bulsha Voianoda, or Generall of the Armie, to know his pleasure, and to informe him, if there be any requisite matter pertaining to their Office.

Of their murthering and leuying of forces, manner of Armour, & prouision of victuall for their warre.

Their order for mustering

When warres are towards (which they saile not of lightly euery yeare with the Tartar, and many times with the Polonian and Sweden) the foure Lordes of the Chetfirs send forth their summons in the Emperors name, to all the Dukes and Dyackes of the Prouinces, to bee proclaimed in the head Townes of euery Shire: that all the Sinaboiarsky, or sonnes of Gentlemen, make their repaire to such a border where the seruice is to be done, at such a place, and by such a day, & there present themselves vnto such and such Captaines.

When they come to the place assigned them in the Summons or Proclamation, their names are taken by certain Officers, that haue Commission for that purpose, from the Rograde or High Constable, as Clarke of the Bands.

Default of appearance.

If any make default and faile at the day, he is mulcted, and punished very severely. As for the Generall and other cheefe Captaines, they are sent thither from the Emperours owne hand, with such Commission and charge, as hee thinketh behoouefull for the present seruice. When the Soldiours are assembled, they are reduced into their Bands and Companies, vnder their severall Captaines of tentes, fifties, hundreds, thousands, &c. and these Bands into foure Polskes or Legions (but of farre greater numbers then the Romaine Legions were) vnder their foure great Leaders; which also haue the Authority of Marshalls of the field, as was saide before.

The horse-mans furniture.

Concerning their Armour, they are but slightly appointed. The common Horseman hath nothing else but his Bow in his case, vnder his right Arme, and his Quiuer and Sword hanging on the lefte side: except some few that beare a Case of Dags, or a Laurel, or short staffe along their Horse side. The vnder Captaines will haue commonly some piece of Armour besides, as a Shirt of Male, or such like. The Generall, with the other chief Captaines and men of Nobilitie, will haue their horse very richly furnished, they Saddles of Cloth of Golde, their Bridles faire bossed and tasselled with Golde and Silke Fringing, bestudded with Pearle & precious Stones: themselves in very faire Armour, which they call Bullatnoy, made of faire shining Steele yet covered commonly with cloth of Golde, and edged round with Ermin Furre, his Steele Helmet on his head, of a very great price, his Sword, Bow and Arrowes at his side, his Speare in his hand, with another sayre Helmet, and his Shestapera or Horsemans Scepter caried before him. Their Swords, Bowes, and Arrowes, are of the Turkish fashion. They practise like the Tartar, to shoote forwards and backwards, as they flye and retyre.

The Generall and cheefe Captaines.

The Strelsey or Foote-man, hath nothing but his peece in his hand, his striking Hatchet at his backe, and his Sword by his side. The stocke of his peece, is not made Calieuer-wise, but with a plaine & straight stocke (somewhat like a Foulting peece) the barrel is rudely and vnartificially made, very heavy, yet shooteth but a very small Bullet.

The footmans furniture.

As for their prouision of victuall, the Emperour alloweth none, eyther for Captaine or Soldiour, neither prouideth any for them, except peraduenture some corn for their mony. Euery man is to bring sufficient for himselfe, to serue his turne for foure moneths, and (if neede require) to giue order for more to bee brought vnto him to the Campe, from his Tenant that tilleth his land, or some other place.

Prouision of victuall.

One great helpe they haue, that for Lodging and Dyet, euery Russe is prepared to be a souldiour before-hand. Although the cheefe Captaines, and other of account, do carrie Tents along with them, after the form and fashion of ours, with some better prouision of Victuall then the rest, they bring with them commonly into the Campe for Victuall, a kinde of dried Bread (which they call Sacharie) with some store of Meale, the which they temper with water, & so make it into a Ball, or small lump of Dough, called Tollockno. And this they eat raw in stead of Bread. Their meat is Bacon, or some

Their felts lodging and diet.

some other flesh or fish dried, after the Dutch manner.

If the Russe Souldier were as hardie to execute an enterprize, as hee is hardie to beare out toyle and trauaile, or were otherwise as apt and well trayned for the warres, as he is indifferent for his lodging and dyet, he would farre exceed the Soldiours of other parts. Whereas now, hee is farre meane of courage, and execution in any warlike seruice. Which cometh partly of his seruile condition, that will not suffer any great courage or valour to grow in him. Partly for lacke of due honour and reward, which he hath no great hope of, whatsoever seruice or execution hee doe.

Of their marching, charging and other martiall discipline.

The Russe trusteth rather to his number, then to the valor of his Soldiours, or good ordering of his forces. Their marching or leading is without all order, saue that the foure Polskey or Legions (whereinto their army is diuided) keepe themselves vnder their Ensignes, and so thrust all on together in a hurrey, as they are directed by their Generall. Their Ensigne is the image of Saint George. The Bulsha Dworany or cheefe Horsemen, haue euery man a small Drumme of Brasse at his Saddle-bow, which he striketh when hee giueth the charge, or onfet.

Horsemens drummes.

The Horse-mans manner of charging.

They haue Drummes besides of a huge biggenesse, which they carrie vwith them vpon a boord layde on foure horses, that are spard together with Iron Chaines, euery Drumme hauing eyght Beaters or Drummers, besides Trumpets, and Shawmes, which they sound after a wilde manner, much different from ours.

When they giue any Charge, or make any inuasion, they make a great hallowe or shoute altogether, as lowde as they can, which with the sound of their Trumpets, Shawmes, and Drummes, maketh a confused and horrible noyse. So they set on first discharging their Arrows, then dealing with their Swordes, which they vse in a brauery to shake, and brandish ouer their Heades, before they come to strokes.

The foot-mans charge.

Their Footmen (because otherwise they want order in leading) are commonly placed in some ambush, or place of advantage, where they may most annoy the enemy, with least hurt to themselves.

If it bee a set battaile, or if any great inuasion bee made vpon the Russe borders, by the Tartar; they are sette within the running or moouing Castle (called Beza, or Gulygora) which is carried about with them by the Voianoda gulanoy (or the Walking Generall) whome I spake of before. This Walking or moouing Castle is so framed, that it may be set vp in length (as occasion doth require) the space of one, two, three, foure, five, six, or seuen miles: for so long will it reach. It is nothing else but a double wall of Woodes, to defend them on both sides, behinde and before; with a space of three yards or thereabout, betwixt the two sides: so that they may stand within it, and haue roome enough to charge and discharge their peeeces, and to vse their other weapons.

The walking Castle.

What the walking Castle is.

It is closed at both ends, & made with loope holes on either side, to lay out the hole of their peece, or to push forth any other weapon. It is caried along with the army whateuier it goeth, being taken in to peeeces, and so layde on Cartes spard together, and drawn by horse that are not feene, by reason that they are covered with their carriage, as with a shelle or pent-house.

When it is brought vnto the place where it is to be vsed (which is deuised & chosen out before by the Walking Voianoda) it is planted, so much as the present vse requireth, sometime a mile long, sometimes two, sometimes three, or more: Which is soone done without the helpe of any Carpenter, or instrument: because the Timber is so framed to clasp together one peece within another: as is easily vnderstood, by those that know the manner of the Russe building.

The planting of the walking Castle.

In this Castle standeth their Shot well fenced for advantage, especially agaynst the Tartar, that bringeth no Ordinance, nor other Weapon into the Fielde with him, saue his Sword, and Bowe and Arrowes. They haue also within it diuerse field peeeces, which they vse as occasion doth require. Of peeeces for the field, they carry no great store, when they war against the Tartar: but when they deale with the Polonian (of whose forces they make more account) they go better furnished with all kind of munition, and other necessarie prouisions. It is thought, that no Prince of Christendome, hath better store of munition, then the Russe Emperour. And it may partly appear by the Artillerie house at Mosko, where are of all fortes of great Ordinance, all Brasse peeces, very faire, to an exceeding great number.

The Russe Soldiour is thought to be better at his defence within some Caste, or Towne, then hee is abroad at a set pitched field. Which is euer noted in the practise of his warres, and namely, at the siege of Polsko, some few yeares since: where he repulsed the Polonian king, Stephan Bator, with his whole Army of an hundred thousand men, and forced him (in the end) to giue ouer his siege, with the losse of many of his best Capitaines and Soldiers. But in a set field, the Russe is noted to haue the worke of the Polonian and Sweden.

If any behaue himselfe more valiantly then the rest, or doe any speciall peece of seruice, the Emperour sendeth him a peece of Gold, stamped with the image of Saint George on horse backe. Which peece they hang on their sleeves, and set in their Caps. And this is accounted the greatest honor they can receiue for any seruice they do.

The Russe Emperours (of late yeares) haue very much enlarged their Dominions & Territories. Their first Conquest after the Dukedome of Mosko (for before that time they were but Dukes of Volodemer, as before was sayde) was the Cittie, and Dukedome of Novograd on the West and North-West side: which was no final enlargement of their Dominion, & strengthening vnto them for the winning of the rest. This was done by Iuan, great Grand father to Theodore now Emperour, about the yeare 1480.

The same began likewise to encroach vpon the Countreys of Lituania and Lithuania, but the Conquest onely intended, and attempted by him vpon some part of those Countreys, was pursued and performed by his sonne Basileus, who first of all wan the Cittie and Dukedom of Plesko, afterwards the City and Dukedom of Smolensko, and many other faire Townes, with a large Territory belonging vnto them, about the yeare 1514.

These victories against the Lettoes or Lituanians, in the time of Alexander their Duke, hee achieved rather by aduantage of ciuill diffentions and treasons among themselves, then by any great pollicie or force of his owne. But all this was lost againe by his sonne Iuan Vasilowich, about eight or nine yeares past, vpon composition with the Polonian King Stephen Bator; whereunto he was forced by the aduantages which the Pole had then of him, by reason of the foyle hee had giuen him before, and the disquietnesse of his owne state at home. Onely the Russe Emperour, at this time, hath left him on that side his Countrey, the Cities of Smolensko, Vitobsko, Cheringe, and Reala Gorod in Lituania. In Lituania, not a Towne, nor one foote of ground.

When Basileus first Conquered those Countreys, hee suffered the Natives to keepe their possessions, and to inhabit all their Townes, onely paying him a Tribute, vnder the gouernment of his Russe Capitaines. But by their Conspiracies & attempts not long after, he was taught to deale more surely with them. And so coming vpon them the second time, hee killed and caried away with him, three parts of foure, which he gaue or fold vnto the Tartars that serued him in those wars, & (insted of them) placed there his Russes, so many as might ouer-match the rest, with certaine Garrisons of strength besides. Wherein, notwithstanding this ouersight was committed, for that (taking away with him the Vpland or Countrey people (that should haue tild the ground and might easily haue bene kept in order without any daunger, by other good policies) hee was driuen afterwarde manie yeares together, to Visually the Countrey (especially the great Townes) out of his owne Countrey of Russia, the foyle lying there in the meane while waste and vntilled.

The like fell out at the port of Narue, in Liefland, where his sonne Iuan Vasilowich desired, to build a Towne and a Caste on the other side the Riuer, (called Naugorod) to keepe the Town and countrey in subiection. The Caste he caused to bee so built and fortified, that it was thought to bee inuincible. And when it was finished, for reward to the Archibishop (that was a Polonian) hee put out both his eyes, to make him vnable to build the like againe. But hauing left the Natives all within their owne Countrey, without a bating their number or strength; the Towne and Caste (not long after) was betrayed, and surrendered againe to the King of Sweden.

On the Southeast side, they haue got the Kingdomes of Cazan, and Astracan. These were wonne from the Tartar, by the late Emperour Iuan Vasilowich, Father to the Emperour that now is: the one about 35. the other about 33. yeares agoe. Northward out of the Countrey of Siberia, he hath laide vnto his Realme, a great breadth and length of ground, from Wichida to the Riuer of Obba, about a thousand miles space: so that hee is bold to write himselfe now, The Great Commander of Siberia.

The Countries likewise of Permia & Pechora, are a diuerse people & language from the Russe, overcome not long since, and that rather by threatening, & shaking of the Sword, then by any actual force: as being a weak and naked people, without meanes to resist.

That which the Russe hath in his present possession, he keepeth on this sort. In his foure cheefe border townes of Polsko, Smolensko, Astracan, and Cazan, he hath certaine of his Counsel, not of greatest Nobility, but of greatest trust, which haue more authority within their Precincts (for the countenancing & strengthening of their gouernment there) then the other Dukes that are set to gouerne in other places, as was noted before, in the manner of ordering their Prouinces. These he chengerth sometime euery yeare, sometime euery second or third yeare, but exceedeth not that time; except vpon very speciall trust, and good liking of the party, and his seruice: least by enlarging of their time, they might grow into some familiarity with the enemy (as some haue done) being so far out of sight.

The Townes besides are very strongly fenced with Trenches, Castles, & store of munition, and haue garrisons within the, to the number of two or three thousand a peece. They are stored with victuall (if any siege should come vpon them) for the space of two or three yeares before hand. The foure Castles of Smolensko, Polsko, Cazan and Astracan, hee hath made very strong to beare out any siege: so that it is thought that those Townes are impregnable.

As for the Countreys of Pechora and Permia, and that part of Siberia, which hee hath now vnder him, they are kept by as easie meanes, as they were first got, viz. rather by shewing, then by using of Armes. First, he hath stored the Countrey with as many Russes as there are Natives, & hath there some few Soldiours in garrison, enough to keepe them vnder. Secondly, his Officers and Magistrates there, are of his owne Russe people, and he chengerth them very often, viz. euery yeare twice or thrice; notwithstanding there be no great feare of any inuasion. Thirdly, he diuideth them into many small gouernements, like a staffe broke in many small peeces: so that they haue no strength being seuered, which was but little neither, when they were all in one. Fourthly, he prouideth that the people of the countrey haue neyther Armour, nor money, being taxed and pilld so often as he thinketh good: without any meanes to shake off that yoke, or to releue themselves.

In Siberia (where he goeth on in pursuing his Conquest) hee hath diuers Castles and Garrisons, to the number of sixe thousand Soldiours of Russes and Polonians, and sendeth many new supplies thither, to plant and inhabite, as he winneth ground. At this time besides, he hath gotten the Kings Brother of Siberia, allured by certaine of his Captains, to leaue his owne Countrey, by offers of great entertainment, and pleasanter life with the Russe Emperour, then he had in Siberia. He was brought in this last yeare, and is now with the Emperour at Mosko well entertained.

This may be said of the Russe practise, wherefoeuer he ruleth, either by right of Inheritance, or by Conquest.

First, hee bereaueh the Countrey of Armour, and other meanes of defence, which hee permiteth to none, but to his Boiarskes onely.

Secondly, he robbeth them continually of their money and commodities, and leaueh them bare, with nothing but their bodies and liues, within certaine yeares compass.

Thirdly, hee renteth and diuideth his Territories into many small peeces, by seuerall gouernments: so that none hath much vnder him to make any strength, though he had other opportunities.

Fourthly,

Meanes of holding his cheefe townes.

The strength of Townes & Castles.

Fourthly, he governeth his Countries by men of small reputation, and no power of themselves, and strangers (in those places) where their gouvernement lyeth.

Fifthly, he changeth his Gouvernors once a yeare ordinarily, that there grow no great liking, nor intimesse betwixt the people and them, nor acquaintance with the enemy, if they lie towards the Borders.

Sixtly, hee appointeth in one and the same place aduersary Gouvernors, the one to be as Controller of the other, as the Dukes and Diacks: where (by means of their enuies and emulations) there is lesse hurt to be feared by their agreement, and himselfe is better informed what is done amiffe.

Seuenthly, he sendeth many times into euery Prouince secret Messengers (of speciall trust about him) as intelligencers, to pry and hearken out what is doing, and what is amisse there. And this is ordinary, though it be sudden, and vnknowne what time they will come.

Their neighbours with whom they haue greatest dealings and intercourse, both in peace and warre, are first the Tartars: Secondly the Polonians, whom the Russes calthe Laches, noting the first Author or Founder of the Nation, who was called Laches or Leches, whereunto is added Pol, which signifieth People, and so is made Polaches, that is, the People or Politerie of Laches: which the Latines (after their manner of writing) call Polonians. The third are the Suedens. The Polonians and Suedens are better knowne to these parts of Europe, then are the Tartars, that are farther off from vs (as beeing of Asia) and diuided into many Tribes, different both in name and government one from another.

The greatest and mightiest of them is the Chrim Tartar, (whom some call the Great Cham) that lyeth South, & South-eastward from Russia, and doth most annoy the Country by often inuasions, commonly once euery yeare, sometime entering very farre within the inland parts. In the yeare 1571. he came as far as the Citie of Mosko, with an Army of two hundred thousand men, without any battaile, or resistance at all, for that the Russe Emperor (then Iuan Vasilowich) leading forth his Army to encounter with him, marched a wrong way: but (as it was thought) of very purpose, as not daring to aduventure the Field, by reason that he doubted his Nobility and cheefe Capitaines, of a meaning to betray him to the Tartar.

The Cittie hee tooke not, but fired the Subburbs, which by reason of the buildings (which are al of Wood, without any Stone, Brick or Lime, saue certaine out-rooms) kindled so quickly, and went on with such rage; as that it consumed the greatest part of the City, almost within the space of foure houres, being of thirty miles or more of compasse. Then might you haue seene a lamentable spectacle: besides the huge and mighty flame of the City all on light fire, the people burning in their houses and streetes, but most of all, of such as laboured to passe out of the gates, farthest from the enemy; where meeting together in a mightie throng, & so pressing euery man to prevent another: wedged themselves so fast within the gate and streetes neere vnto it, as that three ranks walked one vpon the others head, the vppermost treading down those that were lower: so that there perished at that time (as was saide) by the fire & the preece, the number of eight hundred thousand people, or more.

The Chrim thus hauing fired the City, and fed his eyes with the sight of it all on a light flame, returned with his Army, and sent to the Russe Emperor a Knife (as was saide) to stick himselfe withall. vbraiding this losse, and his desperate case, as not daring eyther to meete his enemy in the field, nor to trust his friends nor subiects at home. The principall cause of this continuall quarrell betwixt the Russe and the Chrim, is for the right of certaine border parts, claimed by the Tartar, but possessed by the Russe. The Tartar alledge, that besides Altacran, & Cazan (that are the ancient possession of the East Tartar) the whole Country, from his bounds North and Westward, so farre as the City of Mosko, and Mosko it selfe, pertaineth to his right. Which seemeth to haue bin true, by the report of the Russes themselves, that tell of a certaine homage, that was done by the Russe Emperor (euery yeare) to the Great Chrim or Cham, the Russe Emperor standing on foote, and feeding the Chrims Horse (himselfe sitting sitting on his back) with Oates out of his owne Cap, instead of a Boule or Maunger, and that within the Castle of Mosko. And this homage (they say) was done till the time of Basilens, grandfather to this man. Who surprizing the Chrim Emperour by a stratagem, done by one of his Nobility (called Iuan Demetrowich Belfchey) was content with this ranlome, viz. with the changing of this homage into a tribute of Furses: which afterwards also was denied to be paid by this Emperors Father.

Hereupon they continue the quarrell, the Russe defending his Country, & that which he hath won, the Chrim Tartar invading him once or twice euery yeare, sometime about Whitfontide, but often in Haruest. What time, if the great Cham or Chrim come in his owne person, hee bringeth with him a great Army of an hundred thousand, or two hundred thousand men. Otherwise, they make short and sudden roads into the Country with lesser numbers, running about the life of the border, as wilde Geese flie, invading and retiring where they see aduantage.

Their common practise (beeing very populous) is to make diuers Armies, and so drawing the Russe to one, or two places of the Frontiers, to invade at some other place, that is left without defence. Their manner of fight, or ordering of their Forces, is much after the Russe manner (spoken of before) saue that they are all horsemen, and carry nothing else but a Bowe, a sheafe of Arrowes, & a faulchon sword after the Turkish fashion. They are very expert horsemen, and vse to shoote as readily backward, as forward. Some will haue a horsemans staffe like vnto a boare speare, besides their other weapons. The common Soldiour hath no other armour then his ordinary apparell, viz. a blacke sheeps skinn, with the wooll side outward in the day time, and inward in the night time, with a cap of the same. But their Mayses or Noblemen imitate the Turke both in apparell and armor. When they are to passe ouer a Riuer with their Army, they tye three or foure horses together, and taking long Poles or pieces of wood, binde them fast to the tayles of their horses: so sitting on the Poles they drive their horse ouer. At handy-strokes

(when they come to ioyne battaile) they are accounted farre better men then the Russe people, fiercer by nature, but more hardy and bloody by continuall practise of warre: as men knowing no parts of peace, nor any ciuill practise.

Yet their subtilty is more then may seeme to agree with their barbarous condition. By reason they are practised to invade continually, and to robbe their neighbours that border about them; they are very pregnant, and ready witted to deuise stratagems (vpon the sudden) for their better aduantage. As in their war against Beala the fourth King of Hungary, whom they invaded with five hundred thousand men, and obtained against him a great victory. Where (among other) hauing slaine his Chancellor, called Nicholas Schinick; they found about him the Kings priuy Seale. Whereupon, they deuised presently to counterfeit Letters in the Kings Name, to the Citties and Townes next about the place, where the field was fought; with charge, that in no case they should conuey themselves and their goods out of their dwellings, where they might abide safely without all feare of danger, and not leaue the Country desolate, to the possession of so vile and barbarous an enemy, as was the Tartar Nation, teaming themselves in all reprochfull manner.

For, notwithstanding he had lost his carriages, with some few straglers that had marched disorderly; yet hee doubted not but to recouer that losse, with the assistance of a notable victory, if the sauage Tartar durst abide him in the field. To this purpose, hauing written their letters in the Polish Characters, by certaine yong men whom they tooke in the field, and signed them with the Kings Seale; they dispatched them forth to all the quarters of Hungary, that lay neare about the place. Whereupon the Hungarians, that were now flying away with their goods, wines, and children, vpon the rumour of the kings ouerthrow, taking comfort by these counterfeit Letters, staid at home. And so were made a prey, being surprized on the sudden by the huge number of these Tartars, that had compassed them about before they were aware.

When they besiege a Towne or Fort, they offer much Parley, and send many flattering flattering messages to persuade a surrender, promising all things that the Inhabitants will require: but being once possessed of the place, they use all manner of hostility, and cruelty. This they do upon a rule they have, viz. That Justice is to be practised but towards their owne. They encounter not lightly, but they have some ambush, whereunto (having once shewed themselves, and made some short conflict) they retire, as repulsed for feare, and so draw the enemy into it if they can. But the Russe being well acquainted with their practise, is more wary of them. When they come a routing with some small number, they set on horsebacke counterfeit shapen of men, that their number may seeme greater.

When they make any onset, their manner is to make a great shout, crying all out together, Olla Billa, Olla Billa, God help us, God helpe us. They contemne death so much, as that they chuse rather to die, then to yeeld to their enemy, & are seene (when they are slaine) to bite the very weapon when they are past striking, or helping of themselves. Wherein appeareth, how different the Tartar is in his desperate courage, from the Russe and Turke. For the Russe Souldier, if hee begin once to retire, putteth all his safety in his speedy flight. And if once he be taken by his enemy, he neither defendeth himselfe, nor intreateth for his life, as reckning straight to die. The Turke commonly, when hee is past hope of escaping, falleth to entreitic, and casteth away his weapon, offereth both his hands, and holdeth them vp, as it were to be tied: hoping to save his life, by offering himselfe bondslave.

The cheefe booty the Tartars seeke for in all their wars, is to get store of captiues, specially yong boies and girles, who they sell vnto the Turkes, or other their neighbours. To this purpose they take with them great Baskets, made like Bakers Panniers, to carry them tenderly, and if any of them happen to tier, or to be sick on the way, they dash him against the ground, or some tree, and so leane him dead. The Souldiours are not troubled with keeping the Captiues, and the other booties, for hindering the execution of their wars; but they have certaine bands that intend nothing else, appointed of purpose to receive and keepe the Captives and the other prey.

The Russe borders (being vsed to their inuasions lightly every yeare in the Summer) keepe few other Cattell on the border parts, save Swine only, which the Tartar will not touch, nor drive away with him: for that he is of the Turkish religion, and will eate no Swines flesh. Of Christ our Saviour, they confesse as much as doth the Turk in his Alkaron, viz. That he came of the Angell Gabriel, & the Virgin Mary, that he was a great Prophet, & shall be the Iudge of the world at the last day. In other matters likewise, they are much ordered after the manner and direction of the Turke: having felt the Turkish Forces, when hee wonne from them Asou, and Cassa, with some other townes about the Euxine, or Blacke Sea, that were before tributaries to the Chrim Tartar. So that now the Emperor of the Chrimis (for the most part) is chosen some one of the Nobility, whom the Turke doth commend: whereby it is brought now to that passe, that the Chrim Tartar giueth to the Turke the tenth part of the spoile, which he getteth in his wars against the Christians.

Heerein they differ from the Turkish Religion, for that they have certaine idoll puppets, made of filke, or like stuffe, of the fashion of a man, which they fasten to the doore of their walking houses, to be as Ianusses or keepers of their house. And these Idols are made not by all, but by certaine religious women, which they have among them, for that and like vses. They haue besides, the image of their King or Great Cham, of an huge bignesse, which they erect at every stage, when the Army marcheth: and this euery one must bend and bow vnto as he passeth by it, be hee Tartar, or stranger. They are much giuen to witchcraft, and ominous coniectures, vpon euery accident which they heare or see.

In making of marriages, they haue no regard of alliance or consanguinity. One ly with his Mother, Sister, and Daughter, a man may not marry, and though hee take the woman into his house, and accompany with her; yet hee accounteth her not for his Wife, till he haue a childe by her. Then he beginneth to take a dowry of her friends, of Horse, Sheep, Kine, &c. If she bee barren, after a certaine time, he turneth her home againe.

Vnder the Emperour they haue certayne Dukes, whom they call Morfeis, or Diuyrnfeis: that rule ouer a certayne number of tenne thousand, twenty thousand, or forty thousand a peece, which they call Horsis. When the Emperour hath any vse of them to serue in his wars, they are bound to come; and to bring with them their Souldiers to a certayne number, euery man with his two horses at the least, the one to ride on, the other to kill, when it cometh to his turne to haue his horse eaten. For their chiefe vitaille is horse flesh, which they eate without bread, or any other thing with it. So that if a Tartar be taken by a Russe, he shall be sure lightly to finde a horse legge, or some other part of him hanging at his saddle bowe.

This last yeare, when I was at the Moscow, came in one Kiriach Morfeis, Nephew to the Emperour of the Chrimis that now is (whose father was Emperour before) accompanied with 3, hundred Tartars, and his two wiues, whereof one was his brothers widow. Where being entertained in very good fort (after the Russe manner) he had sent vnto his lodging for his welcome, to be made ready for his supper and his companies, two very large and fatte horses, ready slayed on a sledde. They preferre it before other flesh, because the meate is stronger (as they say) then beefe, mutton, and such like. And yet (which is maruell) though they serue all as horsemen in the warres, and eate all of horse flesh, there are brought yearly to the Moscow, to be exchanged for other commodities, thirty or fortie thousand Tartar horses, which they commonly call Cones.

They keepe also great herds of kine, and flocks of blacke sheepe, rather for the skinnen and milke (which they carrie with them in great bottles) then for the vse of the flesh, though sometimes they eate of it. Some vse they haue of Rice, Figges, and other Fruites. They drinke milke or warme blood, and for the most part, carde them both together. They vse sometimes (as they doe trauell by the way) to let their horses blood in a veine, and to drink it warme, as it cometh from his body.

Townes they do plant none, nor other standing buildings, but haue walking houses, which the Latines call Vici, built vpon wheeles, like vnto a Shepherds cottage. These they draw with them whither they goe, driving their cattails with them. And whē they come to their stage, or standing place, they plant their Cart-houses very orderly in a ranke: and so do make the forme of the stretes, and of a large towne. And this is the manner of the Emperour himselfe, who hath no other feare of his Empire, but an Agora, or towne of wood, that mooneth with him whither he goeth. As for the fixed and standing buildings vsed in other Countries, they say they are vnwholesome and vnpleasant.

They beginne to moue their houses and cattails in the Spring time, from the South part of their Countrey towards the North parts. And so driving on till they haue grafed all vp vnto the farthest part Northward, they retorne backe againe towards their South Countrey (where they continue all the winter) by ten or twelve miles a stage: in the meane while, the grasse being sprung vp againe, to serue for their cattails as they retorne. From the border of the Shalcan towards the Caspian Sea, vnto the Russe frontiers, they haue a goodly Countrey, specially on the South and South-east parts, but lost for lacke of tillage.

Of money they haue no vse at all, and therefore prefer Brasse and Steele before other mettals, especially bullate, which they vse for Swords, Knives, and other necessities. As for Golde and Siluer, they neglect it of very purpose, (as they do all tillage of their ground) to be more free for their wandering kinde of life, and to keepe their Countrey lesse subiect to inuasions. Which giueth them great advantage against all their neighbours, such inuading, and neuer being inuaded. Such as haue taken vpon them to inuade their Countrey (as of old time Cyrus and Darius Hystaspis, on the East and Southeast side) haue done it with very ill successe, as we finde in the Stories written of those times. For their manner is, when any will inuade them, to allure and draw them on, by flying and reculing (as if they were afraid) vntill they haue drawne them some good way within their Countrey. Then, when they beginne to want vitaille and other necessaries (as needes they must where nothing is to bee had) to stop vp the passages, and enclose them with multitudes. By which stratagem (as wee read in Laonicus Chalcondylas in his Turkish story) they had well nigh surprized the great and huge Army of Tamberlaine; but that he retired with al speed he could, towards the River Tanaïs, or Don, not without great losse of his men, and carriages.

Pachymerius.

A story of a Tartarian Captaine.

In the story of Pachymerius the Greeke (which hee wrote of the Emperours of Constantinople from the beginning of the Reigne of Michael Palaeologus, to the time of Ananious the elder) I remember hee telleth (to the same purpose) of one Nogais, a Tartarian Captaine vnder Cazan, the Emperour of the East Tartars (of who the City and Kingdome of Cazan may seeme to haue taken the denomination) who refused a Present of Pearle & other Jewels, sent vnto him from Michael Palaeologus: Asking (withall) for what vse they serued, and whither they were good to keepe away sicknesse, death, or other misfortunes of this life, or no? So that it seemeth they haue euer (or long time) bene of that minde, to value things no further, then by the vse, and necessity for which they serue.

Person and complexion of the Tartars and their natural inclination.

For person and complexion, they haue broad and flat visages, of a tanned colour into yellow and blacke, fierce and cruell lookes, thin haired vpon the vpper lip, and pit of the chin, light and nimble bodied, with short legges, as if they were made naturally for Horsemen: whereto they pradiſe themselves from their childhood, sildome going afoote about any businesse. Their speech is very sudden and loud, speaking as it were out of a deep hollow throte. When they sing, you would thinke a Cow lowed, or some great bandog howled. Their greatest exercise is shooting, wherein they traine vp their children from their very infancy, not suffering them to eate, till they haue shot neere the marke within a certaine scantling. They are the very same, that (sometimes) were called * Scythia Nomades, or the Scythian Shepheards, both by the Greekes and Latines.

* A people in Scythia about Meotis.

Some thinke, that the Turkes took their beginning from the Nation of the Chrim Tartars. Of which opinion is Laonicus Chalcondylas the Greeke Historiographer, in his first Booke of his Turkish story. Wherein he followeth diuers very probable coniectures.

The first, taken from the very name it selfe, for that the word Turke, signifieth a Shepheard, or one that followeth a vagrant and wilde kinde of life. By which name these Scythian Tartars haue euer bin noted, being called by the Greekes, Skithai Nomades, or the Scythian Shepheards.

His second reason, because the Turkes (in his time) that dwelt in Asia the lesse, to wit, in Lydia, Coria, Phrygia, and Cappadocia, spake the very same Language that these Tartars did, that dwelt betwixt the River Tanaïs or Don, and the Country of Sarmatia, which (as is well knowne) are these Tartars called Chrimis. At this time also, the whole Nation of the Turks differ not much in their common speech from the Tartar Language.

Thirdly, because the Turke and the Chrim Tartar agree so well together, as well in Religion, as matter of Trafficke, neuer invading, or inuoying one another: saue that the Turke (since Laonicus his time) hath encroached vpon some Towns vpon the * Euxine Sea, that before pertained to the Chrim Tartar.

Fourthly, because Orogales sonne to Oguzalpes, and (Father to Ottoman, the first of name of the Turkish Nation) made his first rodes out of those partes of Asia, vpon the next borderers, till he came towards the Countreyes about the Hill Taurus, where he ouercame the Greekes that inhabited there: and so enlarged the name and territory of the Turkish Nation, till he came to Eubæa and Attica, and other partes of Greece. This is the opinion of Laonicus, who liued amongst the Turkes, in the time of Amurath, the sixte Turkish Emperour, about the year 1400. when the memory of their originall was more fresh: and therefore the likelier hee was to hit the truth.

There are diuers other Tartars that border vpon Russia, as the Nagais, the Cheremisens, the Morduites, the Chircaſſes, & the Shalcans, which all differ (in name, more then in Regiment, or other condition) from the Chrim Tartar, except the Chircaſſes, that border South-West, towards Lithuania, and are farre more ciuill then the rest of the Tartars; of a comely person, person, and of a stately behaiour, as applying themselves to the fashion of the Poloman. Some of them haue subiected themselves vnto the Kings of Poland, and professe Christianity. The Nagay lyeth Eastward, and is reckoned for the best man of warre among all the Tartars, but very sauage and cruell about all the rest.

The Cheremisens Tartars, very troublesome and dangerous.

The Cheremisens Tartars, that lye betwixt the Russe and the Nagay, are of two sorts, the Luganoy (that is of the Valley) and the Nagorway, or of the hilly Country. These haue much troubled the Emperours of Russia. And therefore they are content now to buy peace of them, vnder pretence of giuing a yearly pension of Russe commodities, to their Morſeis, or Dinoymorſeis, that are cheefe of their Tribes. For which also they are bound to serue them in their wars, vnder certaine conditions. They are saide to be iust and true in their dealings: and for that cause they hate the Russe people, whom they account to bee double, and false in all their dealings. And therefore the common fort are very unwilling to keepe agreement with them, but that they are kept in by their Morſeis, or Dukes for their pensions sake.

The Morduites Tartars, the most barbarous of the rest.

The most rude and barbarous is counted the Morduite Tartar, that hath many selfe-fashions, and strange kindes of behaiour, differing from the rest. For his Religion, though hee acknowledge one God, yet his manner is to worshipspe for God, that liuing thing, that hee first meeteth in the morning, and to sweare by it all that whole day, whether it be Horſe, Dogge, Catte, or whatsoeuer else it bee. When his friend dieth, he killeth his best Horſe, and hauing flayed off the skinn, he carrieth it on high vpon a long Pole, before the corpes to the place of buriall. This hee doth (as the Russe saith) that his friend may haue a good Horſe to carry him to Heauen: but it is likelier to declare his loue towards his dead friend, in that he will haue to die with him the best thing that he hath.

The Shalcans and Country of Media.

Next to the Kingdome of Astracan, that is the farthest part Southeastward of the Russe Dominion, lyeth the Shalcans, and the Countrey of Media: whether the Russe Merchants trade for raw filkes, syndon, saphion, skins, and other commodities. The cheife Townes of Media where the Russe tradeth, are Derbent (built by Alexander the great, as the Inhabitants say), and Zamachio, where the staple is kept for rawe filkes. Their manner is (in the Spring time) to reuiue the silke-worms (that lye dead all the Winter) by laying them in the warme Sun, and to hasten their quickning, that they may sooner goe to worke) to put them into bags, and so to hang the vnder their childrens armes. As for the Worme called Chrimisin (as wee call it Chrymſon) that maketh coloured silke, it is bred not in Media, but in Assyria. This trade to Derbent & Zamachio for raw filkes, and other commodities of that Country, as also into Persia, and Bougharia, downe the River Volga, and through the Caspian Sea; is permitted aſwell to the English, as to the Russe Merchants, by the Emperours last Graunt, as appeareth. Which hee accounteth for a very speciall fauour, and might prouee indeed very beneficiall to all kinde of Merchants, if the trade were well and orderly vsed.

Of reuiuing the Silke-worms in the Spring time.

The whole Nation of the Tartars, are vtterly void of all learning, & without written Law. Yet certaine rules they haue, which they hold by tradition, common to all the Hoards, for the practice of their life. Which are of this sort.

The Tartars haue no learning or written Law.

First, To obey their Emperour and other Magistrates, whatsoever they command about the publike seruice.

2. Except for the publike beboofe, euery man to be free, and out of controlement.

3. No private man to possesse any Lands, but the whole Country to be in common.

4. To neglect all daintinesse and variety of meates, and to content themselves with that which cometh next to hand, for more hardnesse, and readinesse in the executing of their affaires.

5. To weare any base attire, and to patch their clothes, whether there be any neede or not: that when there is neede, it be no shame to weare a patcht Coate.

6. To take, or steale from any stranger whatsoever they can get, as being enemies to all men, saue to such as will subiect themselves to them.

7. Towards their owne Hoord and Nation, to be true in word and deed.

8. To suffer no stranger to come within the Realm. If any do the same to be bond-slave to Passport about them.

The Permians and Samoites, that do lie from Russia, North and Northeast, are thought likewise to haue taken their beginning from the Tartar kinde. And it may partly be ghesed by the fashion of their countenance, as hauing all broad and flat faces, as the Tartars haue, except the Chirchasse.

The Permians are accounted for a very ancient people. They are now subiect to the Russe. They liue by hunting, and trading with their furs, as doth also the • Samoys, that dwellch more towards the North sea.

The Samoys hath his name (as the Russe saith) of eating himselfe: as in times past, they liued as Cannibals, eating one an other. Which they make more probable, because (at this time) they eat all kinde of frawe flesh, whatsoever it be, euen the very carrion that lyeth in the ditch. But as the Samoites themselves will say, they were called Samie, that is of themselves, as though they were Indigena, or poore people bred vpon that very soile. That neuer changed their seat from one place to another, as most Nations haue doone.
They are subiect, at this time, to the Em-perour of Russia.

I talked with certaine of them, & finde
that they acknowledge one God; but represent him by such things as they haue most vfe and good by. Therefore they do worship the Sunne, the Ollen, the Lofh, and such like. As for the storie of Slata Baba, or the Golden hagge, (which I haue read in some Maps and Descriptions of these countries, to be an Idole, after the forme of an old woman) that being demanded
by the Priest, giues them certaine oracles, concerning the successe, and euent of things; I found it to be but a very Fable.
Onely in the Prouince of Obdaria, vpon
the Sea side, neare to the mouth of the great riuer Obda, there is a Rocke, which naturally (being somewhat helped by imagination) may seeme to beare the shape of a ragged woman, with a child in her armes (as the Rocke by the North Cape the shape of a Fryer) where the *Obdorian Samoit*es vfe much to resort, by reason of the commoditie of the place for fishing: and there sometime (as their maner is) conceiue and praefite their force-ries, and ominous coniecturings, about the good or the bad speede of their iour-neys, fishings, huntings, and other such like.

They are clad in Seale skins, with the haire fide outwards downe, as low as the knees, with their breeches and neatherstocks of the same, both men and women.
They are all black haired, naturally be ardlesse. Therefore the men are hardly discerned from the women by their lookes, laue that the women weare a locke of haire downe along both their eares. They liue (in a manner) a wilde and a sauage life, rouing still from one place of the country to another, without any property of house or land, more to one then to an other.
Their leader or director in euery company, is their Papa or Priest.

On the North side of Russia next vnto Corelia, lyeth the Countrey of Lappia, which reacheth in length from the farthest poynt Northward, (towards the North-cape) to the farthest part Southeast (which the Russe calleth Sweetnesse or Fourthly, concerning Ecclesiasticall Of-

Concerning the government of their Church, it is framed altogether after the manner of the Greeks, as being a part of that Church, and neuer acknowledging the iurisdiction of the Latine Church, usurped by the Pope. That I may keepe the better measure in describing their Ceremonies, then they in the vjing the (wherein they are infinite) I will note briefly.

First, what Ecclesiasticall degrees, or Offices they haue, with the iurisdiction &
praefite of them.

Secondly, what doctrine they holde
in matter of Religion.

Thirdly, what Leiturgy, or forme of seruice they vfe in their Churches, with the manner of their administring the Sacraments.

Fourthly, what other strange Ceremonies, and superstitious deuotions are vfed among them.

Their Offices, or degrees of Churchmen, are as many in number, and the same in a manner (both in name and degree)
that were in the Westerne Churches.
First they haue their Patriarch, then their Metropolitans, their Archbishops, their Pladikey or Bishops, their Protopapes or Arch-Priests, their Papes or Priests, their Deacons, Fryars, Monks, Nuns, and Eremites.

Their Patriarch, or chiefe director in matter of religion vntill this last year, was of the City of Constanstinople (whom they called the Patriarch of Sio) because, being driuen by the Turke out of Constanstinople (the seat of his Empire) he remoued to the Isle Sio, sometimes called Chio, and there placed his Patriarchall Sea. So that the Emperors & Cleargy of Russia, and to acknowledge a spirituall kinde of homage, and subiection due to him, and to that Church. Which custome they haue held (as it seemeth) euer since they professed the Christian Religion. Which how long it hath bene, I coule not well learne, for that they haue no story or monument of Antiquity (that I could heere of) to shew what hath bene done in times past within their Countrey, concerning either Church or Commonwealth matters.

A solemne great mariage.

Onely I heard a report amongst them, that about three hundred yeares since, there was a marriage betwixt the Emperour of Constantinople, & the kings daughter of that Countrey: who (at the first) denied to ioyne his daughter in marriage with the Greeke Emperour, because he was of the Christian Religion. Which agreeth well with that which I find in the story of Laonicus Chalacandylas, concerning Turkish affaires in his fourth book: where he speaketh of such a marriage, betwixt Iohn the Greeke Emperour, and the Kings daughter of Sarmatia.

And this argueth (out of their own report) that at that time, they had not receyued the Christian Religion: As also, that they were conuerted to the faith, and withall peruerted at the very same time, receyuing the doctrine of the Gospel corrupted with superstitions euen at the very first, when they tooke it from the Greeke Church, which it selfe then was degenerate, and corrupted with many superstitions and fowle errors, both in Doctrine & Discipline: as may appeare by the storie of Nicephorus Gregoras, in his eighth and ninth bookes.

The Poloni-
an history.

But, as touching the time of their conuersion to the Christian faith, I suppose rather, that it is mistaken by the Russe: for that which I find in the Polonian story, the second Booke, the third chapter: where is sayde, that about the yeare 990. Plodimir Duke of Russia, married one Anne, sister to Basilius and Constantinus brothers, and Emperours of Constantinople. Whereupon the Russe receyued the Faith and profession of Christ. Which, though it be somewhat more ancient then the time noted before out of the Russe report; yet it falleth out al to one reckning, touching this point, vizin what truth and sincerity of doctrine the Russe receyued the first stamp of religion: forasmuch as the Greeke church (at that time also) was many waies infected with error and superstition.

In the yeare 1588. came vnto the Mosko the Patriarch of Constantinople, or Sio, called Hieronimo, being banished (as som sayd) by the Turke, as some other reported, by the Greeke Clergy deputed. The Emperour being giuen altogether to superstitious deuotions, gaue him great entertainment. Before his comming vnto Mosko, he had bin in Italy with the Pope, as was reported there by som of his company. His errand was, to consult with the Emperour, concerning these points.

First, about a league to passe between him and the King of Spaine, as the meekest Prince to ioyne with him in opposition against the Turke. To which purpose also Ambassages had passed betwixt the Russe and the Persian. Likewise from the Georgians to the Emperour of Russia, to ioyne league together, for the invading of the Turke on all sides of his dominion: taking the advantage of the simple quality of the Turke that then was. This treatie was helped forward by the Emperours Ambassador of Almaigne, sent at the same time to sollicite an inuasion on the partes of Polonia, that lye towards Russland, and to borrow money of the Russe Emperour, to pursue the warre for his brother Maximilian against the Swedens son, then King of Poland.

But this consultation concerning a league betwixt the Russe & the Spaniard (which was then in some forwardnesse, and already one appointed for Ambassage into Spaine) was defeated, by means of the ouerthrow giuen to the Spanish king by her Maiesty, the Queen of England the last yeare before. Which made the Russe Emperour and his Counsell, to giue the sadder countenance to the English Ambassador there at that time: for that they were disappointed of so good a policy, as was this coniunction, supposed to be betwixt them and the Spanish.

His second purpose (whereto the first serued as an introduction) was, in reuenge of the Turke and the Greeke Clergye, that hadde thrust him from his seate, to treat with him about the reducing of the Russe church vnder the Pope of Rome. Wherein it may seeme, that comming lately from Rome, hee was set vpon by the

the Pope, who hath attempted the same many times before, though all in vaine: and namely in the time of the late Emperour Iuan Vasiluovich, by one Anthony his Legate. But thought this (belike) a far better meane to obtaine his purpose, by treaty and mediation of their owne Patriarch. But this not succeeding, the Patriarch fell to a third point of treaty, concerning the resignation of his Patriarchship, and translation of the Sea from Constantinople, or Sio, to the City of Mosko. Which was so well liked, and entertained by the Emperour (as a matter of high religion and policy) that no other treaty (specially of forraign Ambassages) could be heard or regarded, till that matter was concluded.

The Pa-

The second
intention.

The reasons wherewith the Patriarch perswaded the translating of his Sea to the City of Mosko, were these in effect.

First, for that the Sea of the Patriarch was vnder the Turke, that is enemy to the faith: And therefore to be remoued into some other Countrey of Christian profession.

Secondly, because the Russe Church was the onely naturall Daughter of the Greeke at this time, and holdeth the same Doctrine and Ceremonies with it: the rest being all subiect to the Turke, and fallen away from the right profession. Wherein the subtrill Greeke (to make the better market of his broken ware) aduanced the honour that would grow to the Emperour, and his Countrey: to haue the Patriarchs seate, translated into the chiefe City, and seate of his Empire. As for the right of translating the Sea, and appointing his successeur; hee made no doubt of it, but that it pertained wholly vnto himselfe.

So the Emperour and his Counsell, with the principall of his Clergye, being assembled at the Mosko, it was determined, that the Metropolitane of Mosko, should become Patriarch of the whole Greeke Church, and haue the same full authority and iurisdiction, that pertained before to the Patriarch of Constantinople, or Sio. And that it might be done with more order and solemnity, the 25. of January, 1588. the Greeke Patriarch, accompanied with the Russe Clergye, went vnto the great Church of Precheste, or our Lady, within the Emperours Castle (hauing first wandered through the whole City in manner of a procession, and blessing the people with his two fingers) where he made an Oration, and deliuered his resignation in an instrument of writing, and so layde downe his Patriarchiall staffe. Which was presently receiued by the Metropolitane of Mosko, & diuers other ceremonies vsed about the inauguration of this new Patriarch.

The day was holden very solemne by the people of the City, who were commanded to forebear their works, and to attend this solemnity. The great Patriarch that day was honored with rich presents sent him from the Emperour & Emperesse of Place, Cloath of Gold, Furs, &c. carried with great pompe through the streetes of Mosko, and (at his departing) receiued many gifts more, both from the Emperour, Nobility, and Clergye. Thus the Patriarchship of Constantinople, or Sio, (which hath continued since the Counsell of Nice) is now translated vnto Mosko, or they made beleeue, that they haue a Patriarch, with the same right and authority that the other had. VVherin the suble Greeke hath made good advantage of their superstition, & is now gone away with a rich booty into Poland, whither their Patriarchship be currant or not.

The matter is not vnlike to make some Schisme betwixt the Greeke and Russe Church, if the Russe hold this Patriarchship that he hath so well payed for, & the Greekes elect another withall, as likely they wil, whither this man were banished by the Turke, or depriued by order of his owne Clergye. Which might happen to giue advantage to the Pope, & to bring ouer the Russe Church to the Sea of Rome (to which ende peraduenture hee deuised this stratagem, and cast in this matter of Schisme among them) but that the Emperours of Russia knew well enough, (by the example of other Christian Princes) what inconuenience would grow to their State and Countrey, by subiecting themselves to the Romish Sea. To which ende, the late Emperour Iuan Vasiluovich was very inquisitive, of the Popes authority ouer the Princes of Christendome, and sent one of very purpose to Rome, to behold the order and behaviour of his Court.

With this Patriarch Hieronimo was driuen out (at the same time by the great Turke) one Demetrio, Archbishop of Larissa: who went into England, and pretended the same cause of their banishment by the Turke (to wit) their not admitting of the Popes new Kalender, for the alteration of the year. Which, how unlikely it is, may appeare by these circumstances.

First, because there is no such affection, nor friendly respect, betwixt the Pope and the Turke; as that he should banish a subject, for not obeying the Popes ordinance, specially in a matter of some sequell, for the alteration of times within his owne Countries.

Secondly, for that he maketh no such scruple in deducting of times, and keeping of a iust and precise account from the incarnation of Christ: whom hee doth not acknowledge, otherwise then as I noted before.

Thirdly, for that the said Patriarch is now at Naples in Italy, whither (it may be guessed) he would not haue gone within the Popes reach, and so neare to his nose, if he had beene banished, for opposing himselfe against the Popes Decree.

This Office of Patriarchship now translated to Mosko, beareth a superior authority ouer all the Churches, not onely of Russia, and other the Emperors dominions; but throughout all the Churches of Christendome, that were before vnder the Patriarch of Constantinople, or Sio: or at least, the Russe Patriarch imagineth himselfe to haue the same authority. He hath vnder him (as his proper Diocesse) the Province of Mosko, besides other peculiars. His Court or Office is kept at the Mosko.

Before the creation of this new Patriarch, they had but one Metropolit, that was called the Metropolit of Mosko. Now for more state to their Church, and new Patriarch; they haue two Metropolites, the one of Novogrod velica, the other of Rostow. Their Office is, to receiue of the Patriarch, such Ecclesiasticall Orders, as he thinks good, & to deliuer the charge of the ouer to the Archbishops: besides the ordering of their owne Diocesse.

Their Archbishops are foure: of Smolensko, Cazan, Volsko, and Velogda. The parts of their Office is all one with the Metropolites: saue that they haue an vnder jurisdiction, as Suffraganes to the Metro-polites, and superiors to the Bishops. The next are the Vladikeis, or Bishops, that are but fixe in all: of Crutitska, of Resan, of Ofser, and Torshock, of Collo menska, of Volodemer, of Susdalla. These haue euery one a very large Diocesse: as diuiding the rest of the whole Country among them.

The matters pertaining to the Ecclesiasticall jurisdiction, of the Metropolites, Archbishops, and Bishops, are the same (in a manner) that are vsed by the Clergie in other parts of Christendome. For, besides their authority ouer the Clergie, and ordering such matters as are mere Ecclesiasticall; their jurisdiction extendeth to all testamentary causes, matters of marriage, and diuorcements, some pleas of iniuries, &c.

To which purpose also they haue their Officials, or Commissaries (which they call Boiaren Vladitsky) that are Lay-men of the degree of Dukes, or Gentlemen, that keepe their Courts, and execute their jurisdiction. Which, besides their other oppressions ouer the common people, raigne ouer the Priests: as the Dukes and Diacks do ouer the poore people, within their Precincts.

As for the Archbishoppe or Bishop himselfe, he beareth no way in deciding those causes, that are brought into his Court. But if hee would moderate any matter, he must do it by entreaty with his Gentleman Officiall. The reason is, because these Boiarsky, or Gentlemen officials, are not appointed by the Bishops, but by the Emperour himselfe, or his Counsell, and are to giue account of their doings to none but to them. If the Bishop can entreat (at his admission) to haue the choise of his owne Officiall; it is accounted for a speciall great fauour. But to speake it as it is, the Clergie of Russia, as well concerning their lands and reuenues, as their authority and iurisdiction; are altogether ordered and ouer-ruled by the Emperour, and his Counsell, and haue to much, and no more of both as their pleasure doth permit them.

They haue also their assistants of severall Counsels (as they call them) of certaine Priests that are of their Dioces, residing within their Cathedrall cities, to the number of foure & twenty a peece. These aduise with them, about the speciall and necessary necessary matters belonging vnto theyr charge.

Concerning their rents and reuenues to maintaine their dignities, it is somewhat large. The Patriarches yearly rents out of his lands (besides other fees) is about three thousand Rubbels or Markes. The Metropolites and Archbishops, about two thousand and five hundred. The Bishops some a thousand, some eight hundred, some five hundred, &c. They haue had some of them (as I haue heard say) ten or twelue thousand rubbels a year; as had the Metropolit of Novograde.

Their habite or apparel (when they shew themselves in their Pontificalibus, after their solemnest manner) is a Miter on their heads, after the Popish fashion, with Pearle and precious stone, a Cope on their backs, commonly of Cloth of Gold, embrodered with Pearle, and a Crossiers staffe in their hands, layed ouer all with plate of siluer double gilt, with a Croffe or Shepherds crook at the vpper end of it.

Their ordinary habit otherwife, when they ride or go abroad, is a hood on their heads of blacke colour, that hangeth downe their backs, and standeth out like a Bonbrace before. Their vpper garment (which they call keis) is a gowne or Mantle of blacke Damaske, with many lifts or garges of white Sattin laid vpon it, euery garge about two fingers broad, and theye Crossiers staffe carried before them. These followe after, blessing the people with their two forefingers, with a maruelous grace.

The election, and appointing of the Bishops and the rest, pertaineth wholly to the Emperour himselfe. They are chosen euery out of the Monasteries: so that there is no Bishop, Archbyschoppe, nor Metropolit, but hath bene a Monke, or Fryer before. And (by that reason) they are, and must all bee vnmarried men, for their vow of Chastity, when they wer first thorne. When the Emperour hath appointed whom he thinketh good, hee is inuested in the Cathedrall Church of his Diocesse, with many ceremonies, much after the manner of the Popish inauguration. They haue also their Deanes, and their Arch-deacons.

As for preaching the word of God, or any teaching, or exhorting such as are vn-

der them; they neither vse it, nor haue any skill of it: the whole Clergie beeing vtterly vnlearned, both for other knowledge, and in the worde of God. Onely their manner is twice euery year, viz: the first of September (which is the first day of their year) and on S. Iohn Baptists day to make an ordinary speech to the people, euery Metropolit, Archbyschop and Byschop in his Cathedrall Church, so this or the like effect.

That if any be in malice toward his neighbor, he shall leave off his malice: if any haue thought of treason or rebellion against his Prince, he beware of such practise: if he haue not kept his fasts and Vowes, nor doone his other duties to the holy church, he shall amend that fault, &c.

And this is a matter of forme with the vttered in as many words, and no more (in a manner) then I haue here set downe. Yet the matter is done with that grace & solemnity, in a pulpit of purpose set vpp for this one Act; as if he wer to discourse at large of the whole substance of diuinity. At the Mosko, the Emperour himselfe is euery present at this solemn exhortation.

As themselves are voyde of all manner of learning, so they are warie to keepe out all means that might bring any in: as fearing to haue their ignorance and vngodlinesse discouered. To that purpose they haue perswaded the Emperours, that it would breed inuouation, and so danger to their State, to haue any nouelty of learning come within the Realme. Wherein they say but truth, for that a man of spirit and vnderstanding, holpen by Learning and liberrall education, can hardly endure a tyrannicall government.

Some times past, in the other Emperours time) there came a Presse & Letters out of Polonia, to the City of Mosko, where a Printing-house was set vpp, with great liking and allowance of the Emperour himself. But not long after, the house was set on fire in the night time, & the Presse and Letters quite burnt vpp, and (as it was thought) by the procurement of the Clergie men.

Their Priests, whome they call Papies are made by the Byschoppes, without any great trial for worthinesse of gifts, before they admit them, or ceremonies in their admission: saue that their heads are thorn

(not shauen, for that they like not) about an hand bredth or more in the Crowne, and that place annointed with Oyle by the Bythop: who in his admission putteth vpon the Priest, first his Surpleſſe; and then setteth a white croſſe on his brest of ſilke, or ſome other matter, which hee is to weare eight dayes, and no more: and ſo giueth him authority to ſay and ſing in the Church, and to adminiſter the Sacraments.

They are men vtterly vnlearned, which is no maruell, forasmuch as their makers, the Bythoppes themſelues (as before was ſayde) are cleere of that quality, & make no farther vſe at all of any kinde of Learning, no not of the Scriptures themſelues, ſaue to reade and to ſing them. Their ordinary charge and function, is to ſay the Liturgie, to adminiſter the Sacraments after their manner, to keep & decke their Idols, and to doe the other Ceremonies vſuall in their Churches. Their number is great, becauſe theyr Townes are parted into many ſmall Parishes, without any diſcretion, for deuiding them into competent numbers of houſholds, and people for a iuſt Congregation: as the manner in all places where the meanes is neglected, for increaſing of knowledge, and inſtruction towards God. Which cannot well be had, where by meanes of an vnequall partition of the people, and parishes, there followeth a want and vnequality of ſtipend, for a ſufficient Miniſtery.

For their Priests, it is lawfull to marry for the first time. But if the first Wife dye, a ſecond he cannot take, but he muſt loſe his Prieſthood, and his liuing withal. The reaſon, they make out of that place of Saint Paul to Timothy, 1.3.2. not well vnderſtood, thinking that to bee ſpoken of diuers wiues ſucceſſiuely, that the Apoſtle ſpeaketh of at one and the ſame time. If he will needes marry againe after his first Wife is dead, hee is no longer called Papa, but Kappa, or Priest Quondam. This maketh the Priests to make much of their Wiues, who are accounted as the Matrones, and of beſt reputation, among the Women of the Parish.

For the ſtipend of the Priest, their manner is not to pay him any tenths of corne, or ought elſe: but hee muſt ſtand at the deuotion of the people of his owne Parish, and make vp the Incomes towards his maintenance, ſo well as he can, by offerings, Thrifts, marriages, burials, diriges, and prayers for the dead and the liuing (which they call Mollitua). For beſides their publike ſeruite within their Churches, their manner is, for euery private man to haue a prayer ſaide for him by the Priest, vpon any occaſion of buſineſſe whatſoeuer, whether he ride, goe, ſayle, plough, or whatſoeuer elſe hee doeth. Which is not framed according to the occaſion of his buſineſſe, but at random, being ſome of their ordinary and vſuall Church prayers. And this is thought to be more holy and effectual, if it be repeated by the Priests mouth, rather then by his owne.

They haue a cuſtome beſides to ſolemnize the Saints day, that is Patron to their Church once euery yeare. What time all their neighbours of their Country, & parishes about, come in to haue prayers ſaide to that Saint, for themſelues, and their friends: and ſo make an Offering to the Priest for his paines.

This Offering may yeeld them ſome ten pounds a yeare, more or leſſe, as the Patron or Saint of that Church is of credite and eſtimation among them. The manner is on this day (which they keepe anniuersary for the Priest) to hyre diuers of his neighbour-Priests to helpe him: as hauing more Diſhes to dreſſe for the Saint, then hee can well turne his hand vnto.

They vſe beſides to viſite their pariſhioners houſes, with holy Water, and Perfume, commonly once a quarter: and ſo hauing ſprinkled and beſenſed the Goodman and his Wife, with the reſt of their houſhold and houſhold-ſtuffe, they receyue ſome deuotion (more or leſſe) as the man is of ability. This and the reſt laid together, may make vp for the Priest towards his maintenance, about thirtie or forty Rubbels a yeere: whereof he payeth the tenth part to the Bythoppe of the Dioceſſe.

The Papa or Priest is knowne by his long tuſſs of hayre, hanging down by his eares, his gowne with a broad Cape, and a walking ſtaffe in his hand. For the reſt of his habite, he is apparelled like to the common ſort. When he ſaith the Liturgie gie or ſeruite, within the Church, he hath on him his Surpleſſe, and ſometimes his Cope, if the day be more ſolemne. They haue beſides their Papas or priests, theyr Churnypapas (as they call them) that is, Blacks Priests; that may keepe their benefices, though they bee admitted Friars withall within ſome Monaſterie. They ſeeme to be the very ſame, that were called Regular Priests in the Popiſh church. Vnder the Priest, is a Deacon in euery Church, that doth nothing but the office of a Parſon Clarke. As for their Protopapas, or Arch-priests, and their Archdeacons (that are next in election to bee their Protopapas) they ſerue onely in the Cathedral Churches.

As theſe haire are clipped off, and taken from thy head: ſo now wee take thee, and ſeparate thee cleane from the world and worldly things, &c.

Off Friars they haue an infinite rabble, farre greater then in any other Country, where Popery is profeſſed. Euery Citie, and good part of the Country, ſwartheth full of them. For they haue wrought (as the Popiſh Fryars did by their ſuperſtition and hypocriſie) that if any part of the Realme be better and ſweeter then others; there ſtandeth a Friery or a Monaſterie, dedicated to ſome Saint.

The number of them is ſo much the greater, not onely for that it is augmented by the ſuperſtition of the country; but becauſe the Fryars life is the ſafeſt from the oppreſſions and exactions which fall vpon the Commons. Which cauſeth many to put on the Friers weede, as the beſt Armour to beare off ſuch blowes. Beſides ſuch as are voluntary, there are diuers that are forced to ſheare theſelues Fryers, vpon ſome diſpleaſure. Theſe are for the moſt part of the cheefe Nobility.

Diuers take the Monaſteries as a place of Sanctuary, and there become Fryers, to auoid ſome puniſhment, that they had deſerued by the lawes of the realme. For if he get a Monaſtery ouer his heade, and there put on a Coule before hee be attached, it is a proteccion to him for euer againſt any Law, for what crime ſoeuer: except it be for treaſon. But this Prouiſo goeth withall, that no man commeth there (except ſuch as are commanded by the Emperour to be receyued) but he giueth them Lands, or bringeth his ſtocke with him, and putteth it into the cōmon Treafury. Some bring a thouſand Rubbels, and ſome more. None is admitted vnder three or foure hundred.

The manner of their admission is after this ſort. Firſt, the Abbot ſtripeth him of all his ſecular or ordinary Apparell. Then he putteth vpon him next vnto his ſkinne, a white Flannell ſhirt, with a long garment ouer it downe vnto the ground, girded to him with a broad leather belt. His vppermoſt Garment is a Weede of Garras or Say, for colour and faſhion, much like to the vpper weed of a Chimney ſweeper. Then is crowne ſhorne a hand bredth, or more, cloſe to the verie ſkin, and theſe or the like words are pronounced by the Abbot, while hee clippeth his haire.

As theſe haire are clipped off, and taken from thy head: ſo now wee take thee, and ſeparate thee cleane from the world and worldly things, &c.

This done, he annointeth his crowne with oyle, and putteth on his Coule: and ſo taketh him in among the Fraternitie. They vow perpetual chaſtity, and abſtinenſe from fleſh.

There is one Abbey called Trois, that hath in lands and fees, the ſumme of an hundred thouſand Rubbels, or markes a yeare.

It is built in manner of a Caſtle, walled round about with great Ordenance planted on the Wall, and containeth within it a large bredth of ground, and great variety of building. There are of Fryers within it (beſides their Officers and other ſeruants) about ſeuē hundred. The Empreſſe that then was, had many Vowes to Saint Sergius, that is patron there: to intreat him to make her fruitfull, as hauing no children by the Emperour her Husband. Lightly (euery yeare) ſhe went on Pilgrimage to him from the Moſko, on ſoote, about foureſcore ordinary miles, with five or ſixe thouſand women attending vpon her, all in blew Lineries, and foure thouſand ſouldiers for her Guard. But S. Sergius hath not yet heard her prayers, though (they ſay) hee hath a ſpeciall gift and faculty that way.

Fryars, may be known by their Bythops, that are the choise men out of all their Monasteries. I talked with one of them at the City of Pologda, where (to trie his skill) I offered him a Russe Testament, and turned him to the first chap. of S. Mathens Gospell. Where he began to read in very good order.

I asked him first, What part of Scripture it was that he had read? He answered, that he could not well tell. How many Euangelists there were in the Newe Testament? He saide he knew not. How many Apostles there were? He thought there were twelue. How he should be faued? Whereunto he answered me (with a peece of Russe Doctrine) that hee knew not whether hee should be faued, or no: But if God wold Polballonate him, or gratifie him so much, as to faue him, so it was; he would be glad of it: if not, what remedy? I asked him. Why he shored him selfe a Fryer? He answered, because hee would eate his breade in quietnesse and peace.

This is the learning of the Fryars of Russia, which though it be not to be measured by one, yet partly it may be gesfed (by the ignorance of this man) what is in the rest.

They haue also very many Nunneries, whereof some may admit none but Noblemens Widdowes and Daughters, when the Emperour meaneth to keepe them vnmarried, from continuing the blood of stocke, which hee would haue extinguished. To speak of the life of their Fryars and Nunnes, it needs not, to those that know the hypocrisse and vncleanness of that Cloyster-broode. The Russe himselfe (though otherwise addicted to all superstition) speaketh so fowly of it, that it must needs gain silence of any modest man.

Besides these, they haue certaine Eremites (whome they call Holy men) that are like to those Gymnosophists for their life and behaviour: though farre vnlike for their knowledge and Learning. They vse to goe stark naked, saue a clowte about their middle, with their hayre hanging long and wildly about their shoulders, and many of them with an iron collar, or chaine about their neckes or middle, euen in the very extremity of Winter.

These they take as Prophets, and men of great holinesse, giuing them a libertie to speake what they list, without any controlment, though it be of the very highest himselfe. So that if he reprove any openly, in what sort soeuer; they answer nothing, but that it is Pogracum, that is, for their finnes. And if any of them take meece of sale ware from any mans shop, as he passeth by, to giue where he list; hee thinketh himselfe much beloued of God, and much beholding to the holy man, for taking it in that sort.

Of this kinde there are not many, because it is a very hard and cold profession, to goe naked in Russia, especially in winter. Among other at this time, they haue one at Mosko, that walketh naked about the Streets, and inuethy commonly, against the State and Government, especially against the Godones, that are thought at this time, to bee great Oppressours of that Common-wealth.

Another there was, that died not many yeares agoe (whom they called Basileo) that would take vpon him to reprove the olde Emperor for all his cruelty, and oppressions done towards his people. His body they haue translated (of late) into a sumptuous Church, neere the Emperours house in Mosko, & haue Canonized him for a Saint. Many miracles he doth there (for so the Fryers make the people to beleene) and many Offerings are made vnto him, not onely by the people, but by the cheefe Nobility, and the Emperour & Emperesse themselves, which visite that Church with great deuotion.

But at my beeing at Mosko, this Saint had ill lucke in working his miracles. For a lame man, that had his limbes restored (as it was pretended by him) was charged by a woman that was familiar with him (being then false out) that he halted but in the day time, and could leape merrily when he came home at night. And that he had intended this matter six yeares before.

Now he is put into a Monasterie, and there railth vpon the Fryers, that hyred him to haue this counterfeyte miracle practised vpon him. Besides this disgrace, a little before my coming from thence, there were eight flaine within his Church, by fire in a Thunder. Which caused his bels (that wet tingling before all all day and night long, as in triumphe of the myracles wrought by Basileo their S.) to ring from what softly; and hath wrought no little discredit vnto this Miracle worker.

There was another of great account at Plesko (called Nichola of Plesko) that did much good, when this Emperours Father came to sacke the Towne, vpon suspicion of their reuolting and rebellion against him. The Emperour, after he had saluted the Eremit, at his lodging, sent him a reward. And the Holy man, to requite the Emperour, sent him a peece of raw flesh, being then their Lent. Which the Emperour seeing, bid one to tel him, that hee marvelled, that the Holye man would offer him flesh to eat in the Lent, when it was forbidden by order of holie Church. And doth Enasiko (which is as much to say as Iacke) thinke (quoth Nichola) that it is vnlawfull to eat a peece of beastes flesh in Lent. & not to eate up so much mans flesh, as he hath done already?

So, threatening the Emperour, with a prophesie of some harde adventure to come vpon him, except hee left murthering of his people, and departing from the Towne, hee saued a great many mens lues at that time.

This maketh the people to like very well of them, because they are as Pasquils to note their great mens fautes, that no man else dare speake of. Yet it falleth out sometime, that for this rude liberty which they take vpon them (after a counterfeite manner) by imitation of Prophets, they are made away in secret: as was one or two of them, in the last Emperours time, for being ouer-bolde in speaking against his government.

Their morning seruice they call Zau-trama, that is, Matins. It is done in this order.

The Priest entereth into the Church, with his Deacon following him. And, when hee is come vnto the middle of the Church, he begetteth to say with a lowd voyce: Blaslausy Vladika, that is, Blesse vs heavenly Pastor, meaning of Christ. Then he addeth, In the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the holy Ghost, one very God in Trinity: and Apody Pomeluy, Or, Lord haue mercy vpon vs, Lord haue mercie vpon vs, Lord haue mercy vpon vs, repeated three times.

This done, he marcheth on toward the Chancell or Sancium Sanctorum (as they vse to call it) and so entereth into the Schar-suey Dwerre, or the heavenly doore: which no man may enter into, but the Priest onely. Where standing at the Altare or Table (set neere to the vpper wall of the Chancell) hee sayeth the Lordes prayer, and then againe Apody Pomeluy, or Lord haue mercy vpon vs, Lord haue mercy vpon vs, &c. pronounced twelue times. Then prayled be the Trinity the Father, the Son, and the holy Ghost, for euer and euer. Where to the Deacons and people say, Amen. Next after, the Priest addeth the Psalms for that day, and begetteth with, O come let vs worship and fall down before the Lord, &c. and therewithall himselfe, with the Deacons, and people, all turn themselves towards their Idols or Images that hang on the Wall, and (crossing themselves) bow downe three times, knocking their heads to the very ground. After this, hee readeth the ten Commandements, and Athanasius Creede, out of the Service booke.

This being done, the Deacon that standeth without the heavenly doore or Chancell, readeth a peece of a Legend, out of a Written Booke (for they haue it not in Print) of some Saints life, Miracles, &c. This is diuided into many parts, for every day in the yeare, and is read by them with a plaine singing Note, not vnlike to the Popish Tune, when they sung their Gospels.

After all this (which reacheth vnto an houre, and an halfe, or two howers of length) he addeth certaine set Collectes, or prayers vpon that which he hath read out of the Legend before: and so endeth his Service. All this while stande burning before their Idols, a great many of Wax Candles (whereof some are of the biggenesse of a mans waste) vowed, or enoynd by penance, vpon the people of the Parish.

About nine of the clocke in the Morning, they haue another Service, called Obeiana (or Compline) much after the order of the Popish Service, that bare that name. If it be some high or Festiual day, they furnish their Service besides, With Blesed be the Lord God of Israel, &c. and, We praise thee, O God, &c. sung with a more sollemne and curious note.

Their euen-

Their Evening Service, called Vecherna, where the Priest beginneth with Blaisey Vladaika, as hee did in the morning, and with the Psalmes appoynted for the Vecherna. Which being read, he singeth, My soule doth magnifie the Lord, &c. And then the Priest, Deacons, and People, all with one voyce sing, Alpsody pomelui, or Lord haue mercy vpon vs, thirty times together. Whereunto the boyes that are in the Church, answer all with one voyce, rowling it vp so fast, as their lips can goe; Verij, Verij, Verij, Verij, or Praisfe, Praisfe, Praisfe, &c. thirty times together, with a very strange noyse. Then is read by the Priest, and vpon the Holy-dayes sung the first Psalm, Blessed is the man, &c. And in the end of it, is added, Alleluia, repeated ten times.

Then next in order, is some part of the Gospel read by the Priest, which he ends with Alleluia, repeated three times. And so hauing said a Collect, in remembrance of the Saint of that day, he ends his evening Service.

All this while, the Priest stands aboute at the Altare or high Table, within the Chancel, or Sanktum Sanctorum, whence hee neuer moueth all the Service time. The Deacon or Deacons (which are many in their Cathedrall Churches) stand without the Chauncell by the Scharfney Dvere, or heavenly dore: for within they may not be seene all the Service time, though otherwise their office is to sweep, and keepe it, and to set vp the waxe candles before their Idoles. The people do stand together (the whole Service time) in the Church, and some in the Church porch: for Piew or Seate they haue none within their Churches.

The Sacrament of Baptisme they administer after this manner: The child is brought to the Church (and this is done within eight dayes after it is borne.) If it be the child of some Noble man, it is brought in a rich Sled or Waggon, with chaires and cushions of cloath of Golde, and such like sumptuous shew of their best furniture. When they are come to the Church, the Priest standeth readie to receiue the child within the Church-porch, with his tub of water by him. And then beginneth to declare vnto them, that they haue brought a little Infidell to be made a Christian, &c. This ended, he teacheth the witnesses, that are two or three, in a certayne set forme out of his Booke (what their duty is,) in bringing vp the child after he is baptized, viz. That hee must bee taught to know God, and Christ our Saviour. And because God is of great Maieitic, and we must not presume to come vnto him, without Mediators (as the manner is when we make any suite to an Emperour, or great Prince) therefore they must teach him what Saints are the best, and chiefe mediators, &c. This done, he commaundeth the diuell in the name of God (after a coniuring manner) to come out of the water and so after certaine prayers, he plungeth the child ouer head and eares. For this they holde to be a poynt very necessary, that no part of the child be left vndipped into the water.

The words that beare with them the forme of Baptisme, vttered by the Priest, when he dipperth in the child, are the very same that are prescribed in the Gospel, and vied by vs, that is, In the name of the Father, and of the Sonne, and of the Ghost. For that they should alter the forme of the words, and say, by the holy Ghost, as I haue heard they did, following certaine heretikes of the Greeke Church, I found to be vnttrue, as well by the report of them that haue bene often at their Baptismes, as by their Booke of Leiturgie it selfe, wherein the order of Baptisme is precisely set downe.

When the child is baptized, the Priest layeth Oyle and Salt tempered together vpon the fore-head, and both the sides of his face, and then vpon his mouth, drawing it along with his finger ouer the child's lippes (as did the Popish Priests) saying withall, certaine prayers, to this effect: That God will make him a good Christian, &c. All this is doone in the Church porch.

Then is the child (as being now made a Christian, & meet to be receiued within the Church doore) carried into the Church, the Priest going before, and is there presented to the chiefe Idoll of the Church, being layd on a cushion before the feet of the Image, by it (as by the mediator) to be commended vnto God. If the child be sicke, or weake (specially in the Winter) they vse to make the water luke warme. After Baptisme, the manner is to cut off the haire from the child's head and hauing wrapped it within a peece of wax, to lay it vp, as a relike or monument in a secret place of the Church.

This is the manner of their Baptisme, which they account to be the best & perfectest forme. As they do all other parts of their religion, receiued (as they say) by tradition from the best church, meaning the Greeke. And therefore they will take great paines to make a Profelitte or Conuerter, either of an Infidell, or of a forraign Christian, by rebaptizing him after the Russe manner.

When they take any Tartar prisoner, commonly they will offer him life, with condition to be baptized. And yet they perswade very fewe of them to redeeme their life so: because of the natural hatred the Tartar beareth to the Russe, and the opinion he hath of his fals hood and iniustice. The yeare after Mosko was fired by the Chrim Tartar, there was taken a Dismorsley, one of the chief in that exploit, with 300. Tartars more: who had all their liues offered them, if they would be baptized after the Russe maner. Which they all refused to do, with many reproches against those that perswaded them. And so being carried to the riuer Mosko, (that runneth thorough the City) they were all baptized after a violent manner: being thrust downe with a knocke on the head into the water, through an hole made in the Ice for that purpose.

Of Lieslanders that are Captiues, there are many that take on them this second Russe baptisme, to get more libertie, and some-what besides towards their liuing, which the Emperour ordinarily vseth to giue them. Of Englishmen (since they frequented the country) there was neuer any found, that so much forgot God, his faith, and country, as that he would be content to be baptized Russe, for any respect of ease, preferment, or other means whatsoever: save onely Richard Relph, that following before an vngodly Trade, by keeping a Caback (against the order of the country) and being putte off from that Trade, and spoiled by the Emperours Officers of that which he hadde, entered himselfe into the Russe profession, and so was rebaptized, liuing now as much an Idolater, as before he was a rioter and vnthrifty person.

Such as thus receiue the Russe baptisme, are first caried into some Monastery, to be instructed there in the doctrine and ceremonies of the Church. Where they vse these ceremonies.

First, they put him into a new & fresh suite of apparrell, made of the Russe fashion, and set a Coronet, or (in Sommer) a garland vpon his head.

Then they annoint his head with oile, & put a wax candle light into his hand: & to pray ouer him foure times a day, the space of vii. daies. All this while hee is to abstaine from flesh and white meats.

The seuen dayes being ended, he is purified and washed in a Bath-stoue, and so the eight day he is brought to the church, where he is taught (by the Friers) how to behaue himself in presence of their idols; by ducking down, knocking of the head, crossing himselfe, and such like gestures, which are the greatest part of the Russe religion.

The Sacrament of the Lords Supper, they receiue but once a year, in their gret Lent time, a little before Easter. Three at the most are admitted at one time, and neuer aboue. The manner of their communicating is thus. First, they do confesse themselves of all their sins, to the Priest (whome they call their ghostly Father.) Then they come to the Church, and are called vp to the Communion table, that standeth like an Altar, a little remooued from the vpper end of the Church, after the Dutch manner.

Heere first they are asked of the Priest, whether they be clean, or no: that is, whether they haue neuer a sinne behinde that they left vnconfessed. If they answer, No, they are taken to the table. Where the Priest beginneth with certain viual prayers, the Communicants standing in the meane while with their armes folded one within another, like penitentiaries, or mourners. When these prayers are ended, the Priest taketh a spoon, and filleth it full of Claret Wine. Then he putteth into it a small peece of bread, and tempereth them both together, and so deliuereth them in the Spoon to the Communicants, that stand in order, speaking the viual words of the Sacrament, Eate this, &c. Drink this, &c. both at one time without any pause.

After that, hee deliuereth them againe bread by it selfe, and then wine carded together with a little warme water, to represent blood more rightly (as they thinke) and the water withall, that flowed out of the side of Christ. Whiles this is in doing, the Communicants vnfold their armes. And then folding them againe, follow the Priest thrice round about the Communion Table, and so returne to their places againe. Where hauing saide certaine other prayers, hee dismisseth the Communicants, with charge to be merry, and to cheere vp themselves for the fewen dayes next following. Which being ended, he enioyneth them to fast for it as long time after. Which they vse to observe with very great deuotion, eating nothing else but bread and salt, except a little cabbage, and some other hearb or roote, with water or quassemead for their drinke.

This is their manner of administering the Sacraments, wherein what they differ from the Institution of Christ, and what ceremonies they haue added of their owne, or rather borrowed of the Greekes, may easily be noted.

Their cheefe errors in matter of faith, I finde to be these.

First, concerning the word of God it selfe, they will not reade publicly certain Bookes of the Canonickall Scripture, as the Bookes of Moses; specially the foure last, Exodus, Leuiticus, Numeri, and Deuteronomie, which they say are all made disauthenticke, and put out of vse by the coming of Christ; as not able to discern the difference betwixt the Morall, and the Ceremoniall law.

The Bookes of the Prophets they allow of, but reade them not publicly in their Churches, for the same reason; because they were but directers vnto Christ, and proper (as they say) to the Nation of the Iewes. Onely the booke of Psalmes they haue in great estimation, and sing & say them daily in their Churches.

Of the new Testament they allow, and reade all except the Reuelation: which therefore they reade not (though they allow it) because they vnderstand it not, neither haue the like occasion, to know the fulfilling of the propheties contained within it, concerning especially the Apostolicke of the Antichristian Church, as haue the Westerne Churches. Notwithstanding they haue had their Antichristes of the Greeke Church, and may find their own falling off, and the punishments for it (by the Turkish inuasion) in the propheties of that Booke.

Secondly (which is the fountain of the rest of all their corruptions both in Doctrine and Ceremonies) they holde with the Papists, that their Church Traditions are of equall authority with the written word of God. Wherein they prefer their selues before other Churches: affirming, that they haue the true and right traditions, deliuered by the Apostles to the Greeke Church, and so vnto them.

3. That the Church (meaning the Greeke, and specially the Patriarch & his Synod, as the head of the rest) haue a soveraigne authority to interpret the scriptures, and that all are bound, to hold that interpretation as found and authenticke.

4. Concerning the diuine Nature, and the three persons, in the one substance of God, that the Holye ghost proceedeth from the Father onely, and not from the Sonne.

5. About the office of Christ, they hold many fowle errors, and the same (almost) as doth the Popish Church; namely, that he is their sole Mediator of redemption, but not of intercession.

Their cheefe reason (if they be talked withall) for defence of this error, is, that vnapt and foolish comparison, betwene God and a Monarch or Prince of this world, that must be sued vnto by Mediators about him: wherein they giue special preferment to some about others, as to the blessed Virgin, whom they call Prescheste, or vndeified: & S. Nicolas, whom they call Scora pomosnick, or the Speedy helper, & say, that he hath 300. Angels of the cheefe, appointed by God to attend on him. This hath brought them to an horrible excessse of idolatry, after the grossest and prophaneest manner; giuing vnto their Images, all Religious worship of Prayer, Thanksgiuing, Offerings, and Adoration, with prostrating and knocking their heads to the ground before them, as to God himselfe. Which because they doo to the picture, not to the portraiture of the Saint, they say they worship not an Idoll, but the Saint in his image, & so offend not God. Forgetting the commādmēt of God, that forbiddeth to make the image image or likenesse of any thing, for any religious worshipping or vse whatsoever. Their Church walles are very full of them, richly hangd and set forth with Pearle & stone vppon the smooth Table. Though some also they haue embossed, that sticke from the boord almost an inch outwards. They call them Choudoudites, or their miracle workers: and when they provide thee to set vp in their churches, in no case they may say that they haue bought the image but exchanged money for it.

6. For the meanes of Iustification, they agree with the Papistes, that it is not by faith onely, apprehending Christ; but by their workes also. And that Opus operatum or the worke for the worke sake, must needs please God. And therefore they are all in their numbers of Prayers, Fastes, Vowes, and offerings to Saints, Almshouses, Crossings, and such like, and carrie their numbering beads about with them continually; aswell the Emperor and his Nobility, as the common people, not onely in the Church, but in all other public meetings, specially at any set or solemne meeting, as in their Fasts, Law Courtes, common consultations, entertainment of Ambassadors, and such like.

7. They say (with the Papists) that no man can be assured of his saluation, til the last sentence be passed at the day of iudgment.

8. They vse Auricular confession, and thinke that they are purged (by the verediction) from so many sins as they confesse by name, and in particular to the Priest.

9. If they do hold three Sacraments, of Baptisme, the Lords Supper, and the last anoynting or unction. Yet concerning their Sacrament of extreame unction, they hold it not so necessary to saluation, as they doe Baptisme; but thinke it a great curse and punishment of God, if any dye without it.

10. They thinke there is a necessitie of Baptisme, and that all are condemned that dye without it.

11. They rebaptize as many Christians (not being of the Greeke church) as they conuert to their Russe profession: because they are diuided from the true Church, which is the Greeke, as they say.

12. They make a difference of meates and drinckes, accounting the vse of one, to be more holy then of another. And therefore in their set fasts, they forbear to eat flesh, and white meates (as we call them) after the manner of the Popish superstition: which they observe so strictly, and with such blind deuotion, as that they will rather die, then eat one bit of flesh, egges or such like, for the health of their bodies in their extreme sicknesse.

13. They hold marriage to be vnlawful for all the Clergy men, except the Priests only, and for them also after the first wife (as was said before.) Neither do they wel allowe of it in Lay-men after the second marriage. Which is a pretence now vsed against the Emperours onely brother, a child of six yeares old: Who therefore is not prayed for in their Churches, as their manner is otherwise for the Princes blood because he was borne of the sixth marriage, and so not legitimate. This charge was giuen to the Priests by the Emperor himselfe, by procurement of the Godmoes: who make him beleue, that it is a good pollicy, to turne away the liking of the people from the next successor.

Many other false opinions they haue in matter of Religion. But these are the chiefe, which they hold partly by meanes of their traditions (which they haue received from the Greeke Church) but specially by ignorance of the holye Scriptures. Which notwithstanding they haue in the Polonian tooong (that is al one with theirs, some few words only excepted) yet few of them read them with that godly care which they ought; to doe: neither haue they (if they would) bookes sufficient of the Olde and New Testament for the common people, but of their Leiturgie onely, or Booke of common Seruice, whereof there are very great numbers.

All this mischeefe commeth from the Clergie, who being ignorant and godlesse themselves, are exceedingly warie, to keepe the people (likewise) in their ignorance and blindness, for their liuing and bellies sake: partly also from their manner of Government settled among them: which the Emperours (whom it specially behooueth) liste not to haue changed by any inuolution, but to retaine that Religion that best agreeth with it. Which notwithstanding it is not to be doubted, but that hauing the word of God in some sort (though without the ordinary meanes, to attaine to a true sence and vnderstanding of it) God hath also his number among them. As may partly appeare, by that which a Ruffe at Moske laid to a follower of an Ambassador, speaking against their Images and other superstitions: That God had given vnto his Country light to day, and might giue it to morrow (if he pleased) to them.

As for any inquisition or proceeding against me for matter of religion, I could heare of none: saue (a few yeares since) against one man and his wife, who were kept in close prison, the space of 28. yeares, till they were ouer-growne into a deformed fashion, for their hayre, nailes, colour of countenance, and such like, and in the ende were burned at Moske, in a small house set on fire. The cause was kept secret, but like it was for some part of truth, in matter of religion: though the people were made to beleue by the Priests and Fryars, that they held some great & damnable heresie.

The manner of making and solemnizing their Mariages, is different from the manner of other Countries. The man (though he neuer saw the woman before) is not permitted to haue any sight of her all the time of his wooing: which he doth not by himselfe, but by his Mother, or some other ancient woman of his kin or acquaintance. When the liking is taken (as well by the Parents, as by the parties themselves, for, without the knowledge and consent of the parents, the contract is not lawfull) the fathers on both sides, or such as are to them in stead of Fathers, with their other chiefe friends, haue a meeting and conference about the dowry, which is commonly very large, after the ability of the Parents: so that you shal haue a Market-man (as they call them) giue a thousand Rubbels, or more with his daughter.

As for the man, it is neuer required of him, nor standeth with their custome, to make any ioynter in recompence of the dowry. But in case he haue a childe by his Wife, he enioyeth a third deale after his decease. If he haue two children by her, or more, there is to haue a courtie more, at the discretion of the husband. If the husband depart without issue by his wife, (shee is returned home to her friends without any thing at all, saue onely her dowry: if the husband leaue so much behind him in goods. When the agreement is made concerning the Dowry, they signe bonds one to the other, as well for the payment of the dowry, as the performing of the marriage by a certain day. If the woman were neuer married before, her father and friends are bound (besides) to assure her a maiden. Which breedeth many babbels and quarrels at law, if the man take any conceit, concerning the behauiour and honesty of his wife.

Thus the contract being made, the parties begin to send Tokens the one to the other; the woman first, then afterward the man, but yet see not one another till the marriage be solemnized. On the eue before the marriage day, the bride is carried in a Collimago, or Coach, or in a sled (if it be Winter) to the bridegroomes house, with her marriage apparrell and bedstead with her, which they are to lye in. For this is euer provided by the bride, and is commonly very faire, with much cost bestowed vpon it. Heere shee is accompanied all that night by her mother, and other women: but not welcomed, nor once seene by the bridegroome himselfe.

When the time is come to haue the Marriage solemnized, the Bride hath put vpon her a kinde of hooide, made of fine knitworke or Lawne, that couereth her head, and all her bodie down to the middle. And so accompanied with his friends and the bride-groome with his, they goe to Church all on horsebacke, though the Church bee neere hand, and themselves but of very meane degree.

The wordes of contract, and other ceremonies in solemnizing the marriage, are much after the order, and with the same words that are vsed with vs: with a ring also giuen to the Bride. Which being put on, & the wordes of contract pronounced: the Brides hand is deliuered into the hand of the Bridegroom, which standeth all this while on the one side of the Altar or Table, and the Bride on the other. So the marriage knot being knit by the Priest, the Bride commeth to the Bridegroom (standing at the end of the Altar or Table) and falleth downe at his feete, knocking her head vpon his shooe, in token of her subiection & obedience. And the Bridegroome againe casteth the lappe of his Gowne or vpper garment, ouer the Bride, in token of his duty to protect and cherish her.

Then the Bridegroom and Bride, standing both together at the Tables end, cometh first the father, and the other friends of the Bride, and bow themselves downe low to the Bride-groome: and so likewise his friends bow themselves to the Bride, in token of affinity and loue, euer after, betwixt the two Kindreds. And withall, the father of the Bridegroom, offereth to the priest a loafe of bread, who deliuereth it straight againe to the father, and other friends of the Bride, with attestation before God and their Idols, that he deliuer the Dowry wholly and truly at the day appointed, and hold loue euer after, one Kindred with another. Whereupon they breake the loafe into peeces, and eate of it, to testifie their true and sincere meanings, for performing of that charge, and therefore to become as graines of one Loafe, or men of one Table.

These Ceremonies being ended, the Bride-groome taketh the Bride by the hand, and so they goe on together, with their friends after them, towards the Church porch. Where meet them certaine with pots and cups in their hands, with Meade and Ruffe Wine. Whereof the Bride-groome taketh first a Charke, or little cuppe full in his hand, and drinketh to the Bride: who opening her hood or vaile belowe, and putting the Cup to her mouth vnderneath it (for being seene of the Bride-groome) pledgeth him againe.

Thus returning altogether from the Church, the Bride-groome goeth not home to his owne, but vnto his Fathers house, and the likewise to hers, where eyther entertaine their friends apart. At the entering into the house, they vse to sling Corne out of the windowes vpon the Bridegroom and Bride, in token of plenty and fruitfulnessse to be with them euer after.

When the Euening is come, the Bride is brought to the Bride-groomes Fathers house, and there lodgeth that night, with her vaile or couer still ouer her head. All that night, shee may not speak one word (for that charge shee receiueth by tradition from her mother and other matrons her Friends) that the Bride-groome must neither heare, nor see her, till the day after the marriage. Neither three dayes after, may she be heard to speake, saue certaine few words at the Table, in a set forme, with great manners and reuerence to the Bride-groome. If shee behaue her selfe otherwise, it is a great prejudice to her credite and life euer after: and will highly bee disliked of the Bride-groome himselfe.

After the third day, they depart vnto their own house, and make a feast to both their friends together. The marriage day, and the whole time of their Festiual, the Bride-groome hath the honor to be called Moloday Knez, or young Duke, and the Bride Moloday Knezny, or yong Dutchesse.

In living with their wives, they shew themselves to be but of a barbarous condition: vsing them as seruantes rather then wives. Except the Noble-women, which are, or seeme to bee of more estimation with their husbands, then the rest of meaner sort. They haue this fowle abuse, contrary to good order, and the word of God it selfe; that vpon dislike of his wife, or other cause whatsoever, the man may go into a Monastery, & theare himselfe a Fryer, by pretence of deuotion, and so leaue his wife to shifte for her selfe so well as she can.

The other Ceremonies of their Church, are many in number: especially, the abuse about the signe of the Crosse, which they set vp in their high-ways, in the tops of their Churches, and in euery doore of their houses, signing themselves continually with it on their foreheades & breasts, with great deuotion, as they will seeme by their outward gesture and behauiour. Which were much lesse offence, if they gaue not withall, that Religious reuerence and worshipsse vnto it, which is due vnto none but God onely, and vsed the dumbe shew and signing of it, instead of Thanksgiuing, and of all other duties which they doe owe vnto God.

When they rise euery day in the Morning, they goe commonlie in the sight of some Scepter, that hath a crosse made on the toppe of it: and so bowing themselves towards the crosse, they signe themselves withall on their foreheades and breasts. And this is their thankgiuing to God for their nights rest, without any word speaking, except peradventure they say, Alody Pomeley, or, Lord haue mercy vpon vs.

When they sit downe to meate, and rise againe from it, the thankgiuing to God, is the crossing of their fore-heads and breasts. Except it be some few that adde peradventure, a word or two of some ordinary prayer, impertinent to that purpose.

When they are to giue an oath, for the deciding of any controuersie at law, they do it by swearing by the Crosse, and kissing the feet of it, making it as G O D, whose name onely is to be vsed in such trial of Iustice.

When they enter into any house (where euer there is an Idoll hanging on the wal) they signe themselves with the crosse, and bow themselves to it.

When they beginne any worke, be it little or much, they arme themselves first with the signe of the crosse. And this commonly is all their prayer vnto God, for good speede of their businesse. And thus they serue God with crosses, after a crosse and vaine manner: not vnderstanding what the Crosse of Christ is, nor the power of it. And yet they thinke all strangers Christians, to be no better then Turkes, in comparison of themselves (and so they wil say) because they bow not themselves, when they meete with the Crosse, nor signe themselves with it, as the Russe manner is.

They haue holy water, in like vse and estimation as the Popish Church hath. But herein they exceed them, in that they doe not onely hallow their holy water stockes, and tubs full of water; but all the Riuer of the Country once euery year. At Mosko it is done with great pompe & solemnity: the Emperour himselfe being present at it, with all his Nobility, marching through the freetes towards the Riuer of Moskua, in manner of procession, in this order as followeth. First goe two Deacons, with banners in their hands, the one of Precheite (or our Lady) the other of S. Michael, fighting with his Dragon. Then follow after, the rest of the Deacons and the Priests of Mosko, two and two in a ranke, with coaps on their backs, and their Idols at their breasts, carried with girdles or slings, made fast about their necks. Next the Priests, come their Bishops in their pontificalibus: then the Fryars, Monks and Abbots: and after, the Patriarchs in very rich attire, with a ball, or sphere on the top of his myter, to signify his vniuersality ouer that Church. Last commeth the Emperour, with all his Nobility. The whole traine is of a mile long, or more.

When they are come to the Riuer, a great hole is made in the yce, where the market is kept, of a rod and a halfe broad, with a stage round about it to keepe off the preale. Then beginneth the Patriarch to say certaine prayers, and coniureth the diuell to come out of the water: and so casting in salt, and sending it with frankincense, maketh the whole Riuer to become holy water. The morning before, all the people of Mosko vse to make crosses of chawke ouer euery doore, & window of their houses: least the diuell being coniured out of the water, should flye into their houses.

When the ceremonies are ended, you shall see the black gard of the Emperours house, & then the rest of the Towne with their pailles and buckets, to rake off the hallowed water for drinke, and other vses. You shall also see the women dippe in their children ouer head and eares, and many men and women leap into it, forme naked, some with their clothes on, when some man would thinke his finger would freeze off, if hee should but dippe it into the water. When the men haue doone, they bring their horses to the riuer, to drinke of the sanctified water; and so make them as holy as a horse. Their ser day for this solemne action of halowing their riuers, is that we call Twelue day. The like is doone by other Bishops, in all parts of the Realme.

Their maner is also to giue it to their sicke, in their greatest extremitie; thinking that it will cyther recouer them, or sanctifie them to God. Whereby they kill many, through their vnreasonable superstition, as did the Lord Borris his onely sonne, at my being at the Mosco: whom he killed (as was sayd by the Physitions) by powring into him colde holy water, and by presenting him naked into the Church, to their Saint Basilis, in the colde of the Winter, in an extremitie of sickenesse.

They haue an Image of Christ, which they call Nerubis, (which signifies as much as Made without hands) for so their priests (and superstition withall) perfwades them it was. This in their processions, they carry about with them on high vpon a pole, enclosed within a Pike, made like a Lanthorne, and doe reuerence to it, as to a great mysteric.

At euery brewing, their manner is likewise, to bring a dish of their woort to the Priest, within the Church: which being hallowed by him, is poured into the brewing, and so giueth it such a vertue, as when they drinke of it, they are seldom sober. The like they doe with the first fruites of their come in Haruest.
